notoriouſly abuſed by the favourite miniſter, who condemned, baniſhed, and even put to death many illuſtrious perſons, whom he hated or ſuſpected, without conſulting the emperor, nay, without his knowledge; for though whatever the emperor ſaid or did was immediately carried to Plautianus, yet Severus was quite unacquainted with the crimes and arbitrary proceedings of his miniſter; and hence, looking upon him as a man without reproach, he continued to heap upon him all ſorts of honours. He had already diſtinguiſhed him with the conſular ornaments, and created him ſenator, without removing him from the command of the prætorian guards; and this year he not only appointed him conſul, but, to the great ſurprize of Rome and the whole empire, declared his intention of marrying his eldeſt ſon Caracalla to Fulvia Plautilla, the daughter of Plautianus; which he did accordingly this very year, ſoon after his return to Rome; for, having ſettled the affairs in the eaſt, he arrived unexpectedly at Rome about the latter end of May, and, according to Herodian, entered the city in triumph [t]. Spartian writes, that he declined the triumph decreed him, becauſe he could not ſit in the triumphal chariot by reaſon of the gout; but ſuffered his ſon Caracalla to triumph over the Jews, who had, it ſeems, revolted, but had been again brought under ſubjection by Severus [u]. The emperor, upon his return, diſtributed immenſe ſums among the ſoldiers and people, ten pieces of gold a man more than any other prince had ever been known to give, and added to this extraordinary largeſs moſt magnificent ſhews, which laſted ſeven days [w]. When the ſhews were over, the nuptials of Caracalla and Plautilla were celebrated with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. Dion Caſſius writes, that what Plautianus gave his daughter on this occaſion, would have been a ſufficient dower for fifty queens; and adds, that he appointed an hundred perſons of good families to attend her, whom he had for that purpoſe privately cauſed to be made eunuchs, tho' ſome of them were married, and even had children; which, as that writer obſerves, highly provoked both the ſenate and people againſt him [x]. About this time, Severus gave the manly robe to his ſecond ſon Geta, who had entered the fourteenth year of his age on the twenty-ſeventh of May of this year 203, the tenth of his father's reign [y]. The following year, L. Fabius Septimius

Severus marries his ſon Caracalla to the daughter of Plautianus.

[t] Herod. l. iii p. 529. [u] Vit. Sev p. 63. [w] Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 859, 860. Herod. ibid. [x] Dio, p. 859. [y] Vit. Sev. p. 69.

Septimius Cilo being conſul the ſecond time with L. Libo, the emperor, notwithſtanding his great kindneſs for Plautianus, being offended at the great number of ſtatues erected to him in all the public places of the city, cauſed ſome of them to be taken down. Hereupon a report being ſpread, that he was diſgraced, ſeveral governors of provinces, looking upon him already as a public enemy, cauſed his ſtatues to be pulled down in their governments; but paid dear for their over-

The emperor orders ſome of his ſtatues to be pulled down.

haſty zeal, ſome of them being deprived of their employments, and others tried by the ſenate and condemned to baniſhment. Among the latter was Racius Conſtans, governor of Sardinia, who was tried by the emperor in perſon, in conjunction with Dion Caſſius and ſeveral other ſenators. Severus on this occaſion ſolemnly declared, that he would never ſuffer the leaſt affront or injury to be offered with impunity to Plautianus; but nevertheleſs, before a year was over, he changed his ſentiments, and ſuffered him to be put to death in his preſence. His ruin was chiefly owing to Caracalla, who, not able to bear with the haughty and imperious temper of his wife Plautilla, hated both her and his father-in-law Plautianus, openly declaring, that if ever he obtained the ſovereign power, they ſhould both ſoon feel the effects of his reſentment. Hereupon Plautianus reſolved to be beforehand with him, not doubting, but upon his death he ſhould be able to ſeize the empire for himſelf, as Severus was now ſtricken in years, and troubled with the gout. In the mean time, Geta, the emperor's brother, being taken ill, and finding there was no hope of his recovery, deſired to ſee Severus before he died, and acquainted him with the haughty, imperious, and tyrannical conduct of his favourite miniſter. Thenceforth the emperor began to look upon him with a jealous eye, and to leſſen by degrees his overgrown power; which he was no ſooner appriſed of, than he reſolved to exert the authority he ſtill enjoyed, and ſecure, by the murder both of the emperor and his ſon, the ſovereignty to himſelf; at leaſt Saturninus, one of the tribunes of the prætorian guards, declared to Severus, that Plautianus had charged him to aſſaſſinate them both, and ſhewed him his orders in writing. Herodian [z] and Ammianus Marcellinus [a] ſeem not to queſtion in the leaſt the truth of his depoſition; but Dion Caſſius looks upon the whole as a contrivance of Caracalla to deſtroy Plautianus, whoſe haughty behaviour he could no longer longer brook [b]. Be that as it will, they all agree, that Plautianus, coming to the palace of his own accord, or ſent for by the emperor, as Dion will have it, and entering the emperor's room, where Caracalla then was, in order to clear himſelf from the crime laid to his charge, the young prince ruſhed upon him with a great fury, ſnatched his ſword from his ſide, which he wore as captain of the guards, and ordered thoſe who were preſent to diſpatch him, being prevented by the emperor, who began to relent, from doing it himſelf. His body was caſt into the ſtreet; but ſoon after taken, by the emperor's orders, and interred [c]. Severus immediately aſſembled the ſenate; but without uttering any invectives againſt Plautianus, only bewailed the unhappy lot of mankind, ſince ſome loved to exceſs, and others abuſed the love that was ſhewn them. He did not ſeem to believe, ſays Dion Caſſius, that Plautianus had ordered the tribune to murder him; but nevertheleſs proſecuted, and condemned, either to death or baniſhment, all his friends and creatures. His daughter Plautilla and his brother Plautius were baniſhed to the iſland of Liparis, where they were murdered by order of Caracalla, ſoon after his acceſſion to the empire [d]. Herodian writes, that they were baniſhed to Sicily, and there generouſly ſupported by Severus during his life-time [e]. This year, the 957th of Rome, the 204th of the chriſtian æra, and the twelfth of the reign of Severus, were celebrated with extraordinary pomp the ſecular games [f].

Caracalla the occaſion of his ruin.

[z] Herod. l. iii, p. 531, 533. [a] Ammian. l. xxix, p. 368.

He is murdered by his orders.

THE next conſuls were the emperor's two ſons, Caracalla, the ſecond time, and Geta, the firſt. During their adminiſtration, Severus continued either at Rome or in the neighbourhood, and applied himſelf wholly to the adminiſtration of juſtice, which he did with great impartiality, following therein the advice of the celebrated civilian Papinianus, whom he appointed captain of the guards; for at this time the chief province of that officer was to decide law-ſuits with the emperor, or in his name. Papinianus in the diſcharge of this important office, employed as his counſellors Paulus and Ulpianus, two men eminently accompliſhed in the knowledge of the laws. As the empire now enjoyed a profound peace, Severus was at leiſure to reform many abuſes; which he did accordingly: but is blamed by moſt of the antients on account of his exceſſive ſeverity, eſpecially by the emperor Julian, who thinks his cruel inflexibility, as he ſtyles it, his greateſt fault;

Papinianus made captain of the guards.

Severus reforms ſeveral abuſes, enacts good laws, &c.

[b] Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 861. [c] Idem ibid. Herod. p. 534. [d] Dio, p. 862. [e] Herod. l. iii. p. 535. [f] Cenſor. c. 17. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 669.

fault [g]; for he never pardoned the leaſt tranſgreſſion. He enacted ſeveral laws, which are mightily cried up, by the writers of thoſe times, as equally juſt and neceſſary. Many of them are ſtill extant in the Code. He allowed no power to his freed-men; nor would he ſuffer the ſenate to diſtinguiſh them with any honours. He choſe for governors of the provinces men of unblemiſhed characters, and was always ready to hear with great patience the complaints of his people. No prince ever managed the public money more frugally; and by that means he left the exchequer exceeding rich at his death, though he had found it quite empty, and had been engaged in ſeveral expenſive wars. When he died, corn was found in the public granaries ſufficient to ſupply the city for ſeven years, and oil in the ſtore-houſes, which he built at a vaſt charge, for the conſumption of five years, reckoning not only the city of Rome, but all the places in Italy that produced no oil. He even left wherewithal to ſupply for ever the indigent people of Rome with a certain quantity of oil every day, which was in part to be ſent yearly by the inhabitants of Libya Tripolitana, who of their own accord ſubmitted to that burden out of regard to Severus, who was of the ſame province, and had obliged them, by utterly extirpating a neighbouring nation, that often invaded their country and laid waſte their fields [h]. But this contribution proving in proceſs of time very burdenſome to them, Conſtantine remitted it. Severus repaired moſt of the public edifices of Rome, and raiſed an incredible number of new ones in Rome, in Antioch, in Alexandria, in Byzantium, and in moſt of the great cities of the empire. The following year, when Numius Albinus and Fulvius Æmilianus were conſuls, was remarkable for the death of many illuſtrious ſenators, inhumanly maſſacred by the emperor's orders. Among theſe were Quintillus Plautianus and Apronianus, both perſons of unblemiſhed characters and of great authority in the ſenate, but hated by the emperor on account of their illuſtrious birth and extraordinary accompliſhments. They were both accuſed of having conſulted the aſtrologers about the death of Severus and their own fate, and condemned, without ſo much as being heard. Bæbius Marcellinus, another ſenator of great diſtinction, was condemned by the ſenate, and that inſtant hurried to execution, upon the depoſition of a ſingle evidence, who charged him with having liſtened while Apronianus was conſulting the aſtrologer. The evidence had been ſuborned by Several ſenators put to death.

[g] Jul. Cap. p. 14. Vit. Sev. p. 71. [h] Vit. Sev. 67. Dio, p. 869.

Pollenius Sebennus, who was himſelf ſoon after condemned at the ſuit of the people of Noricum, whom he had tyrannically oppreſſed, while he governed that province [i]. The following year, when Aper and Maximus were conſuls, the northern inhabitants of Britain invaded the Roman territories, and, putting to flight the legions that guarded them, committed every-where moſt dreadful ravages. Virius Lupus, then governor, or as Ulpian calls him, preſident of Britain, not thinking himſelf in a condition to withſtand the enemy, retired before them, and in the mean time acquainted the emperor with the ſtate of affairs in that province; who, apprehending that the whole iſland, unleſs awed by a powerful army, would ſoon revolt and ſhake off the yoke, reſolved to go thither in perſon; and accordingly, having made the neceſſary preparations for this expedition, he ſet out for Britain the enſuing year, while his two ſons were conſuls, Caracalla, the third time, and Geta, the ſecond. Before he left Rome, he inveſted his ſon Geta with the tribunitial power, and conferred upon him the title of Auguſtus, which he had beſtowed three years before on his eldeſt ſon Caracalla; ſo that there were now three Auguſtuſes at a time, which had never happened before. The emperor took both his ſons with him, being glad of that opportunity to remove them from Rome, where they abandoned themſelves to idleneſs and debauchery, and to inure them to the toils and fatigues of war. The Britons were no ſooner informed of his arrival in their iſland, than, dreading his power, they ſent embaſſadors to him, offering to ſubmit upon honourable terms. Severus detained the embaſſadors till he was ready to take the field, and then diſmiſſed them, without granting them their requeſt. He paſt the firſt winter, it ſeems, in the ſouthern parts of Britain, whence he marched early in the ſpring of the enſuing year, when Pompeianus and Avitus were conſuls, againſt the Mæatæ, who bordered on the Roman dominions, and the Caledonians, who dwelt more to the north. No battle was fought in this expedition; but nevertheleſs, what by the enemy's ambuſcades, what by the hardſhips the Roman ſoldiers underwent, and the toils they endured in cutting down woods, building bridges, and drying marſhy grounds, fifty thouſand of them are ſaid to have periſhed [k]. Herodian writes, that the Caledonians inceſſantly haraſſed the army on their march, attacked them unexpectedly, cut many thouſands of them in pieces, and then retired into their fens and woods, whither the Romans could not follow

The Britons revolt.

Geta inveſted with the tribunitial power and declared Auguſtus.

Severus's expedition into Britain.

[i] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 741, &c. [k] Dio, l. lxxvi, p. 867.

low them [l]. The emperor, though ſtricken in years and troubled with the gout, purſued his painful march, ſurmounting with great chearfulneſs all difficulties, till he reached the moſt diſtant and northern coaſts of the iſland, laying the country waſte far and wide, and putting all to fire and ſword; inſomuch, that the Caledonians were in the end obliged to purchaſe a peace, by yielding to the Romans part of their country, and delivering up their arms. Dion Caſſius adds, that Severus, during his ſtay in the moſt northern parts of Britain, obſerved with great exactneſs the length of the days and nights, of the ſummer and winter [m]; which he could not do, without continuing there, that is, in the north of Scotland, at leaſt ſix months. Having thus concluded a peace with the Caledonians, he returned to the ſouthern parts of Britain, where he had left his ſon Geta to adminiſter juſtice during his abſence. For this expedition he was honoured by the ſenate with the title of Britannicus Maximus, and his two ſons with that of Britannicus [n].

He overruns the whole iſland.

SEVERUS ſpent great part of the following year, when Man. Acilius Fauſtinus and Triarinus Rufinus were conſuls, in building a wall in Britain from ſea to ſea, to ſecure his conqueſts, and part the Roman territories from thoſe of the more northern Britons not ſubject to Rome. No mention of this wall is made either by Dion Caſſius or Herodian, who lived at that time, and give us a very particular account of the exploits of Severus in Britain. However, Spartian ſpeaks of it, and calls it the chief ornament of Severus's reign; nay, he pretends, that on account of this wall he was honoured by the ſenate with the title of Britannicus [o]. There is a great diſagreement among authors, both as to the nature of this work and its ſituation. Some writers take it to have been a wall, and others only a ditch, fortified on the Roman ſide with a rampart and paliſades. Spartian ſtyles it a wall or ditch [p]. Oroſius ſuppoſes it to have been a ditch defended by a rampart and a great number of towers at a ſmall diſtance from each other [q]. Beda thinks it was a wall, built not with ſtone, but turf, and ſupported by a rampart and ſharp ſtakes driven deep into the ground [r]. The ſame writer is of opinion, that it was raiſed by Severus in the ſame place where a new wall was built by the Romans about the middle of the fifth century, when they entirely abandoned the iſland; that is, ſo far as

His wall in Britain.

In what place it was built.

[l] Herod. l. iii. p. 867. [m] Dio, p. 869. [n] Goltz. p. 83.
[o] Pagi, p. 207. [o] Vit. Sev. p. 71. [p] Idem, p. 73.
[q] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 17. [r] Bed. hiſt. Ang. l. i, c. 5.

we can judge from the context, on the iſthmus, which he deſcribed before, between the friths of Forth and Clyde [r]. Buchanan likewiſe places this wall on the ſame iſthmus [s]; and adds, that, in his time, ſome remains of it were ſtill to be ſeen. On the other hand, Cambden maintains Severus's wall to have ſtood a great way more to the ſouth, that is, between the mouth of the Tyne and Solway frith. The learned Uſher is of the ſame opinion, and alledges very ſtrong reaſons to ſupport it [t]. However, we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that Severus, after having marched from one end of the iſland to the other, and obliged the enemies of Rome to yield to him part of their country, ſhould have abandoned to them a conſiderable portion of the Roman dominions, viz. the countries lying between Northumberland or Cumberland and the friths of the Forth and Clyde. For that theſe countries belonged to the Romans before Severus's time, Uſher himſelf owns and maintains [u], that Antoninus built his wall on the above-mentioned iſthmus. We do not find, that the northern Britons ſeized any part of the Roman dominions in the reign of M. Aurelius, nor in that of Commodus; for though they paſſed the wall in the time of Commodus, yet they were driven back by Ulpius Marcellus, and reſtrained within their antient bounds, that is, according to Uſher, within the two above-mentioned friths. Is it therefore probable, that Severus thus curtailed the Roman empire, and abandoned to the barbarians, as they are called by the Roman writers, ſuch an extenſive country, after having, at immenſe charge and with the loſs of fifty thouſand men, obliged them to yield part of theirs? Beſides, Spartian tells us, in expreſs words, that Severus's wall reached from ſea to ſea; and Eutropius, that it was but thirty-two miles in length [y]; which proves, that it ſtood on the above-mentioned iſthmus, and could ſtand in no other part of the whole iſland. Severus, having ended his wall, retired with his army to Eboracum, now York, where he was ſeized with a lingering diſtemper, occaſioned, as was believed, by his grief and affliction for the wicked life of his eldeſt ſon, who, notwithſtanding the extraordinary affection Severus had ever ſhewn him, had, during the late expedition, with a boldneſs hardly to be matched, attempted to murder him in the ſight of the whole army. For while the emperor, at the head of his troops in battle array, was concluding a treaty

Caracalla attempts to murder his father.

[r] Idem ibid. c. 12. p. 116. & l. v. p. 135.
[s] Idem ibid. p. 1024.
[t] Buchan. rer. Scot. l. i. p. 16. l. iv.
[u] Uſh. Britan. eccleſ. antiquit. p. 606.
[y] Eutrop. l. viii. c. 10.

treaty with the Britons and receiving their arms, Caracalla, who ſtood behind him, drawing unexpectedly his ſword, in the ſight both of the Roman and Britiſh army, advanced to ſtab him, and would have put his wicked deſign in execution, had he not been deterred from it by the outcries of thoſe who ſtood next to the emperor. Severus, turning about that inſtant, ſaw his ſon with a naked ſword in his hand; but, without betraying the leaſt ſurprize, or uttering a ſingle word, purſued the buſineſs in hand, received the arms of the Britons, and ſigned the treaty. When he returned to his tent, he ſent for his ſon; and, in the preſence of Papinianus, captain of the guards, and Caſtor, his chief chamberlain, firſt reproached him with his black and wicked attempt; then offering him a drawn ſword, "If your ambition to reign alone "prompts you", ſaid he, "to imbrue your hands in the "blood of your father, execute your impious purpoſe rather "in this place, than in the ſight of the whole world, and "in the preſence both of our friends and enemies: if you "are not yet abandoned to ſuch a degree as to murder your "father with your own hand, order Papinianus to commit "the parricide: you are emperor; he muſt obey you." We do not find, that Caracalla was touched with remorſe, or any-ways affected, by this ſpeech.

The Mæatæ and Caledonians revolt.

THE following year, when Gentianus and Baſſus were conſuls, the Mæatæ and Caledonians, underſtanding that the emperor was indiſpoſed and not in a condition to take the field, without any regard to the late treaty, flew to arms; and aſſembling their forces, attempted to paſs the new wall, and invade the Roman dominions; which ſo provoked Severus, that he ordered Caracalla to lead the whole army againſt the enemy, and, entering their country anew, to put all he met to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age. The young prince, ſeeing himſelf, contrary to his expectation, intruſted with ſo great a command, made it his whole ſtudy to debauch the officers and ſoldiers, with a deſign to depoſe his father. Many tribunes and centurions, hearkening to him, publicly declared, before the army ſet out from York, that they would no longer obey an old man, worn out with infirmities, lame, and diſabled by the gout from marching at their head, and diſcharging the duties of an emperor. Theſe ſpeeches were ſoon carried to Severus, who, immediately ſummoning the army to aſſemble, cauſed himſelf to be taken up, and placed upon his tribunal; whence, in moſt bitter terms, he reproached with folly, ingratitude, and treachery, ſuch of the officers as had ſeconded the wicked attempts of his ſon; ordered them all to be beheaded that inſtant in his preſence; and then, addreſſing himſelf to the army, ſtruck with terror and diſmay at the ſight of ſo many executions, aſked them with an imperious and majeſtic air, whether they were yet ſatisfied, that the head ruled, and not the feet [a]? Some writers tell us, that he would at the ſame time have put his ſon to death, had he not been diverted from it by the captains of the guards [b]; others, on the contrary, ſay, that the captains of the guards adviſed him to deliver himſelf, by the death of his unnatural ſon, from the dangers that threatened him, but that he could not by any means prevail upon himſelf to follow their advice [c]. After this, his diſtemper being greatly encreaſed by the uneaſineſs of his mind, he was ſoon reduced to the laſt extremity; when he ſent for his two ſons, cauſed the ſpeech of Micipſa to his children, in Salluſt, to be read to them, exhorted them to concord and unity, and recommended to them this tyrannical maxim; to enrich the ſoldiers, and gain their affections, without caring whether they were beloved or hated by the reſt of their ſubjects [d]. When he found his end approaching, he cried out, I have been every thing, and every thing is nothing [e]. Then ordering the urn to be brought to him, in which his aſhes were to be incloſed, on ſeeing it, Little urn, ſaid he, you ſhall contain one, for whom the whole world was too little [f]. Before he expired, he ordered the golden ſtatue of Fortune, which always ſtood in the emperor's room, to be carried into the rooms, firſt of his eldeſt, and then of his youngeſt, ſon [g]. As his pains encreaſed, eſpecially in his feet, he called for poiſon; but no one daring to adminiſter it to him, he is ſaid to have glutted himſelf with coarſe meats, which ſoon put an end to his Severus dies. life [h]. He died at York on the fourth of February of the year 211, after having lived, according to Dion Caſſius [i], ſixty-five years, nine months, and twenty-five days, and reigned ſeventeen years, eight months, and three days. His body was burnt at York with great ſolemnity, and his aſhes conveyed by his two ſons to Rome, in a golden urn, or, as others will have it, in an urn of porphyry. It was received in all the provinces with extraordinary pomp, and depoſited at Rome in the ſtately mauſoleum of the emperor Adrian.

Caracalla attempts to depoſe his father.

[z] Dio, p. 868.

He

[a] Vit. Sev. p. 71. Aur. Vict. [b] Vit. Caracall. p. 89. [c] Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 868. [d] Dio, p. 868. [e] Vit. Sev. p. 73. [f] Dio, p. 869. [g] Vit. Sev. p. 74. [h] Vict. epit. [i] Dio, ibid.

He was ſoon after ranked among the gods, with the uſual ceremonies, deſcribed at length by Herodian [k]. Severus was, without all doubt, a perſon of moſt extraordinary parts; but all his good qualities were quite eclipſed by his exceſſive cruelty and inſatiable avarice. Some writers endeavour to excuſe his cruelty, which they ſoften with the name of ſeverity, and pretend, that, without violent remedies, the many evils that had long prevailed in the ſtate could never have been rooted out. It was ſaid of him, if Spartian is to be credited, as it had been formerly ſaid of Auguſtus, That he ought never to have been born, or never to have died. He was, according to the ſame writer, greatly eſteemed, nay, and generally loved after his death, when no one dreaded his cruelty, and all felt the effects of his excellent regulations [l]. Galen tells us, that his greateſt pleaſure was to do good to all; and adds, that he kept conſtantly by him a great ſtore of treacle, and other expenſive remedies, to relieve ſuch as wanted them; by which means he ſaved the lives of many perſons, namely, of Antipater, his Greek ſecretary; of the ſon of Piſo, to whom Galen inſcribed his treatiſe on treacle; and of a lady of diſtinction, named Arria, for whom Severus had a particular value, becauſe ſhe applied herſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy and the reading of Plato [m]. But after all, the moſt we can ſay in his commendation is, that Severus deſerves to be ranked among the great, but not among the good, princes. Of the writers, who flouriſhed in his reign, we ſhall give an account in our note (N).

His character.

SEVERUS

[k] Herod. l. iv. p. 540. [l] Vit. Sev. p. 71. [m] Gal. de ther. l. ii. p. 457, 458.

(N) Among the writers who flouriſhed at this time, we may reckon the emperor himſelf; for he wrote the hiſtory of his own life, which was a kind of apology for his great ſeverity. Spartian commends it as a ſincere and impartial account of the tranſactions of his reign (59); and Victor ſpeaks of it as an elegant and judicious performance. It has been long ſince loſt. The ſophiſt Antipater, a native of Hierapolis in Aſia, wrote likewiſe the hiſtory of Severus's reign, and was for that work firſt appointed the emperor's Greek ſecretary, afterwards charged with the care of educating his two ſons, Caracalla and Geta; then honoured with the conſulſhip; and laſtly, preferred to the government of Bithynia; from which employment he

(59) Vit. Sev. p. 65.

Is ſucceeded by his ſons Caracalla and Geta.

SEVERUS was ſucceeded by his two ſons Baſſianus and Geta, whom he had inveſted with the ſovereign power, during he was ſoon removed, on account of his exceſſive cruelty (60). His hiſtory has not reached our times. Galen, the prince of phyſicians, was ſtill alive in Severus's time; for he lived, according to Suidas, ſeventy years (61). He was a native of Pergamus, and the ſon of one Nico, a celebrated architect and geometrician. He was likewiſe well verſed in the other branches of mathematics, and pretended to underſtand and teach the Greek tongue in its greateſt purity. His ſon Claudius Galenus was born in the year 131, the fifteenth of Adrian's reign, as appears from F. Labbe, who collected out of Galen's works, and publiſhed in 1660, all the paſſages in which that writer makes any mention of himſelf (62). He came to Rome while L. Verus was making war upon the Parthians in the eaſt, being at that time thirty-two or thirty-three years old (63). He ſtaid in Rome about three years, and then returned to his own country; whence three or four years after, he was invited into Italy by M. Aurelius, that is, about the end of the year 169. He refuſed to attend that prince into Germany, and continued at Rome, where he is ſuppoſed to have ſpent the remaining part of his life. He left behind him a great many works on different ſubjects, viz. on phyſic, rhetoric, philoſophy, and ſome grammatical pieces (64). Jonſius takes the treatiſe on treacle not to be his, becauſe he does not mention it among his other works (65). The ſame writer maintains the hiſtory of the philoſophers, aſcribed to Galen, to be nothing elſe but the five books of Plutarch upon the opinions of philoſophers (66). Some find fault with Galen for crying down all thoſe of his profeſſion, who in his time were in any repute at Rome (67). Diogenes Laertius, the author of the lives of the philoſophers compriſed in ten books, flouriſhed, according to Voſſius, under Antoninus Pius; but according to Jonſius, whoſe conjectures ſeem to us better grounded, under Severus (68). He was a native, as Jonſius conjectures, of Laertes, a ſmall city of Cilicia, and thence took the ſurname of Laertius. After he had taken great pains to inform himſelf of the different tenets of the various ſects of philoſophers, he embraced the worſt of all, that is, the Epicurean. His work is greatly eſteemed by the learned, but in many places ſtrangely corrupted. Caſaubon aſcribes many of the faults, which are to be found in the work, to the author himſelf, who, ing his life-time, and by his laſt will appointed to reign jointly after his death. The former, commonly known by the who, according to him, wanted either memory, judgment, or time, to digeſt the materials which he had collected (69). Before he wrote the lives of the philoſophers, he publiſhed a great number of epigrams in all kinds of verſes, which he ſtyled Pammetra, that is, all ſorts of meaſures (70). Neſtor, a native of Laranda in Lycaonia, flouriſhed, according to Suidas (71), under Severus, and wrote ſeveral Greek poems. Piſander, who, in the reign of the emperor Alexander, wrote ſome hiſtories, or rather fables, in Greek verſe, was his ſon. Hermocrates, the ſophiſt, would have proved the moſt eloquent orator of his age, had he had time to improve his extraordinary talents; but he died in the twenty-eighth year of his age. Severus often heard him, and with great pleaſure. The emperor obliged him, while he was in the eaſt, to marry the daughter of the ſophiſt Antipater; but he divorced her ſoon after (72) Julius Titianus, the father of the orator of the ſame name, who was preceptor to the ſon of Maximinus, about the year 235, publiſhed many pieces mightily cried up by the antients; and, among the reſt, a deſcription of all the provinces of the empire; and a book of letters, in which he imitated the ſtyle of Cicero; for he had an extraordinary talent in imitating the different ſtyles of authors, and was thence called the ape of his time (73). C. Julius Solinus, whoſe deſcription of the earth, under the title of Polyhiſtor, has reached us, flouriſhed, according to ſome writers, under Severus; but others, with Voſſius, are quite at a loſs about the time in which that author wrote. All we know for certain is, that he lived after Pliny the elder, and before St. Jerom; that is, after the firſt century; and before the end of the fourth (74). Dodwel obſerves, that no author quotes him before the fourth century; and concludes, from ſome conjectures, that he flouriſhed after Cenſorinus, who wrote in the year 238 (75). His work is, for the moſt part, copied, and not very judiciouſly, from other writers, eſpecially from Pliny the elder. Under Severus flouriſhed Philoſtratus, author of the life of Apollonius Tyaneus; which work he undertook at the requeſt of the empreſs Julia, the wife of Severus. Photius commends the elegance and ſoftneſs of his ſtyle; but thinks his conſtruction not always agreeable to the rules of grammar (76). We have ſhewn, in the foregoing volume, how little credit his life of Apollonius deſerves (69) Diog. Laert. not. Caſaub. p. 18. (70) Hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 13. (71) Suid. p. 211. (72) Philoſtr. ſoph. 51. (73) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 1. (74) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. iii. p. 720, 721. (75) Dod. append. ad differt. Cyprian. c. 15. (76) Phot. c. 44.

(60) Herod l. ii. p. 514. Philoſtr. ſoph. 50. Galen. ther. t. ii. p. 458. (61) Suid. p. 509. (62) Gal. vit. Jonſ. l. iii. c. 11. (63) Gal. prog. c. 3. (64) Suid. ibid. (65) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 12. (66) Idem ibid. (67) Vide Salmaſ. not. in Spart. p. 732. (68) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 12.

the nickname of Caracalla, a Gauliſh word for a kind of caſſock uſed in Gaul, and by him firſt introduced among the Romans, gave, from his infancy, many inſtances of an extraordinary ſweet and mild temper; but, as he grew up, abandoned himſelf to all manner of cruelty, and proved in the end a moſt inhuman and bloody tyrant; where-as the latter, who in his tender years ſeemed no leſs void of humanity than his father, changed, we may ſay, by degrees, his temper, and became, in regard of his affability, moderation, and complaiſance towards all, the darling both of the people and ſoldiery. They ſhewed, from their childhood, an utter averſion to each other, and were continually quarrelling, even in their common ſports and diverſions. This natural antipathy encreaſed as they grew in years, notwithſtanding all the entreaties, rebukes, and exhortations, both of their father and their preceptor Antipater, who were continually laying before them the many evils that muſt neceſſarily attend the diviſion and diſagreement of brothers. But all to no purpoſe; for Severus no ſooner expired, than Caracalla ſtrove to have his brother excluded by the officers of the army from any ſhare in the ſovereignty; but the ſoldiers proteſting, that they would equally obey both the ſons of Severus, ſince he had appointed both to ſucceed him, he was forced to acknowledge his brother partner in the empire, and ſuffer the ſoldiers to take the uſual oath of allegiance to both. After this, Caracalla led his army towards the borders of the deſerves (77). In that hiſtory he promiſes to clear his hero in another work, from the aſperſions of the philoſopher Euphrates (78). But, if he was as good as his word, that performance has not reached us. He was, according to Euſebius, a native of Athens, and the ſon of Philoſtratus Verus, who publiſhed a great many works, and, among the reſt, one againſt the ſophiſt Antipater (79). Beſides the life of Apollonius, Philoſtratus wrote four books of pictures, or deſcriptions, a treatiſe on heroes, letters on friendſhip, and the lives of the ſophiſts in four books. All theſe works have reached our times. Under Severus lived two other writers of the ſame name, viz. Philoſtratus, the ſon of Nervianus, to whom ſome writers aſcribe the lives of the ſophiſts; and Philoſtratus, a native of Lemnos, who wrote ſome deſcriptions; of theſe, the former was great nephew, and the latter grandſon by the mother, to the author of the life of Apollonius (80).

Their different tempers

Mæatæ

(77) Hiſt. Univerſ. vol. XIV. cap. 19. ad fin. (78) Philoſ. vit. Apoll. l. i. c. 10. (79) Euſeb. in Hier. p. 435. (80) Vide Caſaub. in Spart. p. 30.

Mæatæ and Caledonians, who had begun hoſtilities a-new; but inſtead of attacking thoſe warlike nations, he concluded a treaty with them, withdrew his men from the forts erected in their country, and reſtored to them the lands, which Severus had obliged them to yield to him [n]. Before he left Britain, he diſcharged Papinian, captain of the guards; cauſed Caſtor, his father's chamberlain and chief favourite, to be put to death, together with Evodius, another of the deceaſed emperor's freed-men, and formerly his own preceptor; and diſpatched aſſaſſins into Italy to murder Plautilla, who had been his wife, Plautius her brother, and a celebrated charioteer of the faction in the circus oppoſite to that which he favoured [o]. Herodian tells us, that, before he left Britain, he diſpatched, under various pretences, the phyſicians who had refuſed to poiſon his father, and all the deceaſed emperor's friends, eſpecially ſuch as endeavoured to promote a good underſtanding between him and his brother [p]. Such was the beginning of the reign of Caracalla. The two brothers left Britain about the middle of the ſummer, and ſet out for Rome, with their mother Julia and the aſhes of their deceaſed father. Caracalla attempted on the road to murder his brother Geta; which attempt encreaſed their mutual animoſities and jealouſies to ſuch a degree, that thenceforth they both marched with their ſeparate guards, and with no leſs warineſs than if they had been in an enemy's country, lodging conſtantly in different houſes, and carefully watching the motions of each other. They were received with great ſolemnity at Rome, where they performed with extraordinary pomp the obſequies of their father, and then withdrew to the palace, which they divided into two; for it was larger, if Herodian is to be credited, than any city in the whole empire, except Rome. This diviſion between the two princes rent the whole city, nay, and the empire into factions; inſomuch, that, to avoid the many inconveniencies and diſorders thence ariſing, a diviſion of the empire was propoſed. To this expedient they both hearkened; Geta, who loved a quiet life, declaring, that if Caracalla would but yield to him Aſia and Egypt, he would retire to Antioch or Alexandria, and leave him in quiet poſſeſſion of the reſt of the empire. But this ſcheme was defeated by their mother Julia, throwing herſelf at their feet, and begging, with many tears, that that they would divide her too between them [q]. Towards the cloſe of this year, Caracalla attempted a-new to murder his brother, during the feaſt of Saturn; which occaſioned almoſt an open war between the two princes, and a great deal of bloodſhed [r].

Caracalla concludes a ſhameful treaty with the Britons.

Miſunderſtanding between the two brothers.

[n] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 882, & ſeq. Carac. & Get. vit. p. 87, & 91. [o] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 870, & l. lxxvi. p. 867. [p] Herod. l. iii. p. 538.

THE following year, when the two brothers Julius and Caius Aſper were conſuls, Caracalla, unalterably fixed in his wicked purpoſe of deſtroying his brother and ruling alone, but finding him guarded both againſt poiſon and open force, pretended a deſire of being reconciled with him, and, by means of their common mother Julia, invited him to an interview in her chamber. Geta readily accepted the invitation, and repaired, without guards, to the appointed place, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery in a propoſal which came from his mother, who loved him with great tenderneſs. But he had no ſooner entered her chamber, than ſome centurions, whom Caracalla had found means to convey privately into an adjoining room, ruſhing in, ſword in hand, fell upon Geta, and diſpatched him, with many wounds, in his mother's arms, who, in endeavouring to ſave him, was wounded in the hand [s]. Caracalla himſelf ſeems to have imbrued his hands in the blood of his brother; for Dion Caſſius tells us, that he afterwards conſecrated in the temple of Serapis the ſword with which he had murdered him [t]. Such was the end of this unhappy prince, after he had lived twenty-two years and nine months, and reigned, from the death of his father, one year and twenty-three days; for his father died on the fourth of February of the year 211, and he was killed the year following, on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month [u]. He no ſooner expired, than Caracalla, leaving the palace with great haſte and precipitation, flew through the city to the camp of the prætorian guards, pretending great fear and diſmay, and crying out aloud, that his life was in danger; that a bloody conſpiracy had been formed againſt him; that he muſt have fallen a victim to the rage of his enemies, had not his innocence protected him. Upon his arrival in the camp, he went ſtrait to the place where the enſigns and banners were kept, which was a kind of temple and aſylum; and there, throwing himſelf upon the ground, returned thanks to the gods for delivering him from ſo great and imminent a danger. To the ſoldiers, who crouded about him, he expreſſed himſelf

Geta murdered in the arms of his mother.

[q] Idem. p. 539—543. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 871. [r] Dio, p. 871. [s] Herod. l. iii. p. 543. [t] Dio, p. 880. [u] Vit. Get. p. 91.

ſelf with the ſame ambiguity; but by degrees let them know, that he was ſole ſovereign, and in a condition to beſtow upon them what wealth and honours he pleaſed; and that they might immediately feel the effects of his generoſity, which he ſaid was no longer checked or reſtrained, he doubled their pay, already very high, and added a largeſs of two thouſand five hundred drachmas a man, which he gave them leave to take that inſtant out of the public treaſury. Thus was the exchequer, which his father had, by innumerable murders, and unjuſt confiſcations, been filling for the ſpace of eighteen years, emptied in one day. Caracalla having, by this extravagant largeſs, ſecured the affections of the ſoldiery, told them in the end, that his brother Geta had attempted to murder him, but had loſt his life in the attempt. Hereupon Caracalla was ſaluted ſole emperor by the whole army, and the unhappy Geta declared a traytor and a public enemy [w]. There was at this time another camp in the neighbourhood of Alba, now Albano, where the murder of Geta was highly reſented; but Caracalla, haſtening thither, ſoon appeaſed them, by exaggerating to them the pretended treachery of his brother, and promiſing them an immenſe donative. Caracalla paſſed that night in the camp of the prætorian guards, and the next day went to the ſenate, with a cuiraſs under his robes, guarded by all his troops, ſome of whom he even placed among the ſenators, to be ready in caſe any of them ſhould attempt to revenge the death of Geta. His ſpeech turned upon the wicked deſigns of Geta, whom he ſaid he had ſlain unwillingly in his own defence, leſſening the heinouſneſs of his crime by the example of Romulus and others, who had revenged with death injuries offered them by their brothers. In withdrawing from the ſenate, he pronounced aloud the following words: "I give leave to all thoſe who are in baniſhment, to "return home; I except none, by what crimes ſoever they "may have deſerved that puniſhment [x]." From the ſenate he returned to the palace, leaning upon Papinian and Chilo; whence he cauſed the body of his deceaſed brother to be with great pomp conveyed to the tomb of the Septimian family on the Appian way; and when the funeral ceremonies were over, prevailed upon the ſenate, to rank him with the uſual ſolemnity among the gods [y]. Finding, upon his return to the palace, his mother Julia, bewailing with other women the death

Caracalla gains the ſoldiery with an immenſe largeſs.

His ſpeech in the ſenate.

Performs the obſequies of his brother, and cauſes him to be ranked among the gods.

[w] Dio, p. 872. Herod. l. iv. p. 544. Vit. Get. p. 91 & Carac. p. 86. [x] Vit. Car. p. 86. [y] Car. vit. p. 86. & Get. vit. p. 91, 92.

death of her ſon, tranſported with rage, he was at firſt for putting them all to death; but in the end got the better of his paſſion, and even ſhewed great kindneſs to Julia, ordering the ſame honours to be paid to her as to himſelf. Spartian and ſome other writers pretend, that ſhe gained his favour by ſacrificing to him what ought to have been dearer to her than her life. But neither Herodian, nor Dion Caſſius, charge Julia or Caracalla with any ſuch crime; and thoſe, who do, ſuppoſe Julia to have been only ſtep-mother to Caracalla, which is now by all writers agreed to be a groſs miſtake. We are told, that Caracalla, on hearing the name, or beholding the images or ſtatues, of Geta, uſed to burſt into tears; but this affected grief did not prevent his maſſacring, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or quality, all the friends of Geta [z].

Orders all his friends to be maſſacred.

Dion Caſſius writes, that he began this general maſſacre by ordering all his domeſtics, to the number of twenty thouſand perſons, to be inhumanly butchered. It was death to utter his name; inſomuch, that no one durſt uſe it thenceforth, even on the ſtage, where it was commonly given to ſlaves. He likewiſe ordered all the money with his name to be melted down, and the inſcription eraſed. Among many illuſtrious perſons, whom the inhuman tyrant ſacrificed to his rage and jealouſy, as the friends of Geta, no one was more univerſally, or more deſervedly, regretted, than the celebrated Papinian, the greateſt civilian, in the opinion of Zoſimus [a], and Cujas [b], that ever was, or ever will be. As Severus had recommended chiefly to him his two ſons, he ſpared no pains to reconcile them, and often defeated the wicked attempts of Caracalla; on which account he was by him reckoned among the friends of Geta. Beſides, the tyrant deſiring him, after the murder of his brother, to compoſe a ſpeech for him, excuſing the crime, which he deſigned to pronounce in the ſenate, Papinian, whoſe love for juſtice, to uſe the expreſſion of Zoſimus, was equal to his knowledge of it, anſwered with great firmneſs, It is not ſo eaſy a thing to juſtify a parricide as to commit it; and it is a ſecond parricide to defame an innocent perſon, after having taken away his life. The emperor, provoked at this anſwer, ordered his head to be immediately ſtruck off, and likewiſe his ſon's, who was then quæſtor, and had but three days before exhibited moſt magnificent ſports [c]. L. Fabius Chilo, another of Severus's great favourite

The death of Papinian.

[z] Vit. Get. p. 92. Herod. l. iii. p. 546. [a] Zoſ. l. i. p. 637. [b] Cuj. in cod. Theod. [c] Vit. Car. p. 88. Dio excerpt. Val. p. 742.

vourites, for whom Caracalla himſelf had a particular eſteem, (for he uſed to ſtyle him his true friend, his benefactor, his father) was in the next place doomed to deſtruction, for having, together with Papinian, endeavoured by all means to promote union and concord between the two brothers. A tribune was ſent with a band of ſoldiers to ſeize him in his houſe, drag him to the palace, and there butcher him in the preſence of the emperor. But the people, and the city-guards, whom Chilo had commanded while governor of Rome, moved with compaſſion in ſeeing a perſon of his rank thus ignominiouſly treated by the inſulting ſoldiery, like a common malefactor, reſcued him out of their hands, uttering dreadful menaces againſt the authors of ſuch outrages; which ſo frightened Caracalla, that he declared he had given no ſuch orders; and, to appeaſe the multitude, cauſed both the tribune and ſoldiers to be immediately put to death [d]. He ſpared Chilo, but vented his rage without controul upon many other illuſtrious perſons, both of the ſenatorial and equeſtrian order, not ſparing any for whom either his father or brother had ever ſhewn the leaſt kindneſs or eſteem. Among theſe unhappy victims were a daughter of the emperor M. Aurelius, whom the other emperors had treated with the utmoſt reſpect, but Caracalla ordered to be ſtrangled for ſhedding a few tears, when news was brought her of the death of Geta, brother to the late emperor Severus, to whom Caracalla had ſent the day before a diſh from his own table, as a token of his friendſhip; Pompeianus, who had been twice conſul, had commanded armies in ſeveral wars, and was grandſon to the emperor M. Aurelius, by the empreſs Lucilla; Helvius Pertinax, ſon to the emperor of that name, and therefore greatly beloved by the people, and no leſs hated by the jealous tyrant, whom he had likewiſe provoked with a ſatyrical jeſt; for when the titles of Parthicus and Sarmaticus were decreed to him by the ſenate, Pertinax moved, that the ſurname of Geticus might be added to the other two, alluding not ſo much to the victory which Caracalla pretended to have gained over the Getæ, as to the murder of his brother Geta [e]. Some of Geta's enemies fared no better than his friends; but the death of no man occaſioned greater ſurprize in the city, than that of Lætus, one of Caracalla's moſt intimate friends, and the firſt who had adviſed him to diſpatch his brother. He did not even ſpare the veſtal virgins, ſome of whom he ordered to be Many illuſtrious perſons inhumanly maſſacred.

The cruelty of Caracalla.

[d] Vit. Car. p. 86. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 872. [e] Vit. Car. p. 87.

be ſtrangled for having bewailed the death of Geta. In ſhort, no ſex, rank, or age, eſcaped his cruelty. The people he loaded with taxes in all the provinces of the empire, and at Rome cauſed great numbers of them to be put to death, ſometimes out of revenge, and ſometimes only for his diverſion; for he delighted in nothing ſo much as in feats of cruelty, and in bloodſhed. The people having one day rallied, at the Circenſian games, a charioteer whom he favoured, he commanded his guards to ruſh in among the multitude, and put all the delinquents to the ſword; but as the ſoldiers could not in ſo great a croud diſtinguiſh them from the reſt, they fell indifferently upon all, ſword in hand, and made a dreadful havock of the diſarmed multitude, ſparing only ſuch as had money enough about them to redeem their lives [f]. No prince ever employed more iniquitous means of raiſing money than Caracalla, or ſquandered it away with more prodigality. He often uſed to ſay, that money ought not to be lodged in private hands, but only in the prince's. Purſuant to his maxim, he impoveriſhed his ſubjects in all the provinces of the empire, loading them with exceſſive impoſts and taxes; for which, as well as his extravagant expences, when his mother took the liberty to blame him, he like a true tyrant, ſhewed her his naked ſword, ſaying, As long as I have this, I ſhall never want. However, he gave away ſuch immenſe ſums, moſtly to perſons who leaſt of all deſerved them, viz. to his guards, buffoons, players, gladiators, charioteers, freedmen, &c. that he was in the end obliged to coin falſe money, which he ſpent at home, while he employed what true gold and ſilver he could extort from his ſubjects in keeping the barbarians quiet, who were conſtantly threatening him with war [g]. He ſhewed on all occaſions the utmoſt contempt for the ſenate, entirely neglected the adminiſtration of juſtice, took no care of the provinces, and raiſed to the higheſt employments the meaneſt, and in every reſpect the moſt infamous and unworthy, perſons of the empire. Thus he gave the government of Rome to an eunuch, named Sempronius, who was by birth an Iberian, by profeſſion a poiſoner and magician, who had been baniſhed by his father Severus, and confined to a deſert iſland. He appointed one Theocritus captain of the guards, who had been firſt a ſlave, and afterwards a dancing-maſter and ſtage-player. One Epagathus, another manumitted ſlave, bore likewiſe great ſway at court, and with the other two ruled Loads his ſubjects with taxes.

Is controuled by his freedmen.

[f] Herod. l. iv. p. 546.

[g] Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 758. & l. lxxvii. p, 875.

ruled and controuled both the empire and the emperor, ſetting all things to ſale, offices, provinces, public revenues, public juſtice, and the lives of men, both innocent and guilty [h]. Caracalla was author of the famous law declaring all the free ſubjects of the empire Roman citizens. This conſtitution is commonly aſcribed to M. Aurelius; but that it was publiſhed not by that prince, but by Caracalla, we are told in expreſs terms by Dion Caſſius [i], whoſe authority is of far greater weight with us, than that of Aurelius Victor, who was, as we conjecture, led into that miſtake by the words of Ulpian, aſcribing the above-mentioned law to Antoninus [k], though from the context it is manifeſt, that Ulpian ſpeaks in that place of Antoninus Caracalla, and not of M. Aurelius Antoninus. St. Chryſoſtom, whom ſome writers have followed, ſuppoſes Adrian to have been the author of this law [l]. Though the name and privileges of Roman citizens were by this conſtitution made common to all the ſubjects of the empire, yet the antient diſtinction of colonies, of Latin, municipal, and free cities, ſubſiſted long after, as appears from the Theodoſian code [m] and digeſts [n]. But to clear up this difficulty, which has puzzled the beſt civilians, is not the province of an hiſtorian.

Declares all the ſubjects of the empire Roman citizens.

CARACALLA, finding himſelf generally hated at Rome, on account of his cruelties, reſolved to leave the city, and viſit, after the example of Adrian, all the provinces of the empire. Purſuant to this reſolution, having in the third year of his reign taken upon him his fourth conſulſhip, and named Decius Cælius Balbinus, afterwards emperor, for his colleague, he ſet out for Gaul, where he cauſed the proconſul of the province of Narbonne to be put to death, and made ſuch havock of the people, that he was more hated and abhorred there, than he had ever been at Rome. He did not even ſpare the phyſicians, who had taken care of him during a dangerous malady, with which he was ſeized; but, upon his recovery, cauſed them to be put to death [o]. In the beginning of the following year, when Meſſala and Sabinus were conſuls, he returned to Rome, bringing with him an incredible quantity of habits made after the Gauliſh faſhion,

His cruelties in Gaul.

[h] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 877. [i] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 755.
[k] Digeſt. 1. t. 5. l. xvii. [l] Chryſ. in act. apoſt. hom. xlviii.
[m] Cod. Th. 2. t. 21. p. 189, 190. l. iv. t. 9. l. iii. p. 370.
[n] Digeſt. 50. t. 15. l. i. p. 1921. &. l. viii. p. 1923. [o] Vit. Car. p. 87.

which he wore himſelf, diſtributed among the people, and would ſuffer none to wait upon him but in that dreſs. From this habit the emperor was nicknamed Caracalla, or Caracallus, for ſuch was its Gauliſh name [p]. Hence Scaliger derives, how rightly we leave the reader to judge, the word caſſock, the caracalla being a kind of caſſock. At Rome it was called Antoniniane from Antoninus, which was one of the emperor's name. His ſtay at Rome was very ſhort; for this very year the Catti, the Alemanni, whom we find now mentioned for the firſt time in hiſtory, and ſeveral other German nations, taking up arms, began to make inroads into the Roman dominions. The Alemanni, inhabited at this time the preſent duchy of Virtemberg, and were, as appears from their name, a mixed multitude of all the neighbouring nations [q]. They had entered into an alliance with the Catti, whom we have frequently mentioned in the foregoing reigns, and made daily incurſions into the Roman territories. Caracalla therefore marched againſt them, but in that expedition approved himſelf a better ſoldier than commander. For though he behaved with great courage, and even challenged the braveſt of the enemy to a ſingle combat; yet, for want of conduct, he was obliged to purchaſe a peace with vaſt ſums, and the liberty of retiring with ſafety into the Roman dominions [r]. Having aſked ſome women, whom he had taken in the countries of the Catti and Alemanni, which they choſe, to be ſold for ſlaves or put to death, they all preferred death to ſlavery. The emperor nevertheleſs ordered them to be ſold; but they all laid violent hands on themſelves, and ſome of them after having put to death their children [s]. It was no ſooner known in Germany, that he had bought a peace of the Catti and Alemanni, than all the nations inhabiting that extenſive country flew to arms, threatening him with deſtructive war, unleſs with them too he ſhared his treaſures; which he did accordingly, paying them yearly penſions, and by that means reducing himſelf to ſuch ſtreights, that he was obliged, as we have hinted above, to coin falſe money. When he received the deputies of the barbarians, he ſuffered no one to be preſent except the interpreters, whom he cauſed to be immediately put to death, leſt they ſhould divulge what had paſſed. However, the barbarians themſelves, Whence the name of Caracalla.

His expedition againſt the Catti and Alemanni.

[p] Dio, l. lxxvii p. 890. Spartian. p. 72. Euſeb. chron. p. 230. [q] Vide Vorburg. hiſt. Rom. Ger. p. 473. & Buch. Belg. l. vi. c. 7. [r] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 876. [s] Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 749, 750.

ſelves, when he was murdered, owned, that he had encouraged them to invade Italy, in caſe any misfortune ſhould befal him, and to march ſtrait to Rome, which, he ſaid, they might take with great eaſe [t]. During his ſtay in Germany, he cauſed Gaiobamarus, king of the Quadi, to be treacherouſly murdered; and having ordered all the youth of Noricum to take arms and join him, he commanded his troops, on what provocation we know not, to put them to the ſword [u]. For his pretended victories over the Alemanni, he took the title of Germanicus and Alemannicus [w].

THE following year, when Lætus was conſul, the ſecond time, with Cerealis, Caracalla, leaving Germany, led his army into Dacia, where he gained ſome ſmall advantages over the Getæ, and then purſued his march through Thrace to the Helleſpont, which he croſſed, not without danger of being ſhipwrecked; and arriving in Aſia, haſtened to Pergamus, hoping to be delivered by the god Æſculapius, worſhipped in that city, from all the maladies, ſays Herodian, both of his body and mind; but the god, continues that hiſtorian, was deaf to his prayers; ſo that he left Pergamus, after having enriched it with many privileges, as if he deſigned to bribe the deity, and purſued his journey to Ilium, where he viewed the remains of antient Troy, and viſited the tomb of Achilles, paying extraordinary honours to the memory of that hero, though an implacable enemy to the Trojans, from whom the Romans pretended to derive their origin. From Ilium he went to Nicomedia, where he ſpent the winter. In that city he invited Dion Caſſius to ſup with him, during the feaſt of Saturn; for he obliged moſt of the ſenators to attend him in all his journies, to defray his travelling charges, and to build in the cities, where he paſſed the winter, theatres, circuſes, and amphitheatres, for public ſports [x]. Hiſtorians obſerve, that, to gain the affections of the foreign nations, he dreſſed after the manner of the countries through which he paſſed: thus in Germany he aſſumed the German habit, and choſe ſuch of the German ſoldiers as were moſt ſtrong and active for his guard. When he entered Macedon, from a German he became a Macedonian in habit and behaviour. For pretending to be a great admirer of Alexander, he adopted, not only the habit in which that conqueror was repreſented, but his air and mien, affecting an awful and threatening coun-

He paſſes over into Aſia.

His levity.

[t] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 891. [u] Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 749, & 754. [w] Car. vit. p. 89. Goltz. p. 93. Birag. p. 293.
[x] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 883, 884.

tenance, and bending his head ſomewhat to one ſide. He ordered ſeveral ſtatues to be ſet up in Rome to the honour of that hero; and among the reſt, ſome with two faces, one reſembling Alexander, and the other himſelf. He ordered himſelf to be ſtiled Alexander, and Antoninus the Great, called a ſquadron of his army a phalanx, and gave to his officers the names of the commanders of Alexander. He had no ſooner entered Aſia, than he forgot Alexander, and ſtudied in all things to reſemble Achilles, whoſe tomb he had viſited. Thus he travelled, more like a player than an emperor, being the laughing ſtock of other nations, and the ſhame and diſgrace of his own. The following year, when C. Atius Sabinus was conſul, the ſecond time, with Cornelius Anullinus, Caracalla, leaving Nicomedia after the fourth of April, (for he celebrated his birth-day there) croſſed Bithynia, Aſia, and the other provinces on his journey to Antioch, in which city he was received with extraordinary pomp. During his ſtay there, he wrote to the ſenate, that he was well appriſed they did not approve of his conduct; but ſo long as he had an army at his command, he neither valued their reproaches, nor feared their hatred [y]. He was very deſirous of picking a quarrel with the Parthians, who were involved in a civil war, occaſioned by the ambition of the two ſons of the late king Vologeſes; but they complying with all his demands, he poſtponed his intended expedition againſt them, and bent his mind on the reduction of Oſrhoene and Armenia, though the kings of theſe two countries lived in perfect amity with the Romans. However, Caracalla, having invited them to Antioch, as friends and allies of the Roman people, cauſed them to be arreſted there, and impriſoned, without the leaſt colour or pretence for ſo doing. Hereupon Oſrhoene immediately ſubmitted, and was, according to ſome writers, reduced to a Roman province; though others maintain, that it was long after governed by its own princes [z]. All we know for certain is, that Caracalla eſtabliſhed a Roman colony at Edeſſa, the capital of Oſrhoene [a], and that, in the fourth century, the whole country was ſubject to the Romans. The Armenians, notwithſtanding the captivity of their king, made a vigorous reſiſtance; gave a total overthrow to Theocritus the comedian, who was ſent againſt them at the head of a numerous army; baffled all the efforts of Caracalla; and maintained themſelves

He treacherouſly ſeizes and impriſons the kings of Oſrhoene and Armenia.

[y] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 879. Herod. l. iv. p. 519. [z] Vide Spanh. l. ii. 86. & Syncel. p. 359. [a] Spanh. l. ix. p. 775.

themſelves in poſſeſſion of their antient liberties [b]. From Antioch the emperor proceeded to Alexandria, where he made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, being highly provoked againſt them for the many lampoons, which, agreeable to their ſatirical humour, they had publiſhed on occaſion of the death of Geta. He gave private order to his numerous troops, who were diſperſed all over the city, to fall upon the inhabitants in the night-time, to enter and pillage their houſes, and put all to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. His cruel orders were executed with ſuch barbarity, as can hardly be expreſſed; the whole city floated in blood; every houſe was filled with carcaſſes; and the return of the day diſcovered in every ſtreet the ſad monuments of the mighty butchery: but the tyrant, not yet ſatiated with blood, commanded the ſlaughter to be continued all the day following, that he might have the pleaſure of beholding it from the temple of Serapis, where he had paſſed the preceding night, imploring, during the general maſſacre, the protection of that deity. When the ſoldiers were tired with ſlaughter, Caracalla wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them, that he had revenged the affronts offered him by the Alexandrians; but that it was not neceſſary to ſpecify the number of the dead, nor their condition, ſince none had periſhed but ſuch as were guilty. Before he left the city, he ſtripped it of all its privileges; ſuppreſſed the celebrated aſſembly of learned men; ordered all ſtrangers who lived there to abandon the place; and that ſuch as had eſcaped the general maſſacre, who were very few, might not have the ſatisfaction of ſeeing one another, he cut off all communication of one ſtreet with another, by walls built for that purpoſe, and guarded by the troops he left there [c]. However, as the tyrant died ſoon after, Alexandria ſpeedily recovered its former ſplendor, and continued to be the firſt city of the empire after Rome.

Orders a general maſſacre at Alexandria.

FROM Alexandria, the emperor returned to Antioch, with a deſign to make war upon the Parthians, and by ſome memorable exploit, deſerve the ſurname of Parthicus, which he ſeems to have preferred to all others. In order to have ſome pretence for declaring war, he ſent an embaſſy to Artabanes with rich preſents, to deſire his daughter in marriage, not doubting, but the Parthian would deny him his requeſt; which happened accordingly, Artabanes alledging, that his daughter, brought up after the Parthian manner, could never be

His treachery towards the Parthians.

[b] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 875. [c] Herod. l. iv. p. 549. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 879, 880. Vit. Car. p. 87.

be reconciled to the cuſtom of the Romans [d]. Herodian writes, that Caracalla perſiſting in his demand, Artabanes at length complied with it; ſuffered him to enter his dominions; diſpatched orders to his governors to receive and entertain him every-where with the utmoſt magnificence; and went out himſelf in perſon to meet him, as he approached the royal city of Cteſiphon, where the nuptials were to be ſolemnized. Artabanes was attended by the chief nobility of the kingdom, and a numerous body of guards, all unarmed, and in their gayeſt attire. But Caracalla, abuſing the confidence they repoſed in him with a treachery hardly to be matched, gave the ſignal to his ſoldiers to fall upon them ſword in hand; which they did accordingly, and made a terrible ſlaughter of the unarmed multitude, expecting nothing leſs than ſuch a reception. However, the king had the good fortune to make his eſcape unhurt. After this exploit, worthy of ſuch an emperor as Caracalla, the cruel and perfidious monſter, enraged that Artabanes had eſcaped him, wrecked his fury on all the countries through which he paſſed on his return to Syria, leaving every-where diſmal monuments of his barbarous cruelty and inſatiable avarice [e]. Thus Herodian. But Dion Caſſius writes, that Caracalla, upon the Parthian king's refuſing him his daughter, entered his dominions, without any further declaration of war; ravaged great part of Media; deſtroyed ſeveral cities; took Arbela; and there demoliſhed the tombs of the Parthian monarchs, inſulting their remains in a moſt outrageous manner. The ſame writer adds, that as the irruption was ſudden and unexpected, he no where met with the leaſt oppoſition, or even ſaw the face of an enemy [f]. Spartian indeed ſpeaks of a tumultuary engagement between the Parthians and Romans, in which Caracalla let looſe wild beaſts againſt the enemy [g]. But with us his authority is of no weight, when claſhing with that of Dion Caſſius. The emperor returned from this memorable expedition to Edeſſa, whence he wrote boaſting letters to the ſenate, as if he had ſubdued the Parthians, and reduced all the eaſt. The ſenate, though informed of what had paſſed, yet decreed him a triumph, and the title of Parthicus, which above all he ſeemed to covet [h]. The following year, when C. Bruttius Præſens and T. Meſſius Extricatus were conſuls, a bloody doom at length overtook this man of blood. He had had often rallied as a coward, and threatened with death, Macrinus captain of the guards; beſides, about this time a ſoothſayer declared publicly in Africa, that Macrinus and his ſon Diadumenus were deſtined to the empire. Hereupon the ſoothſayer was immediately ſent to Rome, where he repeated and maintained the ſame thing before Maternianus, captain of the city-guards, whom the emperor, as he repoſed in him an entire confidence, had enjoined to employ all poſſible means, even the deteſtable myſteries of magic, in order to diſcover, whether any one privately aſpired at the empire. Maternianus therefore did not fail to write immediately to the emperor what he had learned of the ſoothſayer; but the letter being delivered to Julia, whom Caracalla had left at Antioch, with full power to open and read all his diſpatches, (for he himſelf was ſtill at Edeſſa, where he had paſſed the winter) Macrinus, who attended the emperor, was acquainted with the contents of it, before Julia could tranſmit it from Antioch to Edeſſa. This intelligence was conveyed to him by Ulpius Julianus his intimate friend, who delivered the letter to a courier diſpatched from Rome ſtrait to the court at Edeſſa [i]. Herodian writes, that a pacquet being brought to the emperor, while he was buſied in driving a chariot at the public ſhews, he ordered Macrinus to read the letters, and acquaint him with the contents of them afterwards; and that Macrinus found among the reſt the letter of Maternianus. Be that as it will, Macrinus was, as all authors agree, informed before the emperor of what Maternianus had wrote; and therefore being ſenſible, that he could not uſe too much diſpatch [k], he immediately gained with great promiſes two brothers, Aurelius Nemeſianus and Aurelius Apollinaris, both tribunes of the guards; Julius Martialis, an exempt, whom the emperor had provoked, by refuſing him the poſt of a centurion; Martius Agrippa the admiral; Rhætianus, tribune of the ſecond legion, and ſeveral others, who put their deſign in execution on the eighth of April of this year 217, while the emperor was going on horſe-back with a ſmall retinue from Edeſſa to viſit a temple of the moon at Carrhæ; for being obliged to ſtop by the way to eaſe nature, and all withdrawing except one of the prince's domeſtics, as he was ready to mount again, Martialis, loth to let ſlip that opportunity, ran haſtily to him, gave him with his dagger ſuch a ſtab in the throat, that he expired immediately, and returning to the reſt mixed with the croud, before they were appriſed of what had paſſed; but when the Macrinus conſpires againſt him.

Honoured by the ſenate with the title of Parthicus.

[d] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 896. [e] Herod. l. iv. p. 551—553.
[f] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 881. [g] Vit. Car. p. 87. [h] Dio. ibid. Herod. p. 553.

Caracalla murdered.

emperor's

[i] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 182. [k] Herod. ibid. p. 554.

emperor's death was publicly known, a Scythian, who belonged to the guards, obſerving Martialis with a bloody dagger in his hand, which, in that confuſion, he had not the precaution to conceal, and thence concluding him to be the author of the murder, ſhot him through with an arrow. Caracalla was killed after he had lived twenty-nine years and four months, and reigned ſix years, two months, and four days, from the death of his father [1] (O). The ſoldiers

[1] Dio, p. 891. Herod. p. 556.

(O) The authors who lived under Caracalla, were Q. Severus Sammonicus, who wrote a great number of books, which were much admired by Geta; and hence Sammonicus was by Caracalla's orders murdered, while he was at ſupper as a friend to Geta (81). None of his works have reached our times, except ſome books in Latin verſe on phyſic, and a few paſſages quoted by Macrobius out of a book in proſe, which he inſcribed to the emperor Severus (82). Voſſius is of opinion, that he publiſhed ſome hiſtorical pieces (83). His library conſiſted of ſixty-two thouſand volumes, which his ſon, who bore the ſame name, bequeathed to young Gordian, whoſe preceptor he had been (84). The emperor Alexander is ſaid to have taken great delight in reading the works of Horace and Serenus Sammonicus, with whom he had been acquainted (85); but this muſt have been the ſon. Ælius Maurus, whom Spartian quotes in relating the death of Severus (86), wrote in the reign of Caracalla, being then very old; for he had been a ſlave to Phlegon, the celebrated freed-man of the emperor Adrian (87). Voſſius ranks him among the Latin hiſtorians; becauſe Spartian does not ſay, that he wrote in Greek (88). Oppian the celebrated Greek poet, lived under Antoninus, the ſon of Domna; that is, under Caracalla, the ſon of Julia Domna, as he himſelf informs us (89), and not under Antoninus the Philoſopher, as we read in the chronicle of Euſebius and St. Jerom (90). He was a native of Anazarbus, a town of Cilicia, as appears from a ſhort account of his life, which is prefixed to his works (91). His father being baniſhed by Severus to the iſland of Malta, or to that of Meleda near Raguſa, Oppian accompanied him to the place of his exile, and there

(81) Car. vit. p. 86. & Get. vit. p. 92. (82) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 52. & Macrob. ſaturn. l. ii. c. 12. (83) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 2. (84) Gord. vit. p. 159. (85) Alex. vit. p. 124. (86) Vit. Sev. p. 71. (87) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 2. (88) Idem ibid. (89) Oppian. de venat. l. i. p. 129. (90) Euſeb. chron. p. 121, 122. (91) Oppian. vit.

diers immediately gathered about the body of the deceaſed prince, conveyed it to Edeſſa, and there proceeded, even before they had performed the funeral obſequies, to the election of a new emperor. They were in ſuſpenſe that and the two following days; but on the fourth, the eleventh of April and the birth-day of Severus, the prætorian guards, who were at Edeſſa, at the inſtigation of the tribunes, who had been privy to the conſpiracy of Macrinus, declared him emperor; for no one, except his accomplices, imagined him to have been-any-ways acceſſory to the death of Caracalla, which they aſcribed to Martialis alone, as if he had committed the murder out of private paſſion and revenge. Macrinus pretended at firſt to decline ſuch an heavy burden; but was eaſily prevailed upon to ſubmit to it; diſtributed on that occaſion large ſums amongſt the ſoldiery; made them ample promiſes; and granted a general pardon to all perſons accuſed of, or condemned there compoſed his poems, which he afterwards rehearſed at Rome, where they were received with extraordinary applauſe, and pleaſed the emperor Severus to ſuch a degree, that he recalled his father from baniſhment, and rewarded the poet with as many pieces of gold as there were verſes in his poem on the art of fiſhing; whence he uſed to call thoſe verſes, golden verſes (92). He inſcribed that poem to Antoninus, that is, to Caracalla, about the year 204, according to Scaliger, and the other on the chace to the ſame prince, after the death of his father Severus (93). The latter poem ought to conſiſt of five books as well as the former, though there are but four in the Paris edition of 1555, and in that of Plantin in 1597, both which editions are evidently imperfect. St. Jerom cries up the poem on the art of fiſhing as a wonderful performance (94). Scaliger ſtyles it a divine work; but Sozomenus, not ſo laviſh of his praiſes, calls it only an indifferent poem (95). We learn from his life, that beſides the two above-mentioned works, he compoſed ſeveral other admirable poems, as the anonymous author ſtyles them (96). He tells us himſelf, that he deſcribed in verſe the Parthian war, and the taking of Cteſiphon, no doubt by Severus. He is ſaid to have retired with his father to Anazarbus, their native city, and to have died there of the plague in the flower of his age, being but thirty years old (97). The inhabitants of Anazarbus, his countrymen, erected a ſtatue to him, with a pompous inſcription.

Opelius Macrinus declared emperor by the ſoldiery.

(92) Sozom. l. i. p. 394. (93) Oppian. de piſc. l. ii. p. 54. & de venat. l. i. p. 129. Euſeb. chron. p. 222. (94) Hier. chron. (95) Sozom. ibid. (96) Oppian. vit. (97) Ibid.

condemned for, crimes of majeſty or high treaſon [m]. Herodian writes, that the army firſt choſe Adventus, Macrinus's collegue in the command of the prætorian guards, who excuſed himſelf on account of his great age [n]. But, according to Dion Caſſius, Adventus only bragged, that, in regard to his ſeniority, he had a better right to the empire than Macrinus, declaring at the ſame time, that he willingly yielded it to him [o]. Adventus was an excellent commander; but altogether unqualified for a ſtateſman, exceeding old, no leſs meanly born than Macrinus, and illiterate to ſuch a degree, that he could not even read [p]. However, Macrinus created him ſenator, appointed him governor of Rome, and the following year choſe him for his collegue in the conſulſhip.

His birth and preferments.

As for the new emperor Opilius, or rather Opelius, Macrinus, he was a native of Cæſarea in Mauritania, now Algier, and of a very mean deſcent. We are told, that many things concerning his birth, his education, and firſt employments, were invented by his ſucceſſor Heliogabalus, and by his orders inſerted as true in his life. Hence, without taking notice of what we read in Julius Capitolinus, who was ſtrangely prejudiced againſt him, we ſhall chiefly follow Dion Caſſius, who flouriſhed under him, and ſeems quite free from all perſonal hatred and perſonal affection. According to that writer, he was a perſon of a moſt mild and humane temper, which gained him the affections both of the people and ſoldiery, and covered the meanneſs of his birth and firſt employments. He was pretty well verſed in the laws, which induced Plautianus to commit to him the care of his eſtate; that is, to appoint him his ſteward. Afterwards Severus charged him with the care of the poſts in Italy; but ſoon after baniſhed him, for what tranſgreſſion we know not, into Africa, where he ſupported himſelf with pleading cauſes of ſmall conſequence. He returned to Rome after the death of Severus, when Caracalla gave him an employment in the exchequer, in which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that the ſame prince named him to ſucceed the celebrated Papinian in the command of the prætorian guards. His chief province in that office was to decide cauſes with the emperor, or in his name; which he did with great equity, when Caracalla himſelf was not preſent [q]. He married one Nonia Celſa, a woman of a very indifferent character, and had by her a ſon, born born on the nineteenth of September of the year 208, and commonly called by the Latin hiſtorians Diadumenus; but by Dion Caſſius, by Herodian, and in moſt inſcriptions, Diadumenianus [r]. With the empire he took the names of Severus and Aurelius, which are ſtill to be ſeen on ſeveral of his medals [s]: but on none appears that of Antoninus; whence we conclude Capitolinus to have been miſtaken in giving him it. Before he left Edeſſa, he cauſed the body of Caracalla to be burnt with the uſual ſolemnity, and ſent his aſhes, incloſed in an urn, to his mother Julia at Antioch, who not caring to outlive him, eſpecially after Macrinus had ordered her to leave that city, on account of her bitter invectives againſt him, and her private intrigues, in order to ſeize the empire for herſelf, abſtained from all food, and died ſtarved. Her body was ſent to Rome, and depoſited in the tomb of Caius and Lucius Cæſars, the grandſons of Auguſtus, and from thence conveyed afterwards by her ſiſter Mela to the mauſoleum of Adrian [t]. Macrinus was no ſooner declared emperor, than he ſent for his ſon Diadumenus, who was then at Antioch. The ſoldiers who attended him, and were entirely addicted to Macrinus, gave him, purſuant to their private inſtructions, as it were of their own motion, the title of Cæſar; which, upon his arrival at Edeſſa, was confirmed to him by the whole army, his father giving on that occaſion another bounty to the ſoldiery. The new prince did not fail to acquaint the ſenate immediately with the death of Caracalla, and his acceſſion to the empire, by a letter, in which he ſpoke with great reſerve of the deceaſed emperor, neither commending nor diſcommending him: he only ſaid, that ſince the doom which he ſeemed to have deſerved had at length overtaken him, and the army had choſen him to command in his room, he would acknowledge himſelf indebted to the ſenate alone for the empire, if they thought fit to confirm that choice. Though the ſenate had heard before the news of the death of Caracalla, yet apprehending it to be only a falſe report, they had carefully concealed their ſentiments; but being now aſſured of the truth by Macrinus's letters, they loaded him with dreadful curſes; ordered all his gold and ſilver ſtatues to be melted down, his name to be eraſed out of all inſcriptions; annulled his acts, and declared his memory infamous, ſtyling him no longer Antoninus, but Baſſianus, Caracalla, and Tarantus, which was the name of a little

[m] Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 893—895. [n] Herod. l. iv. p. 535.
[o] Dio, p. 894. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Idem, l. lxxviii. p. 892, 893.

The death of Julia.

Diadumenus declared Cæſar.

The hatred of the ſenate to Caracalla.

[r] Idem, p. 888. Herod. p. 566. Goltz. p. 100. [s] Goltz. p. 95. [t] Dio, p. 899.

a little, deformed, and cruel gladiator [u]. They were ſo tranſported with joy in ſeeing themſelves delivered from the tyranny of Caracalla, that, overlooking the meanneſs of Macrinus's birth, they declared him emperor without the leaſt heſitation, heaping upon him all the honours, which they had ever conferred upon any prince. His family was ranked among the patrician families, his ſon proclaimed Cæſar, and his wife, Nonia Celſa, honoured with the title of Auguſta. In their anſwer to his letter, they earneſtly entreated him to puniſh, according to their deſerts, the miniſters of the late tyrant, and utterly to extirpate the whole tribe of informers. Macrinus complied in ſome degree with their requeſt; for he ſuffered them to condemn, not to death, but to baniſhment, three ſenators, and many others of an inferior rank, and ordered all the ſlaves and freed-men, who had informed againſt their maſters or patrons, to be crucified. The new emperor in the mean time, leaving Edeſſa, led his army to Antioch; and there, in the preſence of all his troops, gave his ſon the name of Antoninus, a name highly revered, and, in a manner, adored by the ſoldiery [w]. On this occaſion the whole army demanded with loud cries the deification of Caracalla; a demand which greatly ſurprized Macrinus, who nevertheleſs was in the end forced to comply with it, and command the ſenate to rank among the gods one, whom he himſelf had cauſed to be murdered, and who was deſervedly looked upon by all, except the ſoldiery, as a profeſſed foe to human race, a monſter gorged with blood, a parricide, and the moſt inhuman tyrant that could ever wear and diſgrace a diadem. The ſenate, purſuant to the emperor's orders, immediately decreed him divine honours, a temple, altars, prieſts, ſacrifices, and all the apparatus of divinity. The new emperor was even obliged to cauſe one Aurelianus to be condemned and executed, for having privately removed ſome of the deceaſed emperor's ſtatues [x]; ſo great was the authority which the army had, by degrees, uſurped both over the ſenate and prince.

Macrinus acknowledged emperor by the ſenate.

Caracalla deified.

The Parthian war.

WHILE theſe things paſſed at Antioch and Rome, Artabanes, king of the Parthians, having aſſembled a powerful army, advanced at the head of it, with a deſign to invade the Roman territories, and retaliate the injuries he had received. Macrinus, prompted partly by his natural timidity, (for he was not a man of courage) and partly by motives of juſtice and equity, endeavoured to appeaſe him, by ſending back all the priſoners priſoners taken by Caracalla, and with them embaſſadors to propoſe a peace, on terms equally honourable to both nations; but Artabanes declaring, that he would hearken to no propoſals, unleſs the Romans engaged, by way of preliminary, to rebuild all the cities they had deſtroyed, to give up Meſopotamia, and to pay an immenſe ſum, to be employed in repairing the tombs of the Parthian monarchs overturned by Caracalla, and making good the loſſes his ſubjects had ſuſtained by the late unjuſt invaſion. Macrinus, aſhamed to comply with ſuch high demands, took the field, and met the enemy in the neighbourhood of Niſibis [y]. Herodian tells us, that the battle which enſued laſted two whole days, night alone putting an end to the conteſt, and both parties challenging the victory. He adds, that the third day, the two armies, not being able to approach each other on account of the dead bodies, which formed a kind of wall between them, retired to their reſpective camps [z]. But Dion Caſſius writes, that the Romans, inured under Caracalla to an idle and effeminate life, were overcome in two engagements; inſomuch, that Macrinus, not daring to venture a third, ſent embaſſadors with rich preſents for Artabanes, and all the grandees of his court, and by that means obtained a peace, which coſt him, according to our hiſtorian, fifty millions of drachmas [a]. However, the ſenate decreed him the ſurname of Parthicus, which he accepted, as appears from ſome of his medals [b]; but declined the triumph which was decreed him at the ſame time [c]. As for the Armenians, whom Caracalla had likewiſe provoked, Macrinus appeaſed them, by reſtoring their king Tiridates to the throne, and to him thoſe lands which they had formerly poſſeſſed in Cappadocia [d]. Capitolinus ſpeaks of a war with the people of Arabia, in which Macrinus ſignalized his courage, and was attended with great ſucceſs [e]; but of this war no mention is made by any other hiſtorian. Macrinus, having thus concluded a peace both with the Parthians and Armenians, returned to Antioch; and there, by means of many excellent laws, endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to reform the abuſes which had prevailed in the reign of his predeceſſor. He declared all the reſcripts and deciſions of the emperors void and null, unleſs they were found agreeable to the antient and known laws of Rome, ſaying, It was a ſhameful thing, that the caprice of a Commodus or a Caracalla ſhould be

[u] Idem, p. 892. [w] Idem, p. 896. Herod. l. iv. p. 561.
[x] Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 892. Vit. Macr. p. 95.

The Romans defeated.

Macrinus concludes a peace with the Parthians and Armenians.

[y] Vit. Macr. p. 96. Dio, ibid. p. 890. [z] Herod. l. iv. p. 557. [a] Dio, ibid. p. 866. [b] Noris. de Dio, p. 19. [c] Dio, ibid. p. 900. [d] Idem, p. 887. [e] Vit. Macr. p. 95.

be held for laws. He puniſhed crimes with great ſeverity. When any perſons, of what rank ſoever, were convicted of adultery, he cauſed the delinquents to be tied together, and, thus tied, to be burnt alive. He obliged fugitive ſlaves to fight like gladiators: ſometimes he ordered criminals to be ſhut up and ſtarved to death. He puniſhed with death ſuch informers as could not make good their accuſations; when they did, they had the uſual reward, that is, the fourth part of the criminal's eſtate; whence they were called Quadruplatores; but at the ſame time Macrinus declared them infamous. He revived, according to Capitolinus, who betrays a ſtrange prejudice againſt him, the puniſhment of Mezentius, who is ſaid to have tied the living to the dead, that they might both putrify together. Hence the people, commending once in the circus the mild temper of his ſon Diadumenus, publicly repeated the verſe of Virgil in commendation of Lauſus the ſon of Mezentius; Dignus cui pater haud Mezentius eſſet, It was a pity he had a Mezentius for his father [f]. He took from the inhabitants of Pergamus all the privileges which had been lately granted them by Caracalla, and appointed Dion Caſſius the hiſtorian governor of that city and of Smyrna [g]. A conſpiracy being diſcovered againſt him, he puniſhed ſome of the authors of it; but pardoned Arbianus, Thuſcus, and Gellius, of whom the former is ſtyled duke of Armenia, and the two latter lieutenants of Aſia and Arabia; nay, he continued them in their employments, hoping to gain them by that means. We are told by Capitolinus, that Diadumenus wrote on this occaſion to his father, and likewiſe to the empreſs his mother, complaining of the indulgence which the emperor had ſhewn them, and begging that they might be executed without mercy [h] (P). But we can hardly perſuade ourſelves, that Diadu-

Macrinus's ſeverity againſt criminals.

An inſtance of his clemency.

[f] Vit. Macr. p. 96. [g] Dio, p. 897. [h] Diad. vit. p. 100.

(P) The letter which he is ſaid to have written to his father, was conceived in the following terms: "I cannot be ſilent on "the preſent occaſion, without being wanting to my duty. You "were ſurely quite unmindful of your own ſafety, when you "ſpared the authors of the late rebellion. Men, whoſe minds "are once exulcerated, will never be reclaimed by mercy; and "friends, when they once begin to hate, are of all enemies the "moſt cruel, the moſt implacable; beſides, they are ſtill in a condi-"tion to do miſchief, they have ſtill troops under their command:

Si

Diadumenus, then only nine or ten years old, was capable of writing ſuch letters.

WE have hitherto ſeen nothing in Macrinus blame-worthy: however, he was not without his faults; for, in the firſt place, as he himſelf was of a mean deſcent, he deprived of their employments thoſe who were nobly born, and raiſed to the higheſt poſts perſons of his own condition, though, generally ſpeaking, void of all merit. Thus he appointed Adventus, of whom we have ſpoken before, governor of Rome, and prince of the ſenate, even before he was a ſenator, though altogether unequal to that high poſt, being incapable of ſpeaking in public, and ſo illiterate, that he could not ſo much as read. He recalled from the government of Pannonia and Dacia Sabinus and Caſtinus, men of merit and diſtinction; and ſent Marcius Agrippa, a manumitted ſlave, formerly baniſhed by Severus for treaſonable practices, to ſucceed the former; and ſubſtituted Decius Tricianus, a man of no rank, in the room of the latter. In the ſoldiers he puniſhed the leaſt tranſgreſſion or neglect of duty with ſuch ſeverity, that, inſtead of Macrinus, he was called by them Macellinus, from the word macellum, ſignifying ſhambles. In the reign of Caracalla, they had been quartered in the cities, where they indulged themſelves with impunity in all manner of licentiouſneſs; but Macrinus obliged them to live under tents in the fields, and would not ſuffer them to approach or enter any city, in order to inure them to a regular and military life. This they could not endure, the more becauſe the emperor himſelf wallowed in pleaſures at Antioch, while they in the field often wanted neceſſaries. They therefore began to regret the loſs of Caracalla, Raiſes only perſons of a mean deſcent, and no merit.

He diſobliges the ſoldiers by his exceſſive ſeverity.

> Si te nulla movet tantarum gloria rerum,
> Aſcanium ſurgentem, & ſpes hæredis Iuli
> Reſpice, cui regnum Italiæ Romanaque tellus
> Debentur———————————

"You muſt put them to death, if you deſire to live in ſafety, "Your ſparing them will encourage others (ſuch is the perverſe-"neſs of mankind!) to follow their example." In his letter to his mother, he expreſſed himſelf thus. "The emperor my fa-"ther, by ſparing his enemies, ſhews that he neither loves you nor "himſelf: therefore exert your ſelf on this occaſion, and take care "they be executed; for tho' my father ſpares them, they will "not, when occaſion offers, ſpare us (98)".

(98) Vit. Diad. p. 100.

calla, to hate the very name of Macrinus, and publicly to reproach him with the meanneſs of his birth and former life. At the ſame time they were informed, that he had been the chief author of the murder of Caracalla; which incenſed them againſt him to ſuch a degree, that they only wanted a favourable opportunity to revolt from Macrinus, and appoint another emperor in his room; which they did accordingly the following year, when Macrinus and Adventus were conſuls. This revolution was brought about by the contrivance and artifices of Mæſa, ſiſter to the late empreſs Julia, a woman of great craft, dexterity, experience, and even courage. She had lived at court with her ſiſter during the reigns of Severus and Caracalla, and had acquired there great knowledge of affairs, and likewiſe immenſe wealth; which Macrinus ſuffered her to enjoy after the murder of Caracalla, but ordered her to quit the court, and retire to Emeſa in Phœnicia, her native city. She had two daughters, viz. Julia Soœmis, or Soœmias, and Julia Mamæa. Of theſe the latter had a ſon named Alexianus, and the former one called Varius Avitus Baſſianus. When Mæſa retired by Macrinus's orders to Emeſa, ſhe took her two grandſons with her, Avitus being then thirteen years old, and Alexianus only nine, and cauſed them both to be conſecrated to the ſun, the chief deity of the inhabitants of Emeſa, who had erected a ſtately temple to him, under the name of Eleagabalus. Baſſianus, the eldeſt of the two, was appointed pontiff of that deity, and thence called Eleagabalus, or as he is commonly ſtyled by hiſtorians, Heliogabalus [i]; for his name has occaſioned great diſputes among the learned. As the temple of the ſun was but at a ſmall diſtance from Macrinus's camp, the Roman ſoldiers, coming frequently to viſit the deity of the place, were mightily taken with the comelineſs of the young pontiff, who, in his perſon, was tall and genteel, well-ſhaped, and had ſomething in his air and looks extremely gracious and pleaſing. Mæſa, obſerving her grandſon thus admired by the ſoldiery, reſolved to improve the opportunity, giving out, that Heliogabalus was the ſon of Caracalla; that ſhe poſſeſſed immenſe treaſures, and would willingly enrich with them ſuch as ſhould eſpouſe the cauſe of the deceaſed emperor's ſon. The ſoldiers, who were encamped in the neighbourhood of Emeſa, believing Heliogabalus to be truly the ſon of Caracalla, and allured by the mighty promiſes of Mæſa, invited her with her grandſon to the

[i] Herod. l. v. p. 562. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 111. Macr. vit. p. 96.

the camp; and, upon their arrival, proclaimed Heliogabalus emperor, by the name of M. Aurelius Antoninus, and inveſted him with all the enſigns of ſovereignty [k]. Macrinus, who was then at Antioch, when informed of this revolt, inſtead of marching in perſon to quaſh it at once, as he might have eaſily done, contented himſelf with ſending Ulpius Julianus, one of the captains of the guards, with ſome troops, againſt them. Julianus attacked their camp with great reſolution, and might have made himſelf maſter of it the very firſt day, the ſoldiers under his command being moſtly Moors, and conſequently greatly attached to Macrinus their countryman; but Julianus checking their ardour, and putting off the aſſault to the next day, in hopes they would in the mean time ſubmit of their own accord, the beſieged raiſed new works during the night, ſuſtained the aſſault the next morning with great reſolution, and by ſhewing Heliogabalus on the ramparts, and with him the treaſures they had received from Mæſa, induced the Romans who were with Julianus, and highly diſſatiſfied with Macrinus, to murder their own officers and join them. Julianus betook himſelf to flight, and lay for ſome time concealed; but being at length diſcovered, one of the ſoldiers ſtruck off his head, and carried it to the emperor, wrapped up in a linen cloth, and ſealed with Julianus's own ſeal, pretending it to be the head of Heliogabalus; and made his eſcape while the emperor was unfolding it. Macrinus, perceiving whoſe head it was, and thence concluding, that he had been betrayed and defeated, haſtened to the camp of the Albanians; that is, of the ſoldiers who had their fixed quarters at Alba, and were then encamped in the neighbourhood of Apamea; acquainted them in a very injudicious ſpeech with the revolt of the troops near Emeſa; declared Heliogabalus, his couſin Alexianus, both their mothers, and their grandmother Mæſa, public enemies; and proclaimed his ſon Diadumenus Auguſtus, and his partner in the empire, promiſing on that occaſion to each ſoldier five thouſand drachmas, and paying them of that ſum one thouſand on the ſpot. At the ſame time, he wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the revolt of the troops and the promotion of his ſon, and enjoining them to promiſe to the people in his name one hundred and fifty drachmas a man. The ſenate, by whom Macrinus was greatly beloved, confirmed the title of Auguſtus to his ſon, and declared Heliogabalus a public enemy. From Apamea the emperor returned to Antioch, inſtead of marching without loſs of time againſt the rebels at Emeſa, which city was but at a ſmall diſtance. He was ſcarce gone, when the Albanians, and the other troops encamped in that neighbourhood, declared for Heliogabalus, who thereupon marched ſtrait to Antioch, to attack Macrinus, before he had time to aſſemble his other forces. The emperor, upon the news of his approach, marched out of Antioch at the head of the prætorian bands; and the two armies meeting on the confines of Syria and Phœnicia, a bloody engagement enſued, in which the troops of Heliogabalus, after a long and vigorous reſiſtance, began in the end to give ground; but were brought back to the charge by Mæſa, Soœmis, the mother of Heliogabalus, and by Heliogabalus himſelf, who ſignalized his valour on that occaſion in a very eminent manner. The fight being thus renewed with more fury than ever, Macrinus's men would have gained the day, according to Dion Caſſius, had they not been abandoned by their leader, who, as he was naturally timorous, betook himſelf to flight, when he ſaw the troops of Heliogabalus return to the charge. The prætorian guards kept their ground, even after his flight, till Heliogabalus aſſured them upon his oath, that they ſhould not be diſcharged, but ſhould enjoy under him all the privileges and exemptions which had been granted them by other emperors; then they declared for him, as the other troops had already done [1]. Macrinus retired to Antioch, and there giving out that he had gained a complete victory, ordered his ſon to ſhelter himſelf in the country of the Parthians; and, before the news of his defeat was publicly known, fled himſelf in diſguiſe, taking with him letters for thoſe who had care of the poſts, as if he had been ſent by the emperor upon ſome important affair that required diſpatch. Thus he croſſed undiſcovered the provinces of Cilicia, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Bithynia. To avoid Nicomedia, he embarqued at a port in the neighbourhood of that city, called Eribolus, with a deſign to go by ſea to Chalcedon, and from thence to croſs over to Byzantium; but being driven back by a contrary wind to Chalcedon, when he was upon the point of landing at Byzantium, he was there unfortunately taken ill, and diſcovered by thoſe whom Heliogabalus had ſent to purſue him. The ſoldiers, to whoſe cuſtody he was committed, put him into a chariot, in order to carry him to Heliogabalus; but he having thrown himſelf out of it, when he was informed that his ſon too had been taken, and by the fall broken his ſhoulder-bone, the Moſt of the troops revolt.

Heliogabalus is by ſome proclaimed emperor.

Julianus, ſent againſt him, is betrayed by his own men, and murdered.

[k] Dio, p. 902. Herod. p. 564. Vit. Macr. p. 96.

Macrinus abandons his men in an engagement, who join Heliogabalus.

[1] Dio, p. 889. Herod. l. v. p. 565.

the ſoldiers put an end to his pain and life, by cutting off his head, which they carried to Heliogabalus, who ordered it to be expoſed on the point of a ſpear to public view [m]. Such was the end of Macrinus, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, after he had reigned four months wanting three days; for we reckon his reign ended on the day of his defeat, which was the ſeventh of June of the year 218. His ſon Diadumenus was publicly executed by the new emperor's orders, as a common malefactor, and his head carried about, with that of his father, on the point of a ſpear. We are told, that ſome of the ſoldiers, conſidering his youth, (for he was but ten years old) were for ſaving him; but the letters, which he was ſuppoſed to have written againſt Arabianus and his accomplices, being produced, they conſented to his death. Baſilianus, governor of Egypt, and Marius Secundus, governor of Phœnicia, (for that province had at this time its peculiar governor) refuſed to acknowledge Heliogabalus, even after the death of Macrinus; which occaſioned ſeveral ſeditions in thoſe countries, in one of which great numbers of the people and ſoldiery were killed, and among the reſt Secundus himſelf. Baſilianus fled to Italy, and lay ſome time concealed in the neighbourhood of Brunduſium; but was in the end betrayed by one of his old friends, to whom he had written for ſome relief, and by Heliogabalus's orders executed at Nicomedia, where that prince paſſed the firſt winter after his acceſſion to the empire [n].

Both he and his ſon Diadumenus put to death.

HELIOGABALUS, immediately after the defeat and flight of Macrinus, entered Antioch, and from thence wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the defeat of Macrinus and his acceſſion to the empire, and promiſing to conform in every thing to the excellent inſtitutions of Auguſtus and M. Aurelius, and to do nothing without the advice and approbation of the ſenate, whoſe authority ſhould be ever ſacred to him. However, as he ſtyled himſelf Auguſtus the ſon of Antoninus, that is, of Caracalla, and the grandſon of Severus, and likewiſe aſſumed the proconſular and tribunitial power, and the titles of Happy and Pious, before they had been conferred upon him by the ſenate, his letter occaſioned a general conſternation in the city; nevertheleſs they confirmed to him all the titles he had aſſumed; declared Macrinus, tho' by them greatly beloved, a public enemy, and honoured both Mæſa and Soœmis with the title of Auguſtæ. Thus was Varius Avitus Baſſianus, commonly known in hiſtory by the name of Heliogabalus, gabalus, raiſed to the empire. He was the moſt profligate, impious, inhuman, effeminate, and prodigal tyrant that ever diſgraced a diadem. His grandmother Mæſa, who was a woman of great parts and experience, quite aſhamed of his ſcandalous and unaccountable conduct, ſtrove to the utmoſt of her power to keep him within ſome bounds; but he, utterly deſpiſing her, only hearkened to the wicked counſels of his mother Soœmis, and of ſuch as flattered him in his crimes. Hence he may be truly ſaid to have exceeded Nero himſelf in cruelty, Caligula in prodigality, and the moſt abandoned princes, who reigned either before or after him, in all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery. He did not reign full four years, and in that ſhort time married ſix wives. His firſt wife was Julia Cornelia Paula, a lady of an unblameable character, and ſprung from two of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome; but ſoon after divorced her, and ſtripped her of the title of Auguſta, and all the other honours he had conferred upon her. He then married Julia Aquilia Severa, a veſtal virgin, which was accounted by the Romans an enormous crime; but ſoon put her away to marry Annia Fauſtina, the grand-daughter of the emperor M. Aurelius, though already married to Pomponius Baſſus, whom he cauſed to be murdered. Fauſtina, and three others, whoſe names are unknown, were in a ſhort time obliged to give room to Aquilia Severa the veſtal, whom he admitted a-new to his bed, ſaying, That he hoped, as ſhe was a prieſteſs and he a prieſt, to have by her an offspring worthy of the immortal gods [o]. But his frequent marriages and divorces did not give ſo much offence as his ſcandalous

Heliogabalus acknowledged emperor by the ſenate.

[m] Dio, l. xxviii. p. 889. Herod. ibid. p. 566. Macr. vit. p. 96. [n] Dio, p. 905. Heliog. vit. p. 102.

His character.

His wives.

His monſtrous lewdneſs.

lewdneſs and unheard-of debaucheries. He turned the imperial palace into a brothel, filling it with ſuch numbers of proſtitutes, for the conveniency, he ſaid, of his friends and favourites, that it ſeemed a city, ſays Herodian, inhabited only by lewd women. With them and his debauched companions, he paſſed the greateſt part of his time, abandoning himſelf to the moſt ſcandalous and unnatural practices. He often aſſembled them in one of the halls of the palace, appeared among them in the apparel, and with the air of a proſtitute; encouraged them in formal harangues to lay aſide all modeſty, ſhake off all reſtraints, and make it their whole ſtudy to find out new methods of ſatisfying their luſtful appetities. In his ſpeeches he addreſſed them with the title of commilitones, fellow-ſoldiers; and truly they were the only ſoldiers worthy of ſuch a general

[o] Dio, l. lxxix. p. 911. Herod. p. 568.

ral. After ſome time he drove many of the debauched women out of the palace, and took catamites in their room; for he was himſelf of that infamous tribe, having been publicly married firſt to Aurelius Zoticus, one of his officers, and afterwards to Hierocles, a ſlave. He was not aſhamed to ſatisfy his infamous and unnatural luſts in public, in the face of the ſun and the whole Roman people, putting thereby out of countenance even the moſt profligate amongſt his debauched companions. But to dwell on ſuch abominable ſcenes of impurity is beneath the dignity of an hiſtorian, and only worthy of ſuch a biographer as Ælius Lampridius, who ſeems to take particular delight in deſcribing the unheard-of pollutions and abominations of this lewd monſter. His prodigality was as boundleſs as his luſt; for in the ſhort time of his reign he is ſaid to have reduced almoſt to beggary all the ſubjects of the empire, and to have left at his death the exchequer quite empty. He ſuffered nothing to appear at his table, but what was brought from the moſt diſtant countries at an immenſe charge. His palace, his chambers, and his beds were all furniſhed with cloth of gold. When he went abroad, all the way between his chamber and the palace where his chariot waited for him was ſtrewed with gold-duſt; for he thought it beneath him to tread upon the ground like other men. All his tables, cheſts, chairs, and ſuch veſſels as were deſtined for the meaneſt uſes, were of pure gold. Though his cloaths were exceeding coſtly, and beſet with jewels and precious ſtones, yet he is ſaid never to have worn one ſuit twice, nor ever to have put on again a ring which he had once uſed. He was conſtantly ſerved in gold-plate; but every night after ſupper diſtributed among his gueſts and attendants what had been made uſe of that day. He often diſtributed among the people and ſoldiery, not corn only and money, as other emperors had done, but gold and ſilver-plate, jewels, precious ſtones, and tickets entitling them to immenſe ſums, which were immediately paid. He cauſed his fiſh-ponds to be filled with water diſtilled from roſes, and the naumachia, where ſea-fights were exhibited, with wine. His rooms, tables, couches, and galleries where he walked, were daily ſtrewed with roſes, lillies, and all ſorts of flowers. His banquets and entertainments were expenſive almoſt beyond belief, his favourite diſhes being tongues of peacocks and nightingales, and the brains of parrots and pheaſants. He fed his dogs with the livers of geeſe, his horſes with raiſins, and his lions and other wild beaſts with partridges and pheaſants. In ſhort, the whole wealth of the Roman empire was ſcarce ſufficient, ſays Herodian, rodian, to ſupply the extravagance of one man [p]. As for his unheard-of follies, we refer our readers to Lampridius, who relates them at length, not thinking them worthy of a place in our hiſtory.

His prodigality.

To give ſome account of this ſtrange reign, according to the order of time; Heliogabalus, before he left Syria, commanded ſeveral perſons, both in the eaſt and at Rome, to be put to death; and among the reſt, Julianus Neſtor, captain of the guards under Macrinus; Fabius Agrippinus, governor of Syria; Reanus, governor of Arabia; Claudius Attalus, who had governed Thrace in the year 194, and was then governor of Cyprus; and Decius Triccianus, who commanded in Pannonia [q]. From Syria, the new emperor marched to Nicomedia in Bithynia, where he paſſed the winter, and gave many freſh inſtances of his cruel and inhuman temper, cauſing, beſides many others, one Gannys to be murdered for adviſing him in a friendly manner to abandon his former vices, and behave like a Roman emperor. Gannys was one of Mæſa's domeſtics, but favoured to ſuch a degree by Heliogabalus, on account of his fidelity, and the zeal he had ſhewn in his cauſe, that he deſigned to marry his mother to him, and declare him Cæſar. However, his finding fault with his vices provoked him to ſuch a degree, that he ordered him to be put to death upon the ſpot, and gave him with his own hand the firſt blow [r]. In the beginning of the following year, Heliogabalus entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, having for his collegue one Sacerdos, of whom we find no farther mention in hiſtory. Early in the ſpring, the new emperor ſet out for Rome, where he was received both by the people and ſenate with great demonſtrations of joy, though no one doubted but he would prove a ſecond Nero or Caligula. The next day he went to the ſenate; and taking with him his grand-mother, placed her next to the conſuls, ordered her name to be ſet down among thoſe of the other ſenators, and appointed, that ſhe ſhould vote as the reſt, and be conſulted in all matters of importance. For his mother Socœmis he inſtituted a ſenate, conſiſting only of women, and declared her their head or preſident. The ſubject of their conſultations, debates, and decrees, were the dreſs and apparel of the Roman matrons, their ranks and dignities, their viſits, ceremonies, and other important matters of the like nature [s]. The emperor himſelf Cauſes ſeveral perſons of diſtinction to be murdered.

He ranks his grandmother among the ſenators, and inſtitutes a ſenate of women.

[p] Herod p. 569. Vit. Heliog. p. 102. [q] Dio, l. lxxix. 894. [r] Idem, in excerpt. Val. p. 761, 762. [s] Heliog. vit. p. 102, 105, 106.

himſelf was not employed in matters of greater moment, being wholly taken up in eſtabliſhing at Rome the worſhip of his god Heliogabalus, or, as he is ſtyled on the medals of this prince, Eleagabalus. He erected a magnificent temple to him, worſhipped him with ceremonies never before practiſed at Rome, preferred him to Jupiter himſelf, and to all the other gods of the Romans, who, he ſaid, were but the ſervants of his god; and declared, that he would ſuffer no other god to be adored, at Rome or elſewhere, but Eleagabalus. In order to this, he profaned all other temples, ſtripped them of their ornaments, and attempted to convey into the temple of his own god the perpetual fire of Veſta, the ſtatue of Cybele, the bucklers of Mars, the palladium brought from Troy, as was ſuppoſed, by Æneas, and whatever was looked upon by the Romans as moſt ſacred. From Carthage he ordered the goddeſs Cæleſtis to be brought to Rome, and with her all the rich ornaments belonging to her temple; married her to Eleagabalus, and cauſed the nuptials of the two deities to be celebrated with great pomp and ſolemnity [t]. Dion Caſſius tells us, that, in honour of his god, he abſtained from hogs-fleſh, and cauſed himſelf to be circumciſed [u]; and Herodian, that he erected another magnificent temple for him in the country, whither he conveyed him every year in the beginning of the ſummer. The ſame author adds, that, beſides many other victims, he ſacrificed children to him, moſtly ſprung from illuſtrious families, and privately ſnatched up by the miniſters of his cruelty, diſperſed all over Italy for that purpoſe [w]. Dion Caſſius obſerves, that he cauſed ſeveral illuſtrious perſons to be inhumanly murdered this year; and among the reſt, Seius Carus, Valerianus Pætus, Silius Meſſala, and Pomponius Baſſus, all ſenators of great diſtinction, for no other crime, but becauſe he believed they diſliked his conduct [x].

Eſtabliſhes the worſhip of the god Eleagabalus.

THE following year, Heliogabalus entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having for his collegue Eutychianus, an imperial freedman, and a celebrated buffoon; whence he was furnamed Comazon, which, in the Greek tongue, ſignifies waggiſh, or gay. He had greatly contributed to the riſe of Heliogabalus; for at his inſtigation the troops near Emeſa had declared for him; on which account the new emperor immediately declared him captain of the guards, and conferred upon him the conſular ornaments. This year he honoured him with [t] Heliog. vit. p. 102, 103. Herod. l. v. p. 568. Dio. l. lxxix. p. 912. [u] Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 762. [w] Herod., ibid. Heliog. vit. p. 103. [x] Dio, p. 908, 909.

with the conſular dignity; and, when his conſulſhip expired, appointed him governor of Rome [y]. The next year, when Gratus Sabinianus and Seleucus were conſuls, Mæſa, foreſeeing that the Romans could not longer bear with ſuch a prince as Heliogabalus, prevailed upon him to adopt his couſin Alexianus, and declare him Cæſar, though at that time only twelve, or, at moſt, thirteen years old. The ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp; and the young prince on that occaſion took the names of Alexander and Severus, the former from the king of Macedon, and the latter from the emperor, his ſuppoſed grandfather [z], Heliogabalus treated him at firſt in a very friendly and obliging manner, hoping to draw him over to his lewd courſes; but finding that the excellent youth could not by any means be induced to follow his example, and that he was more beloved both by the people and ſoldiery than himſelf, he began to repent his having adopted him, and gave private orders to thoſe, who were truſted with the care of his education, to diſpatch him. But all their attempts being rendered abortive, by the care and circumſpection of Mamæa, mother to the young prince, and of his grandmother Mæſa, who betrayed all the emperor's ſecrets, Heliogabalus, tranſported with rage, ordered the ſenate to degrade Alexianus from the dignity of Cæſar, and annul the late adoption. At the ſame time, he diſpatched aſſaſſins to murder him; and retiring to an old palace on mount Eſquilin, waited there till news was brought him of his death. But in the mean time, the prætorian guards, appriſed of the danger that threatened the young prince, flew to the palace, and would have put the emperor himſelf to death, had he not ſoftened them with mighty promiſes, abandoned to them all his debauched companions, and ſuch as were deemed enemies to Alexander; and ſolemnly declared, that he deſigned for the future to lead a quite different life, and to redreſs all the grievances, of which, he ſaid, they had but too much reaſon to complain [a]. The next year, he took upon him his third conſulſhip; and pretending to be reconciled to Alexander, choſe him for his collegue; but being determined at all events, notwithſtanding his late proteſtations, to rid himſelf of ſo troubleſome a rival, in the firſt place, he ordered all the ſenators to quit the city, leſt they ſhould thwart his deſigns; and then cauſing Alexander Alexianus adopted and created Cæſar.

Heliogabalus repents his adopting him, and attempts to deſtroy him.

[y] Dio, p. 888. [z] Herod. l. v. p. 570. Dio, l. lxxix. p. 914.
[a] Dio, p. 915. Herod. ibid. Heliogab. vit. p. 106.

der to be ſhut up in the palace, gave out, that he was all of a ſudden taken ill, and almoſt paſt recovery. This report he ſpread abroad on purpoſe to diſcover the diſpoſition of the ſoldiery, who no ſooner heard it, than they flew to arms, and demanded to ſee Alexander. The young prince was accordingly brought forth to them, and by the emperor himſelf conducted to the camp, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy, while no one took the leaſt notice of Heliogabalus; which provoked the tyrant to ſuch a degree, that he ordered thoſe, who had applauded Alexander, to be puniſhed as traitors. But the reſt, reſcuing them out of the hands of the executioners, began to croud about the emperor, uttering dreadful menaces; which ſo terrified him, that he attempted to ſave himſelf by flight, thoſe who had attended him to the camp endeavouring to diſperſe the multitude. Hereupon a quarrel enſued between the partizans of the two princes, in which thoſe who favoured Heliogabalus were ſoon defeated and cut in pieces, with Hierocles, that prince's chief favourite, the captains of the guards, and all the miniſters who attended him. The emperor himſelf withdrew, during the conteſt, into the moſt filthy place of the camp, and conſequently the moſt worthy of him; where he was ſoon diſcovered, and murdered by the enraged ſoldiery, together with his mother Soœmis, who had retired thither with him, and held him the whole time in her arms. Both their heads were ſtruck off; and after their bodies had been ignominiouſly dragged through the city, and moſt outrageouſly inſulted by the populace, that of Heliogabulus was, with a great weight faſtened to it, thrown from the Æmilian bridge into the Tiber [b]. Such was the deſerved end of Heliogabalus, the moſt wicked and debauched of all the Roman emperors, in the eighteenth year of his age, after he had reigned three years, nine months, and four days, from the ſeventh of June, of the year 218, on which day he defeated Macrinus, to the eleventh of March of the year 222, when he met with his deſerved doom. The ſenate cauſed the name of Antoninus, which he had aſſumed and diſgraced with his lewd life, to be eraſed out of the public regiſters, and all inſcriptions; and paſſed a decree, excluding for ever women from the ſenate, and loading with curſes ſuch as ſhould for the future attempt to tranſgreſs it [c].

The ſoldiers mutiny.

Heliogabalus and his mother Soœmis murdered.

UPON the death of Heliogabalus, his couſin Alexander, then in the fourteenth year of his age, was proclaimed emperor peror by the ſoldiery, and conducted from the camp to the ſenate, where he was received with all poſſible demonſtrations of joy, and honoured with the titles of Auguſtus, of father of his country, and all the other marks of diſtinction peculiar to the imperial dignity. At the ſame time, they offered him the name of Antoninus, and the ſurname of Great; but he modeſtly declined them both. He was the ſon of Julia Mamæa, or Mammæa, of whom we have ſpoken above, and of Geneſius Marcianus, a Syrian. He was a native of the city of Arca, in Phœnicia, and born there, according to Lampridius [d], in a temple conſecrated to Alexander the Great; whence, upon his being adopted by Heliogabalus, he took the name of Alexander. His former name was Baſſianus, according to Dion Caſſius; but according to Herodian, Alexianus, his grandfather's name. His father dying when he was very young, his mother brought him up with great care; for Julia Mamæa is thought by many writers of great note to have been inſtructed in the truths of the goſpel, and to have embraced the chriſtian religion: at leaſt, Euſebius ſtyles her a very pious and religious woman [f]; epithets which we can hardly perſuade ourſelves a chriſtian biſhop would have beſtowed upon a pagan. While ſhe was at Antioch, in the year 218, hearing Origen greatly commended on account of his knowledge in religious matters, ſhe ſhewed a great deſire to ſee him, ſent for him from Alexandria, received him with great joy, and kept him ſome time with her [g]. It is not improbable, that ſhe was by him convinced of the truth, and embraced it. Be that as it will, ſhe brought up her ſon with extraordinary care, employing only ſuch perſons to inſtruct him as were equally renowned for their probity and learning, and allowing no one to come near him, whom ſhe ſuſpected capable of corrupting his morals. He applied himſelf, from his infancy, to the ſtudy of the Greek and Latin tongues, and was as well verſed in the former as any man of his age; but his improvement in the latter was not ſo great, as appeared from his ſpeeches to the ſenate, to the ſoldiery, and to the people [h]: neither did he admire the Latin eloquence ſo much as the Greek. He was well ſkilled in all the other branches of polite learning, and, beſides, in the arts of painting, ſinging, playing upon inſtruments, &c. From his infancy,

Alexander declared emperor.

[b] Herod. p. 573. Heliog. vit. p. 106. [c] Heliog. vit. p. 107.

His birth and education.

His mother Julia Mamæa.

[d] Vit. Alex. p. 114. [e] Vide Oroſ. l. vii. c. 18. Cedren t. i. p. 256. Abulfar. p. 80. Vinc. Lerin. c. 23. [f] Euſeb. l. vi. c. 21. [g] Idem ibid. [h] Vit. Alex. p. 115.

fancy, he gave innumerable inſtances of a moſt mild, humane, and generous temper; ſhewed an utter averſion to bloodſhed and all manner of cruelty; and made it his chief ſtudy to pleaſe and oblige, not only his parents and relations, but even his domeſtics. As he paid an entire deference to his mother Mamæa and grandmother Mæſa, both women of great experience and extraordinary parts, at their motion, he choſe, as ſoon as he was raiſed to the empire, ſixteen ſenators for his council, all men of known probity, and long verſed in public affairs, tranſacting nothing without their advice, and conſtantly conforming to it. Among theſe were, Fabius Sabinus, generally ſtyled the Cato of his time; Domitius Ulpianus and Julius Paulus, two celebrated civilians; Antoninus Gordianus, afterwards emperor; Catilius Severus, Alexander's kinſman, and one of the moſt learned perſons of his age; Ælius Serenianus, a man of extraordinary integrity; and Quintilius Marcellus, a great admirer of the cuſtoms and manners of the antient Romans [i]. The deference he paid to his mother was ſo great, that Herodian reckons it among his faults; for though he was himſelf a man of extraordinary talents, of ſuch diſcernment and penetration, ſays Lampridius, that no one ever deceived him, yet he conſtantly preferred her opinion to his own [k]. He gave her name to ſeveral buildings, which they ſtill retained in the end of the fourth century [l]; and cauſed her to be honoured with the titles of Auguſta, or mother of her country, of the armies, and of the ſenate, which had been formerly conferred on Julia, the wife of Severus [m]. As Mamæa profeſſed, in all likelihood the chriſtian religion, no wonder that Alexander ſhewed great favour to the chriſtians, and would not ſuffer them to be any-ways moleſted on account of their religion. Euſebius tells us, that his court was filled with chriſtians [n]; and Lampridius, that in his private oratory he worſhipped Chriſt and Abraham, and would have cauſed temples to be erected to the founder of the chriſtian religion, had he not been diverted from it by the anſwers of the oracles, aſſuring him, that if he ever ſuffered Chriſt to be ranked among the gods, all the other temples would be ſoon abandoned and the gods neglected [o]. He ſeems to have been well acquainted with the morals of the chriſtian religion; for he had conſtantly in his mouth that golden rule,

His counſellors.

Alexander favours the chriſtians.

Do

[i] Alex. vit. p. 241. [k] Herod. l. vi. p. 575. [l] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 372. [m] Spon. p. 194. [n] Euſeb. l. vi. c. 28. [o] Alex. vit. p. 124, 139.

Do as you would be done by; cauſed it to be ſet up over the gates of his palace, and on ſeveral public edifices, and obſerved it himſelf, if the writers of his life may be credited, with the greateſt exactneſs [p]. For he made it his chief ſtudy to oblige all men, and is ſaid never to have wronged any. During the firſt year of his reign, he was wholly taken up in reforming the many enormous abuſes, which had prevailed in the court under his predeceſſor. With this view he baniſhed all the freed-men, ſlaves, eunuchs, players, and buffoons, who had borne any ſway in the late reign; and choſe in their rooms perſons of blameleſs characters, and known integrity. Having by this means reformed the court, he made a ſtrict enquiry into the manners and conduct of the public officers, eſpecially of the governors of provinces, and diſcharged moſt of thoſe who had been employed by Heliogabalus. Such of them as had oppreſſed the people committed to their care, were baniſhed; and the reſt reduced to their former condition, as perſons altogether unfit for any public office [q]. The next year, when L. Marius Maximus and L. Roſcius Ælianus were conſuls, the emperor's nuptials were celebrated with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. He married Sulpicia Memmia, the daughter of Sulpicius a conſular, and grand-daughter of Catulus. As the whole empire enjoyed at this time a profound peace, nothing remarkable happened either at Rome, or in the provinces, in the two following years; in the firſt of which Julianus and Criſpinus were conſuls, and in the ſecond Fuſcus and Dexter. But the fourth year of Alexander's reign, and during his ſecond conſulſhip, in which he had Quintilius Marcellus for his col-

Diſcharges of the miniſters of the late emperor.

The Perſian empire re-eſtabliſhed.

legue, Artaxerxes having utterly ruined the Parthian, and re-eſtabliſhed the Perſian, empire, of which great revolution we have ſpoken elſewhere, advanced at the head of a mighty army againſt the Romans, with a deſign to recover Meſopotamia and the other provinces, which had formerly belonged to the Perſian empire. His approach occaſioned great conſternation in Syria; and many of the Romans quartered in Meſopotamia, abandoning the caſtles which they garriſoned, liſted in his army; ſo that he might with great eaſe have over-run, not only Meſopotamia, but likewiſe Syria, had he not attacked on his march the city of Atra, before which place he loſt ſuch numbers of his men, without being able to reduce it, that, dropping for the preſent his expedition againſt the Romans, he thought it adviſeable to march back into into his own country, after having ravaged great part of Media, and made ſome unſucceſsful attempts upon Armenia [r]. The next conſuls were Albinus and Maximus; during whoſe adminiſtration nothing happened which authors have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity: but the following conſulſhip of Modeſtus and Probus was remarkable for the death of the celebrated civilian Domitius Ulpianus, who being appointed by Alexander captain of the prætorian guards, and endeavouring to eſtabliſh among them the antient diſcipline, provoked their hatred to ſuch a degree, that, after having in vain ſolicited Alexander to remove him, they at length murdered him in the emperor's preſence. The chief authors of his death were puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, and the moſt factious among the guards ignominiouſly diſcharged. In the room of Ulpian, the emperor choſe one Decimus, and Julius Paulus, a native of Padua, who had been baniſhed by Heliogabalus, on account of his great probity, and was perhaps as ſkilled in the laws as Ulpian [s]. This year ſeveral tumults happened at Rome and in the provinces. The troops quartered in Meſopotamia revolted, murdered their general Flavius Heracleo, and went in great numbers over to the Perſians [t]. The troops in Syria proclaimed one Taurinus emperor, who, as they had conferred that honour upon him againſt his will, made his eſcape; and being purſued by the mutinous ſoldiery, threw himſelf into the Euphrates, and was drowned [u]. Zoſimus and Syncellus ſpeak of one Uranus, who, having uſurped the empire at Edeſſa in Oſrhoene, was defeated by the troops that remained faithful to Alexander. At Rome the prætorian guards attempted to raiſe one Antoninus to the empire; but he declining that burden, withdrew into the country, and never afterwards appeared in the city [w]. But Ovinius Camillus, a ſenator, ſprung from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, ſtudying to gain the affections of the ſoldiery, in order to raiſe himſelf, by their means to the empire, Alexander was no ſooner informed of his private practices, than he ſent for him to court, and thanked him for offering to take upon him ſo great a burden, ſtyled him his collegue, took him with him to the ſenate, allotted him an apartment in the palace, cauſed him to be attired in a far more pompous habit than his own, and treated him in every reſpect as his partner in the empire. As a war broke out at this

[p] Idem, p. 132. [q] Idem ibid.

The death of Ulpian.

The ſoldiers mutiny in ſeveral provinces.

Ovinius Camillus aſpiring at the empire, how treated by Alexander.

[r] Dio, l. lxxx. p. 918. & in excerpt. Val. p. 769. Herod. l. vi. p. 176. [s] Vit. Alex. p. 122. [t] Dio, l. lxxx p. 917, 918. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Syncell. p. 357. Zoſ. p. 639.

this time, which required the emperor's preſence, Alexander offered the command of the army to Camillus; but he, declining it, the emperor deſired he would at leaſt ſhare with him the fatigues and the glory of that expedition. Accordingly they both ſet out from Rome on foot; but Camillus, who was not enured to a military life, being tired after five miles march, Alexander begged he would purſue his journey on horſeback; which he did for two days, when the emperor, perceiving he could no longer bear even that fatigue, ordered a chariot to be provided for him; which proved ſo great a mortification to Camillus, that he begged leave to reſign the empire, and return home; which Alexander readily granted, aſſuring him before they parted, that he might live in ſafety where he pleaſed. Camillus retired to his country-ſeat, and there lived unmoleſted, during the reign of Alexander; but was put to death by ſome of his ſucceſſors, for what crime we are no-where told [x]. The expedition which Alexander is ſaid to have undertaken this year, was probably againſt the Germans; for it appears from ſome antient inſcriptions, that great advantages were gained over them this year, the ſeventh of the emperor's reign [y]; and Lampridius tells us, that the Germans were overcome by Varius Macrinus, governor of Illyricum [z]. The ſame year, Furius Celſus ſignalized himſelf in Mauritania Tingitana, and Junius Palmatus in Armenia, and were both rewarded with the conſular ornaments [a].

THE following year, Alexander entered upon his third conſulſhip, having Dion Caſſius, the ſecond time conſul, for his collegue. Dion was in the beginning of this reign in Aſia; whence he paſſed into Bithynia, his native country, with a deſign to ſtay ſome time with his friends and relations; but he was ſoon ſent into Africa, to govern that province, with the character of proconſul. Upon his return to Rome, he was appointed governor of Illyricum, and from thence removed into Upper Pannonia, where he revived the antient military diſcipline among the troops, puniſhing the leaſt neglect of duty with the utmoſt ſeverity; inſomuch that the prætorian guards, who dreaded his rigor, upon a report, that he was recalled to command them, no ſooner ſaw him appear in Rome, than they began to mutiny, and preſs the emperor to put him to death. But Alexander, without hearkening hearkening to their unjuſt demand, heaped many honours upon him, often appeared with him in public, and took him this year for his collegue in the conſulſhip: however, fearing the ſoldiers might offer him ſome inſult, if he appeared in Rome with the enſigns of the conſular dignity, he adviſed him to retire from the city, and paſs the time of his conſulſhip in the country, which he did accordingly. Soon after he obtained leave to withdraw into his own country, where he ſpent the remaining part of his life in quiet and retirement [b]. It will not be foreign to our purpoſe to inſert here the account which that writer gives us of the ſtate of the Roman legions at this time, and of the provinces where they were quartered. There were in the time of Auguſtus twenty-five legions, of which only nineteen were now remaining, the other ſix having been either diſbanded, or incorporated into ſome of thoſe that ſtill remained. On the other hand, Nero, Galba, Veſpaſian, Domitian, Trajan, M. Aurelius, and Severus, raiſed thirteen new ones; ſo that the legions at this time were in all thirty-two. Of theſe, three were quartered in Britain, two in Upper, and two in Lower, Germany, one in Italy, one in Spain, one in Numidia, one in Arabia, two in Paleſtine, one in Phœnicia, two in Syria, two in Meſopotamia, two in Cappadocia, two in Lower, and two in Upper, Mœſia, one in Noricum, one in Rhœtia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia [c]. Our author does not inform us where the two remaining legions were quartered, nor how many men each of them contained; but Lampridius ſeems to inſinuate, that each legion conſiſted of five thouſand men [d]. From this diſtribution of the legions it appears, that the Romans at this time looked upon the Caledonians, the Parthians, or rather Perſians, and the nations beyond the Danube, as their moſt formidable enemies, and were not ſo apprehenſive of any invaſion on the ſide of Germany, as they had been in former times; for now there were but three legions in that country, whereas in the reigns of Auguſtus and Tiberius, the banks of the Rhine had been guarded by no fewer than eight legions, which were deemed the main ſtrength of the empire [e]. This year Alexander, who did not ſpare his greateſt friends, when manifeſtly convicted of abuſing the confidence he repoſed in them, cauſed Vetronius Turinus, one of his chief favourites, to be put to death for a crime of that nature. The emperor had a particular ticular eſteem and kindneſs for Turinus, and often conſulted him in private, as he was a man of extraordinary abilities, about affairs of the greateſt importance. This honour and deference, which the emperor ſeemed to pay to him, the crafty courtier reſolved to turn to his own advantage, and accordingly gave out, that Alexander tranſacted nothing without his advice; that he had gained an abſolute ſway over him; and that it was in his power to raiſe whom he pleaſed to the firſt employments in the empire. By this means he accumulated immenſe wealth in a ſhort time, all who wanted any favour or preferment, recurring to Turinus, whoſe intereſt was not to be gained without rich preſents. He often did not ſo much as mention to the emperor the perſons whom he pretended to recommend; but nevertheleſs, when they happened to obtain, by means of others, what they demanded, he aſſumed the whole merit of it to himſelf, and exacted a proportionable acknowledgment, which in thoſe days was called ſelling ſmoke. The emperor, who was a man of great penetration, began to ſuſpect his favourite of ſuch practices; and therefore a perſon, in whom he could confide, ſoliciting him one day for a favour, he told him he would grant him his requeſt, provided he privately addreſſed Turinus, as if he wanted his recommendation. Turinus, glad of this opportunity, promiſed to employ all his intereſt in his behalf, and ſoon after told him, that he had already recommended him to the emperor, who, he was ſure, would grant him the deſired favour the very firſt time he had an opportunity of recommending him a-new, which he hoped would be very ſoon. He added, that he deſerved to be rewarded for his trouble; and the petitioner referring that to his diſcretion, he not only exacted a large ſum for what he pretended to have done, but obliged him to promiſe, in the preſence of witneſſes, a far more conſiderable one, to be paid as ſoon as he obtained his requeſt. The emperor, who was informed of the whole, immediately granted the favour; which Turinus no ſooner knew, than he obliged his client, tho' he had never once mentioned his name to the emperor, to make good his word and pay the promiſed ſum, pretending, that by his means alone he had obtained what he deſired. Hereupon Alexander cauſed a diligent enquiry to be made into his former conduct, when it appeared, that he had received large ſums, not only from thoſe who had obtained any preferment, but from ſuch too as had had law-ſuits, and often from both parties; which ſo provoked the emperor, that he accuſed him to the ſenate who ſentenced him to death; and the ſentence was put in execution ecution in the following manner: The criminal was, by the emperor's orders, tied to a gibbet, and suffocated with the smoke of green wood and wet stubble, kindled round him, the public crier in the mean time proclaiming, He who sold smoke, dies with smoke [f]. The following year, L. Virius Agricola and Sex. Catius Clementinus being consuls, the emperor retired into Campania, and there spent this and the following year, when Pompeianus and Pelignianus were consuls [g]. The next consuls were Lupus and Maximus; during whose administration, Artaxerxes, the restorer of the Persian monarchy, having reduced all the neighbouring countries, unexpectedly invaded the Roman dominions at the head of a mighty army, ravaged Mesopotamia, and advanced to the very confines of Syria. Hereupon Alexander, following the advice of his council, dispatched embassadors with a letter to that conqueror, exhorting him not to engage the two empires in a long and dangerous war, without provocation, and putting him in mind of the victories gained over the eastern nations by Augustus, Trajan, L. Verus, and Severus. But Artaxerxes, puffed up with his late successes, despised the remonstrances of Alexander, and pursued his ravages in Mesopotamia, laid siege to Nisibis, and entering Cappadocia, destroyed all with fire and sword. Hereupon the emperor resolved to march against him in person; and accordingly, to the great grief both of the senate and people, left Rome in the spring of this year 232, the eleventh of his reign; and bending his march through Illyricum, where he was joined by the troops quartered in that province, arrived at Antioch about the beginning of the autumn; whence he sent a second embassy to Artaxerxes, hoping that his presence would add some weight to the reasons formerly alledged. But the haughty Persian, deriding the peaceable temper of the Roman emperor, chose four hundred of the tallest men in his army, and sent them, well mounted, and richly apparelled and armed, in quality of embassadors, to acquaint the Romans and their emperor, that the great monarch Artaxerxes ordered them to retire forthwith from Syria and Asia, and all the countries between the Euphrates and the Ægean sea, which had formerly belonged to the Persians. Alexander heard their message with great temper, and then caused the embassadors to be stript of their rich armour and apparel, and sent under a guard to Phrygia, where he allotted them houses and lands to cultivate [h]. After

Dion Caſſius hated by the ſoldiery on account of his ſeverity.

[x] Vit. Alex. p. 130, 131. Not. Caſaub. p. 172. & Salmaſ. p 230. [y] Birag. p. 323. [z] Vit. Alex. p. 134. [a] Idem ibid.

The number of the Roman legions.

[b] Dio, l. lxxx. p. 918. [c] Dio, l. lv. p. 645. [d] Alex. vit. p. 131. [e] Tacit. annal. iv. c. 5.

Vetronius Turinus abuſes the confidence placed in him by the emperor.

How punished by the emperor.

Artaxerxes invades the Roman dominions.

Alexander hastens to Antioch.

Haughty embassy of the Persian monarch.

[f] Alex. vit. p. 124, 125. [g] Noris. epist. consul. p. 146. Birag. p. 313. [h] Herod. l. vi. p. 579.

Alexander prepares for war.

this he began to prepare for war in good earneſt, ordered the legions quartered in the different provinces of the eaſt to join him with all poſſible expedition, cauſed a great number of warlike engines to be got ready, and diſpatched officers into all parts to raiſe new levies. In imitation of Alexander the Great, whoſe name he bore, and for whom he had a particular veneration, he armed ſome companies of foot with ſhields covered with gold and ſilver, and formed ſix legions into a body of thirty thouſand men, which he called his phalanx. Theſe diſtinguiſhed themſelves, during the war, in a very eminent manner, and were, when it was ended, rewarded for their ſervices with double pay [i]. Lampridius tells us, that the emperor being informed, ſoon after his arrival at Antioch, that ſome of his ſoldiers were gone to Daphne, and there bathed with the lewd women of that diſſolute place, he immediately ordered them to be arreſted and laid in irons.

A legion mutinies.

Hereupon the whole legion, to which they belonged, beginning to mutiny, Alexander went out to them, and, without betraying the leaſt fear, told them, that as the antient diſcipline was the main and only ſupport of the empire, he was reſolved to maintain at all events, and puniſh with the utmoſt ſeverity, nay, with death, thoſe diſorders and debaucheries which had been allowed in the late reign. At theſe words, the whole legion began to utter their rage in horrible cries; but Alexander, with an air of authority, Silence, ſaid he, I command ſilence; keep theſe clamours to terrify the Perſians, the Sarmatians, and the Germans: you have learnt of thoſe, who taught you the art of war, that you are to frighten the enemy with that ſavage noiſe, and not your emperor, who, at the expence of his people, maintains, cloathes, and pays you. Forbear therefore theſe unſeaſonable clamours, which are only fit for battle, leſt I diſband you all, or inflict upon you a more ſevere puniſhment. Hereupon the uproar encreaſing,

The intrepidity of Alexander.

and ſome of the boldeſt even menacing him with their ſwords; Reſerve your menaces, ſaid he, for the enemy; them you may frighten, but not me, who deſpiſe your impotent rage: ſhould you murder me, the republic will not be at a loſs to find me a ſucceſſor, who will puniſh you according to your deſerts. As the mutiny ſtill continued, he cried out with a loud voice, I diſband you all; citizens, lay down your arms and be gone. With theſe words the whole legion was thunder-ſtruck; they obeyed, quitted their arms, laid down even their military garments, and retired in ſilence, while the emperor's emperor's guards took up their ſtandards, and carried them, together with the arms of the diſbanded legion, to the camp. However, before the emperor ſet out againſt the Perſians, he reſtored them, upon the interceſſion of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, to their former rank, after having puniſhed with death their tribunes, for having ſuffered the ſoldiers under their command to tranſgreſs with impunity the military laws, and for neglecting to ſuppreſs the tumult [k]. This legion ſignalized themſelves above the reſt in the Perſian war, and ſhewed more concern for the death of Alexander than any other [l].

[i] Alex. vit. p. 131.

AT length Alexander took the field at the head of a numerous army, obſerving in all his marches and motions ſuch order and diſcipline, that his camp ſeemed a well governed city, his ſoldiers citizens, and his officers ſo many ſenators [m]. He puniſhed with great ſeverity ſuch as offered the leaſt injury to any of the inhabitants of the countries through which he marched. One of his ſoldiers having injured an old woman, he not only diſbanded him, but obliged him to maintain her, as her ſlave, with his labour ſo long as ſhe lived. Others he puniſhed for very ſmall offences with death, cauſing the public crier to repeat during the execution, Do as you would be done by. It was death for any officer, of what rank ſoever, to detain the leaſt part of his ſoldiers pay or allowances. But notwithſtanding his great ſeverity, no emperor was ever more beloved both by the officers and ſoldiers, as no one ever rewarded them with more generoſity, when they complied with their duty; took more care of them when ſick or wounded; or ſupplied them on all occaſions more plentifully with proviſions. He kept conſtantly in his cabinet certain regiſters, in which were marked the names of all the officers and ſoldiers, the provinces where they were quartered, the time of their ſervice, the dates of their commiſſions, the names of the perſons at whoſe recommendation they had been preferred, their exploits, if they had performed any, their good and evil qualities, &c. Theſe regiſters he frequently peruſed, and by that means became acquainted with moſt of the officers and ſoldiers of his different armies, often mentioned their names, and preferred only perſons of merit [n]. When they were ſick, he viſited them in their tents, even the common ſoldiers, ſupplied them with chariots, and ſuffered them to want nothing that could any-ways relieve or com-

Marches againſt the Perſians:

His care of the military diſcipline, and of the ſoldiery.

[k] Vit. Alex. p. 133. [l] Idem. p. 136. [m] Idem. p. 130.
[n] Idem, p. 120, 121.

fort them in their ſickneſs. If they were not in a condition to purſue their march, he recommended them to the care of perſons of known integrity and good-nature, whom he rewarded with great generoſity for their trouble, whether the ſoldiers died or recovered [o]. He was always ready to hearken to the complaints of the meaneſt in the army againſt their tribunes and other officers, puniſhing them, when guilty, according to the quality of their crime, without any favour or diſtinction [p]. He frequently diſtributed large ſums among them, aſcribing chiefly to their poverty the diſorders they committed. They were all ſo well clad and armed, ſays Lampridius, and the cavalry ſo well mounted, that nothing gave a more true idea of the grandeur of the Roman empire, than the army of Alexander Severus [q]. In his marches he cauſed proviſions to be got ready before-hand at the ſeveral places where the army was to encamp; whereas before his time each ſoldier uſed to carry with him ſubſiſtence for ſeventeen days. In the enemy's country, where he could not uſe that precaution, he cauſed the neceſſary proviſions to be carried on horſes, mules, and camels; which gained him the affections of the ſoldiery, and at the ſame time rendered his marches ſo quick and expeditious, that he is ſaid in moſt of his wars to have ſurpriſed the enemy [r]. In his garb and dreſs he little varied from the common ſoldiers, and his diet was the ſame with theirs. He conſtantly dined and ſupped in public with his tent open, in the ſight of the whole army, and viſited, before he withdrew to repoſe, each quarter in the camp.

He is both feared and beloved by the ſoldiery.

Thus, partly with a ſeaſonable ſeverity, partly with his affable and obliging behaviour, he re-eſtabliſhed the antient diſcipline among the troops, which had been entirely neglected in the reign of Heliogabalus; and gained, by his firmneſs and intrepidity, ſuch an authority over them, as to diſband whole legions; which no emperor had offered to do ſince the time of Julius Cæſar [s]. With an army thus diſciplined, the emperor marched early in the ſpring of this year 233, againſt Artaxerxes, who, fluſhed with his former ſucceſſes, would hearken to no terms, however reaſonable; but advanced towards the frontiers of the Roman dominions at the head of an army conſiſting of an innumerable multitude of foot, and one hundred and thirty thouſand horſe, with eighteen hundred chariots armed with ſcythes, and ſeven hundred elephants bearing towers on their backs, filled with archers, after the Perſian manner.

[o] Idem, p. 130. [p] Idem, p. 119, 121. [q] Idem, p. 132. [r] Idem, p. 134. [s] Idem, p. 117.

manner [t]. Of this war Herodian gives us the following account: Alexander, having divided his army into three bodies, ordered one to enter Media, another to march into the country of the Parthians, and led himself the third, which consisted of the flower of the army, at an equal distance from the other two. They were all to meet at an appointed place; but Alexander, either through want of courage, or yielding to the entreaties and tears of his mother, instead of pursuing his march and entering the enemy's country, halted in Mesopotamia; so that the body which had marched through the country of the Parthians were entirely cut off, while they waited the arrival of the emperor at the appointed place, and the other obliged to retire, and repass in the depth of winter the mountains of Armenia, in which painful march great numbers of them died either with cold or hunger. The body which Alexander commanded was greatly diminished by sickness, and the emperor himself was seized with a dangerous malady, which almost brought him to the point of death [u]. Others write, that Alexander was betrayed by some of his own people, and obliged to save himself and his army by flight. But most historians assure us, that he gained a complete victory over the Persians; and Lampridius quotes the very words of Alexander to the senate on that occasion. According to him, the emperor entered the enemy's country, without so much as acquainting before-hand his officers with the rout he intended to take. He was soon met by Artaxerxes, at the head of the most numerous army that had ever been seen in those parts; whereupon a battle ensuing, the emperor distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, encouraging the soldiers more by his example than by words; exposed himself to the enemy's darts and arrows like a common soldier; visited, during the engagement, both the wings of his army; flew through the ranks; and, in short, discharged every duty of a valiant soldier and experienced commander [w]. The numerous army of Artaxerxes was utterly routed, and that conqueror obliged, notwithstanding his former victories and conquests, to save himself by a shameful flight. The particulars of this engagement we may learn from Alexander himself, who, on his return to Rome, gave the senate an account of this memorable expedition in the following speech: "Conscript fa"thers, we have overcome the Persians, and there is no need
"of great eloquence to acquaint you with the particulars of "this

The success of his expedition against the Parthians.

His speech to the senate.

[t] Idem, p. 133. Herodian, l. vi. p. 580. [u] Herod. ibid.
[w] Vit. Alex. p. 130, 131.

" this victory. The enemy came with ſeven hundred ele" phants, the greateſt number ever ſeen together in the field.
" Theſe carried towers on their backs, filled with archers " and arrows. Three hundred of the elephants we took,
" two hundred we killed upon the ſpot, and eighteen we " brought hither with us. They had eighteen hundred cha" riots armed with ſcythes, of which we took two hundred.
" We have cut in pieces an army of one hundred and twen" ty thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand men armed cap-a-pé,
" with whoſe ſpoils we have enriched our troops. We took a " great number of priſoners whom we have ſold. The coun" try of Meſopotamia, lying between the Tigris and the Eu" phrates, which my predeceſſor Heliogabalus had neglected,
" we have reconquered, and brought again under ſubjection.
" We have put the moſt potent king Artaxerxes, as he is " ſtyled, to flight; the country of Perſia beheld him flying
" for the firſt time. In the place where the Romans
" formerly loſt their enſigns and ſtandards, the Perſians have " now loſt theirs. You ſee, conſcript fathers, what we " have atchieved; the ſubject needs no eloquence to adorn
" or ſet it out; the army is returned rich, and loaded with " booty. It is incumbent upon you to appoint public thankſ-" givings for ſo ſignal a victory, that we may not ſeem un-
" grateful to the gods, who have bleſſed our arms with ſuch
" ſucceſs [x]." This ſpeech, Lampridius aſſures us, he copied out of the journals of the ſenate, and found it, word for word, in the works of many hiſtorians; and therefore he cannot conceive how Herodian could write, that Alexander loſt his army by famine, cold, and ſickneſs; which, he ſays, is contradicting all the records, memoirs, and hiſtories of thoſe times. Julius Capitolinus tells us, that Herodian hated Alexander, and therefore gave an unfaithful and detracting account of his Perſian expedition [y]. However, he is followed by Zonaras [z] and Cedrenus [a]. But Aurelius Victor, Feſtus, Eutropius, St. Jerom, and Syncellus, abandon him in this particular, and follow Lampridius. All the oriental hiſtorians write, that Alexander was utterly defeated, and obliged to purchaſe a peace, by yielding to the Perſians all the countries lying between the Euphrates and the frontiers of Paleſtine [b].
But, after all, Lampridius relates ſo many particulars of this victory, and appeals with ſuch confidence to the journals of the ſenate and the hiſtorians of thoſe times, that we cannot help

Diſagreement amongſt authors about the ſucceſs of this expedition.

[x] Idem ibid. [y] Vit. Maxim. p. 143. [z] Zonar, p. 225.
[a] Cedren, p. 256. [b] Kein. epiſt. xlviii. p. 438.

help preferring his authority to that of the oriental hiſtorians, and of Herodian himſelf. After this victory Alexander returned to Antioch, with a deſign to purſue the war with freſh vigor the following year, but in the mean while, being informed, that the Germans had invaded the Roman dominions, and at the ſame time that Artaxerxes had diſbanded great part of his army for want of proviſions, he reſolved to quit the eaſt and return to Rome, apprehending greater evils from the Germans than from the Perſians. Accordingly, having erected ſeveral forts in Meſopotamia, and left numerous garriſons to defend them, he ſet out from Antioch in the ſpring of the following year, when Maximus and Urbanus were conſuls; and arriving ſafe at Rome, was there received by perſons of all ranks with the greateſt demonſtration of joy imaginable. He entered the city in triumph, his chariot being drawn, not by four white horſes, as was uſual, but by four of the elephants which he had taken [c]. When the ceremony was over, he went to the ſenate, where he made the ſpeech we have related above. From the ſenate he repaired to the capitol, and there conſecrated ſome of the Perſian ſpoils to Jupiter Capitolinus. Then turning to the people, I have overcome the Perſians, ſaid he, and the army is returned loaded with booty. I promiſe you a largeſs, and propoſe to exhibit to-morrow the Circenſian ſports. From the capitol he marched to the palace on foot, followed by his triumphal chariot, and attended by the ſenate, the equeſtrian order, and ſuch crowds of people, all crying, Rome is ſafe, while Alexander is ſafe, that with much-ado he reached the palace in four hours. The next day, he exhibited the Circenſian ſports, gave the promiſed largeſs, and, in honour of his mother, eſtabliſhed a fund for the maintenance of the children of the poor citizens, who were thence called the children of Mamæa [d].

Alexander returns to Rome, and triumphs.

In the mean time, news being brought to Rome, that the Germans and other northern nations had paſſed the Rhine and the Danube in great numbers, the emperor, to the inexpreſſible grief of the ſenate and people, left the city, and haſtened with his victorious army into Gaul, to ſtem this furious torrent. We are told, that a woman, by profeſſion a Druid, meeting him on his march, cried out to him in her language, You may go; but hope not for victory, nor truſt your own ſoldiers. The hiſtorian does not inform us whether or no Alexander heard and underſtood her; but he aſſures us, that that Alexander feared neither death, nor the omens that were thought to preſage it, whereof he gives us the following inſtance: A celebrated aſtrologer, by name Thraſybulus, the emperor's particular friend, having one day told him, that his fate was to fall by the hand of a barbarian, he was tranſported with joy, not doubting, but he ſhould die in the field, which, he ſaid, was a death worthy of an emperor, obſerving to the aſtrologer, that many great men had ended their days by a violent death, and naming among the reſt Alexander the Great, Pompey, Julius Cæſar, Demoſthenes, and Cicero [e]. In the beginning of the following year, when Severus and Quinctianus were conſuls, Alexander advanced with his army to the banks of the Rhine; but finding the enemy had repaſſed that river upon the news of his approach, he ordered a bridge to be built over it, with a deſign to attack them in their own country, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would allow him to take the field [f]. Herodian who always paints Alexander as a weak and timorous prince, tells us, that he ſent embaſſadors to the Germans with propoſals of peace, which he even offered to purchaſe at any rate; and adds, that during the time of this ſhameful negotiation, he diverted himſelf with driving chariots, and ſuch-like unprincely exerciſes; which provoked the ſoldiers, and occaſioned his ruin [g]. But Lampridius clears the emperor from theſe ill-natured aſperſions, and aſcribes the diſcontent of the ſoldiery, that is, of the legions quartered in Gaul, to their licentiouſneſs, and to the ſeverity of Alexander, which they could not endure, after having been, under Heliogabalus, long inured to idleneſs and all manner of debauchery. Among theſe troops was one Maximinus, by nation a Goth, whom Alexander, in regard of his valour, had preferred to the command of a body of Pannonians; but he, unmindful of his duty and of the obligations he owed to the emperor, inſtead of attempting to appeaſe the licentious and diſcontented ſoldiery, fomented underhand the tumult, and, by his ſeditious ſpeeches, inſpired the multitude with contempt for Alexander, as one who was governed by a woman, meaning Mamæa, and conſequently unfit for carrying on the war with vigor [h]. The emperor was then either at Mentz or Sicilia, which moſt geographers take to be the preſent village of Siclingen in the neighbourhood of Mentz, or that of Ober-Weſel on the Rhine, in the territory of Treves, between Boppart and Bingen. As Alexander

He leaves Rome to march againſt the Germans.

[c] Alex. vit. p. 135. Feſt. p. 553. [d] Vit. Alex. p. 133, 134.

Who retire at his approach.

The Gauliſh legions complain of the ſeverity of Alexander.

[e] Idem, p. 135, 136. [f] Idem, p. 137. [g] Herod. l. vi. p. 585, 589. [h] Idem, ibid.

ander had but a ſmall body of troops with him, Maximinus reſolved to lay hold of that opportunity, and to diſpatch him, not doubting, but the troops under his command, whom he had gained with mighty promiſes, would, upon the death of that prince, proclaim him emperor. He imparted his deſign to ſome of the moſt bold and reſolute among his men, who animated with the hopes of great preferments, readily engaged to put it in execution, and immediately ſet out for the place where the emperor then was, which they contrived to reach about an hour after mid-day, when thoſe who attended the emperor were withdrawn to refreſh themſelves, according to the Roman cuſtom, with a ſhort ſleep after dinner. They no ſooner appeared, than the few ſoldiers who were upon guard betook themſelves to flight, having probably been gained over before-hand by Maximinus. Mamæa, alarmed at the unexpected noiſe and tumult, ran out, attended by the captains of the guards, to appeaſe it; but the aſſaſſins, having firſt murdered both her and them, entered with their drawn ſwords the emperor's tent, who, as he was unarmed and left quite alone, threw his imperial mantle over his face, and received, without uttering a ſingle word, the many blows with which they diſpatched him, deriding him the whole time as a child unfit to be at the head of an army, and inveighing againſt his mother, as one whoſe only care was to amaſs riches [b]. Such was the unfortunate and undeſerved end of Alexander Severus, after he had lived, according to the moſt probable opinion, twenty-ſix years, five months, and nineteen days, and reigned thirteen years and nine days. The loſs of no prince was ever more regretted by the ſenate, the people, and the ſoldiery, than that of Alexander, who, by his wiſe adminiſtration, had gained the affections of all ranks of men. The ſenate immediately decreed both to him and to his mother Mamæa divine honours, appointed them altars, prieſts, and ſacrifices, and inſtituted, in honour of the deceaſed emperor, an annual feaſt, which was ſtill kept in the time of Conſtantine the Great, on the firſt of October, Alexander's birth-day [c]. The ſoldiers were no ſooner appriſed of his death, than they put to the ſword all thoſe who had been any-ways acceſſory to it, except the chief author of it, Maximinus, who, by perſuading the ſoldiery that he had no hand in the murder, eſcaped for the preſent the deſerved puniſhment. Alexander was, according to the teſtimony of all

They are encouraged by Maximinus.

Alexander is aſſaſſinated.

His character.

[b] Idem, p. 135. Vict. epit. Zoſ. l. i. p. 639. Herod. l. vi. p. 587. [c] Alex. vit. p. 136.

all the antients, Herodian alone excepted, one of the beſt and wiſeſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre, and would, had he lived longer, have entirely reformed thoſe abuſes, which, after his death, involved the empire in endleſs calamities. He was ſparing of the public money, liberal of his own, kind and generous to all good men; but an irreconcileable enemy to the wicked, eſpecially to ſuch as were convicted of having plundered the provinces, and oppreſſed the people committed to their care. Theſe he never ſpared, though his friends, favourites, and kinſmen; but ſentenced them to death, and cauſed them to be executed, notwithſtanding their quality or former ſervices, like common malefactors. Eucolpius the hiſtorian, one of Alexander's chief favourites, tells us, as quoted by Lampridius [d], that he could not even bear the ſight of ſuch public robbers; inſomuch, that one Septimius Arabinus, who had been tried for that crime, but acquitted by favour of Heliogabalus, coming one day with other ſenators to wait upon the emperor, Alexander, on ſeeing him, cried out in a violent paſſion, O ye immortal gods! is Arabinus ſtill alive, and a ſenator! Does he even preſume to appear in my preſence! Surely he takes me to be as wicked as himſelf! After this, he cauſed it to be proclaimed by the public crier, that if any one guilty of the ſame crime ever preſumed to appear in his preſence, he ſhould immediately receive his deſerved puniſhment, notwithſtanding the pardon granted him by his predeceſſor [e]. He uſed to ſay, that it was not a ſufficient puniſhment to deprive corrupt magiſtrates and governors of their places; but that, as the truſt repoſed in them was great, they ought to pay for the breach of it with their lives. He baniſhed one of his ſecretaries for giving to his council in writing a falſe account of an affair, and cauſed the ſinews of his fingers to be cut, that he might never write after. One of his ſlaves, convicted of having received a bribe, he cauſed to be crucified on the road which led from the city to the villa, where he frequently reſided, that by the ſight of the body, which was left on the croſs, his other ſlaves might be deterred from the like practices [f]. He never pardoned any crime committed againſt the public; but ſuffered no one to be condemned, till his cauſe was thoroughly heard, and his offence evidently proved. The firſt thing he did after his acceſſion to the empire was, to diſcharge all the officers, miniſters, and governors employed by Heliogabalus, and appoint in their room perſons of known probity.

His hatred to thoſe who robbed the public.

[d] Alex. vit. p. 119. [e] Idem, ibid. [f] Idem, p. 124.

probity. He retrenched all the penſions which that prodigal prince had ſettled on his freedmen, on buffoons, ſtage-players, charioteers, gladiators, &c. ſaying, that the emperor was but the ſteward of the people, and therefore could not, without the utmoſt injuſtice, thus wantonly ſquander away their revenues upon perſons no-ways uſeful to them. No prince ever paid greater deference to the ſenate than Alexander. He was the firſt emperor who allowed the ſenators to ſit when they came to wait upon him. He appointed no governors or magiſtrates without adviſing with them, and never failed to prefer ſuch as they recommended to him. He admitted none into the ſenate without the concurrence and approbation of all the members of that venerable body, aſking the opinion of each in particular, and examining with great ſtrictneſs into the manners and former conduct of the perſon who was to be admitted. If upon this enquiry he was found unworthy of a place in the ſenate, ſuch of the ſenators as had recommended him, were themſelves degraded, and ſuch as had given teſtimony of his probity, condemned, as in caſes of perjury, to loſe their eſtates, and baniſhed for ever. He never admitted either freed-men or their children to the equeſtrian order, which he uſed to call the nurſery of the ſenate. He appointed, that the captains of the guards ſhould no longer be choſen out of the equeſtrian, but only out of the ſenatorial, order; that no one ſhould have the power of judging a ſenator, but who was himſelf a ſenator; for the captains of the guards had been long the ordinary judges of the ſenators in caſes of treaſon [g]. Thus by degrees the captains became the moſt powerful officers in the ſtate, and their office more conſiderable than even that of the conſuls, which in the end ruined the authority of the ſenate. In the adminiſtration of juſtice Alexander never took upon him to decide any law-ſuit, without conſulting his council, which conſiſted of the moſt learned civilians in Rome, whom he obliged to give their opinions in writing, after having allowed them time to examine and weigh matters at their leiſure, that they might not pronounce ſentence without due premeditation. Thus were all matters of juſtice determined by perſons of known integrity, and well ſkilled in the laws. In military affairs he conſulted only ſuch perſons as had acquired experience by their long ſervice, and were well acquainted with the ſituation of places, or men verſed in hiſtory, enquiring of them what had at any time been done on the like occaſions by his predeceſſors

His deference to the ſenate.

He beſtows the office of captain of the guards only on ſenators.

Impartial in the adminiſtration of juſtice.

[g] Idem. p. 120.

Prefers only perſons of merit.

deceſſors or other great captains. He is ſaid never to have given any public office out of favour or friendſhip; but to have employed ſuch only as were both by himſelf and the ſenate judged the beſt qualified for the diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in them. He preferred one to the command of the guards, who had retired into the country on purpoſe to avoid that office, ſaying, that with him the declining of ſuch honourable employments was the beſt recommendation to them. He would not ſuffer any employments to be ſold, ſaying, He who buys, muſt ſell in his turn; and it would be unjuſt to puniſh one for ſelling, after he has been ſuffered to buy. In appointing governors of provinces he obſerved a commendable cuſtom, which was to publiſh their names, and encourage all perſons to declare, either in public or private, whether they had any thing to lay to their charge: Since Jews and Chriſtians, ſaid he on this occaſion, uſe ſuch commendable methods in the choice of their prieſts, it is reaſonable we ſhould proceed with the like care in the choice of rectors of provinces, who are entruſted with the lives and fortunes of ſo many perſons. As he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe who betrayed their truſt, ſo he rewarded with great generoſity ſuch as had anſwered the good opinion he entertained of them, and either raiſed them to employments of greater profit, or, if they choſe to retire, preſented them with houſes and lands, ſaying, that ſince corrupt governors enriched themſelves at the expence of the people, good governors ought to be enriched at the expence of the prince [h]. He was an utter enemy to all pomp and ſhew, and extremely modeſt in his apparel, telling thoſe who found fault with him on that account, that a prince ought to be diſtinguiſhed from the reſt, not by his apparel, but by his gallantry and virtuous actions. The rich preſents ſent him by foreign princes he beſtowed on the temples; but ſold all the jewels, employing the money accruing from them to the relief of the poor citizens. The embaſſadors of an eaſtern prince having preſented the empreſs with two pearls of an extraordinary ſize, Alexander ordered them to be ſold; but no one being found rich enough to purchaſe them, he conſecrated them to ſerve as pendents to a ſtatue of Venus, that the empreſs might not ſeem by wearing them to encourage luxury in others. He kept ſuch a ſmall number of ſlaves and freed-men, whom he cauſed to wear a particular habit, in order to put them in mind of their condition,

Alexander an enemy to all pomp and ſhew.

[h] Idem, p. 119, &c.

tion, that when he gave any public entertainment, he was obliged to uſe thoſe of his friends, nay, and to borrow their plate; for he ſold all the gold and moſt of the ſilver-plate belonging to the palace, to defray the neceſſary charges of the government, without burdening the people. He reduced the impoſts with which Heliogabalus had loaded both Rome and the provinces, to the thirtieth part, and ſuffered ſeveral cities to apply even that towards the repairing of their public buildings. He lent money without intereſt to the poor, wherewithal to purchaſe houſes and lands, allowing them time to pay the capital with the product of their lands. He was ſo far from filling the exchequer at the expence of the people, that he could not abide the ſight of thoſe, whoſe province it was to levy the taxes; he uſed to call them neceſſary evils, and never ſuffered any of them to continue in his office a full year. He filled at a vaſt charge the public granaries, which, upon his acceſſion to the empire, he found almoſt empty; diſtributed weekly great quantities of oil and corn amongſt the poor citizens; and allotted funds for the maintenance and education of their children [i]. He would not ſuffer the money levied upon the public proſtitutes and catamites to be returned to his private coffers, as other emperors had done; but allotted it towards the repairing of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre. He built granaries in all the quarters of the city, for the uſe of thoſe who had none of their own. Of theſe public and common granaries frequent mention is made by the antients. He cauſed baths to be likewiſe erected in each quarter of the city, and at his own expence furniſhed them with wood, and oil for the lamps in the night; whereas before his time they were never opened till the riſing, and were ſhut again at the ſetting, of the ſun. He built a great many fine houſes for ſuch of his friends and miniſters as had ſerved him faithfully, and lived without reproach [k]. He furniſhed the governors of provinces at their firſt ſetting out with money and other things which were thought neceſſary; that is, according to Lampridius, with twenty pounds weight of ſilver, eight mules, two horſes, two gowns, an hundred pieces of gold, one cook, one coachman, and one concubine, if the perſon he named was not married [l]. He founded a great many free ſchools in Rome, and took particular care of the children of noble, but decayed, families. He embelliſhed Rome with an incredible number of ſtately buildings; repaired moſt moſt of the antient ſtructures, leaving upon them the names of the firſt founders; and erected in the great ſquare of Nerva ſtatues in honour of moſt of the emperors his predeceſſors, with inſcriptions on columns of braſs, containing ſuccinct accounts of all their memorable actions [m]. Alexander was a great encourager of learning, took great delight in converſing with learned men, and ſpent all the time he could ſpare from public affairs in reading Greek and Latin authors, eſpecially Plato's commonwealth, Tully's offices, the works of Horace, of Virgil, whom he uſed to ſtyle the Plato of the poets, and of Serenus Sammonicus, another poet, whom we have men-

Reduces the taxes.

His public works.

[i] Idem, p. 124, 130. [k] Idem, p. 127. [l] Idem, p. 130.

His learning. tioned above [n]. He was himſelf well verſed in all the branches of polite literature, and deſcribed in verſe the exploits of ſome of his predeceſſors [o]. He applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of judicial aſtrology, which was by his orders publicly taught at Rome, and pretended to be thoroughly acquainted with the ſcience of the ſoothſayers and augurs, both as to entrails of ſacrifices and the flight and chirping of birds [p]. He often went to hear the poets and orators declaim in the public ſchools; but would not allow them to write any thing in his praiſe. In ſhort, Alexander, to end the hiſtory of his reign with the words of Aurelius Victor, made it his whole ſtudy to encourage virtue and learning, to reform abuſes, to reſtore the military diſcipline, and to diſcharge with the greateſt fidelity and diſintereſtedneſs each duty of an excellent prince. His endeavours were attended with ſuch ſucceſs, that the empire would have ſtill retained its former luſtre, had thoſe who ſucceeded him firmly maintained what he had ſo wiſely eſtabliſhed. Some of his predeceſſors, namely Trajan, Antoninus, and M. Aurelius, performed perhaps greater things; but were older when they came to the empire, than Alexander was at the time of his death [q]. Of the writers who flouriſhed in his reign, the reader will find a ſuccinct account in our note (Q).

[m] Idem, p. 123. [n] Hiſt. Univerſ. Vol. XV. p. 138. not. (O). [o] Vit. Alex. p. 123. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Aur. Vict. in vit. Alex.

(Q) Lampridius, in his life of Alexander, often quotes Acholius, Septimius, and Encolpius, but ſeems to prefer Septimius to the other two (99). They flouriſhed under Alexander, and wrote the hiſtory of that prince's reign. Voſſius ranks them among the Latin

(99) Vit. Alex. p. 119, 131, 136.

Latin hiſtorians, tho' none of their works have reached our times; and Lampridius does not inform us, whether they wrote in Greek or Latin (100). Acholius lived in the time of Alexander, but died long after; for he was admiſſionum magiſter, that is, in the modern phraſe, maſter of the ceremonies, to the emperor Valerian, who began his reign in the year 253, eighteen years after the death of Alexander (1). He even wrote the life of Valerian, and conſequently outlived him; nay, Voſſius is of opinion, that he was ſtill alive in the reign of Aurelian, who was raiſed to the empire in 270 (2). Encolpius not only lived in the time of Alexander, but was highly favoured by that prince (3). A treatiſe on government, aſcribed to Encolpius, was tranſlated out of Greek into Engliſh above an hundred years ſince, in which the reader will find a particular account of a ſuppoſed conference between the emperor Alexander and Origen. But as ſome circumſtances of that conference are inconſiſtent with what we read in the beſt hiſtorians, we are inclined to aſcribe that piece to ſome modern Greek writer, and to look upon the whole as a mere fable (4). Gargilius Martialis wrote likewiſe the hiſtory of the reign of Alexander, and is ranked by Vopiſcus among thoſe hiſtorians who wrote with more exactneſs than elegance (5). Servius and other writers quote a treatiſe on gardening by one Gargilius Martialis (6); but whether this be the hiſtorian, or another author of the ſame name, we cannot take upon us to determine. Marius Maximus wrote the hiſtory of the emperors from Trajan to Alexander, and is often quoted by the Auguſtine writers. M. Valois takes him to be the ſame perſon with L. Marius Maximus, who had been conſul, and was preferred by Macrinus to the government of Rome in the year 218 (7). Ammianus Marcellinus obſerves, that at Rome, in the fourth century, when learning was utterly neglected, many who never looked into any other book, read with great attention the ſatires of Juvenal and the hiſtory of Marius Maximus (8) Capitolinus commends his ſincerity and exactneſs (9); but Vopiſcus, whoſe judgment is of great weight with the learned, ſtyles him, of all hiſtorians, the moſt tedious and long-winded, and finds fault with him for filling his books with fables (10). The life of Alexander was likewiſe publiſhed by Aurelius Philippus, his father's freed-man (11). Julius Granianus, who inſtructed Alexander in rhetoric, left ſome declamations, which were ſtill extant in the time of Lampridius (12). Beſides the celebrated civilians Ulpianus and Paulus, of whom we have made mention above, Florentinus, Ælius Marcianus, Hermogenes or Hermogenianus, Calliſtrata, and Q. Claudius Venuleius Saturninus, whoſe names are famous in the pandects, were all Papinian's diſciples, and flouriſhed under Alexander; as did likewiſe Herennius Modeſtinus, who was preceptor to Maximinus, the ſon of the emperor of that name, and wrote ſeveral books of juriſprudence, and, among the reſt, one in Greek, on the excuſes of guardians. He was honoured with the conſulſhip by Alexander, but was ſtill alive in the reign of Gordian, which began in 239 (13). In the time of Alexander, flouriſhed, as we ſuppoſe, the ſophiſts, who are mentioned by Philoſtratus in the end of his work; for he wrote ſoon after that prince's reign (14). Among theſe was Aſpaſius, who attended the emperor into the eaſt, afterwards taught at Rome, and was in the end preferred to be one of the emperor's ſecretaries, and charged with the province of drawing up his reſcripts, which he did in a bombaſtic and obſcure ſtyle. He was a native of Ravenna (15). Caniſius publiſhed in 1602, the work of an anonymous chriſtian writer, compoſed, as the author informs us, in the thirteenth year of Alexander's reign, and the 236th after the birth of our Saviour. But he counts two hundred and ſix years ſince our Saviour's death, ſuppoſing him to have lived only thirty years. This work is an ill-digeſted abridgment of geography and chronology, and, in the opinion of the learned, full of anachroniſms and other faults. The tranſcribers of Caniſius's copy have left out the chronological table of the Roman emperors, which is twice promiſed in the preface (16). Father Labbé, who has publiſhed the ſame author, found in his copy the abovementioned table, which is far from being exact (17). It ends with the thirteen years and nine days of the reign of Alexander (18); whence it is plain, that the author put the laſt hand to it in the beginning of the reign of Maximinus. In father Labbé's edition of this work, the author promiſes a catalogue of the biſhops of Rome, and the time of their reſpective epiſcopacies? but that catalogue is wanting in the manuſcript. The author was perhaps a native of Rome, and a prieſt; for in father Labbé's edition, he addreſſes himſelf to a deacon, whom, he ſays, he deſigns to inſtruct; which, in the primitive church, no eccleſiaſtic of an inferior rank, and much leſs a layman, would have taken upon him to do. Of this writer Voſſius takes no notice.

(100) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. p. 719. (1) Aur. Vict. p. 213. (2) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 4. p. 182. (3) Alex. vit. p. 119. (4) Vide Selden. in Eutych. Egypt. &c. not. p. 174, 175. Londin. ann. 1642. (5) Vopiſc. Prob. vit. p. 234. (6) Vide Caſaub. not. p. 168. (7) Ammian. not. p. 364. Spon. p. 114. (8) Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 372. (9) Vit. Alb. p. 84. (10) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 3. p. 178. (11) Vit. Alex. p. 118. (12) Idem ibid. p. 115.

But the moſt famous of all the writers, who flouriſhed under Alexander, was the celebrated hiſtorian Dion Caſſius, called alſo Caſſius (13) Alex. vit. p. 137. & Caſaub. not. p. 178. Maxim vit. p. 148. Cod. Juſtin. l. ii. tit. 12. leg. 11. p. 197. (14) Philoſ. ſoph. lix. p. 622. (15) Idem p. 623. (16) Caniſ antiq. lect. tom. ii. p. 594. (17) Labbé bibl. nov. tom. i. p. 308. (18) Idem p. 309.

Caſſius Cocceius, or Cocceianus. He was a native of Nicæa in Bithynia, and probably related to Cocceianus Dion, a citizen of Pruſa in the ſame province, in whoſe behalf Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan (19). Under Trajan flouriſhed another Dion of Pruſa, a famous ſophiſt, commonly known by the name of Dion Chryſoſtomus, who wrote ſeveral works, which have reached our times (20). The hiſtorian was the ſon of Apronianus, who was governor of Cilicia about the year 183, when the two brothers Quintilii were put to death by Commodus's order (21). He was likewiſe for ſome time governor of Illyricum (22). His ſon was at Rome in the reign of Commodus, at leaſt towards the latter end of it (23). He was ſenator in the year 192, the laſt of the reign of Commodus, and named prætor for the enſuing year by Pertinax, who had a particular kindneſs and eſteem for him (24). He was appointed conſul by the emperor Severus (25), attended, after that prince's death, his ſon Caracalla into the eaſt (26), and ſpoke with him, for the laſt time, at Nicomedia, about the latter end of the year 215 (27). Macrinus named him to the government of Smyrna and Pergamus, which he held under Heliogabalus, and was ſtill in Aſia in the year 221 (28). From Aſia he went into Bithynia; whence he was recalled, and appointed governor, firſt of Africa, afterwards of Illyricum, and laſtly of Pannonia; in which governments he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that Alexander, upon his return to Rome, honoured him with a ſecond conſulſhip in the year 228 (29). When the time of his conſulſhip expired, he obtained leave to return into his own country, where he paſſed the remaining part of his life in retirement. Dion Caſſius wrote in eight decades, that is, in eighty books, the Roman hiſtory, from the landing of Æneas in Italy, to the reign of the emperor Alexander (30). In the time of Severus he wrote a book on the dreams and other prodigies, which ſeemed to preſage the riſe of that prince; which being well received by the emperor, Dion dreamt the following night, that his genius commanded him to undertake the writing of hiſtory. Accordingly he immediately began that of the reign of Commodus; and being encouraged by Severus and others, to whom he read what he had done, to apply himſelf to the writing of hiſtory, he undertook that of Rome (31), and ſpent ten years in collecting the neceſſary materials for ſo great a work, and twelve more in compoſing it (32).

(19) Plin. l. x. epiſt. 87. p. 612. (20) Suid. p. 753, & 765. (21) Dio, l. lxix. p. 788. & l. lxxii. p. 820. (22) Idem l. xlix. p. 413. (23) Idem, l. lxxii. p. 818. (24) Idem ibid. p. 820, 827, & l. lxxiii. p. 835. (25) Idem. l. lxxvi. p. 869. (26) Idem, l. lxxviii. p. 883, 884. (27) Idem, l. lxxix. p. 909. (28) Idem, p. 915. (29) Idem, l. lxxx. p. 917. (30) Suid. δ. p. 753. (31) Idem, l. lxxii. p. 828. Phot. c. 71. p. 105. (32) Idem, l. lxxii, p. 829.

He is very minute in his hiſtory of the emperors to the death of Heliogabalus ; but gives us only a ſummary account of the eight firſt years of Alexander, having been, as he himſelf informs us, moſt part of that time abſent from Italy (33), and conſequently not ſo well acquainted with what paſſed at Rome. He had, it ſeems, begun his hiſtory before the death of Plautianus, that is, before the year 204, and ended it ſoon after the year 229, for he takes no notice of Alexander's wars with the Perſians. His account of the public tranſactions, from the reign of Commodus to that of Alexander, is very particular and minute ; for he then began to write, not what he had learnt of others, but what he had himſelf ſeen and obſerved. He aſſures us, that no one capable of writing an hiſtory was better acquainted than himſelf, both with the public and private tranſactions ; which is not at all incredible in a perſon of his rank. His ſtyle, according to Photius, is ſublime, and anſwerable to the greatneſs of his ſubject ; his terms expreſſive, his phraſe elegant, his periods full and well-ſounding, and the whole worthy of the beſt hiſtorians of antient Greece. He propoſed Thucydides for his model, and does not, in the opinion of Photius, fall much ſhort of that excellent writer (34). Voſſius, however, blames him for crying down the greateſt men of antiquity, namely, Cicero, Brutus, Caſſius, and Seneca ; but others clear him from that cenſure, and think he acted the part of an unbiaſſed hiſtorian, in diſcovering the faults (for no man is without faults) even of thoſe whom he himſelf moſt admired (35). He blames only what in them was blame-worthy, and commends what to him ſeemed commendable. Others think him too diffuſe in his accounts of dreams, prodigies, and other things of that nature, beneath the dignity of an hiſtorian. He wrote, as we have obſerved above, the Roman hiſtory in eighty books ; but of that great work only a ſmall part has reached us. For the firſt thirty-four books have been long ſince entirely loſt ; and of the thirty-fifth only ſome fragments are remaining : the following books, from the end of the thirty-fifth to the fifty-fourth, are thought to be entire ; but the next ſix are, in ſome places, ſtrangely maimed and corrupted. Of the twenty laſt, we have only ſome fragments publiſhed by Fulvius Urſinus and M. Valois. However, that great loſs has been in ſome degree ſupplied by John Xiphilin, who was patriarch of Conſtantinople in the eleventh century, and epitomized Dion's hiſtory from the thirty fifth book to the end. This epitome is greatly eſteemed by the learned, and thought to be very exact. The hiſtory of Zonaras may likewiſe be called an abridgment of Dion's work ; for he copied, as he himſelf owns, moſt of his hiſtory from Dion, and followed him with great exactneſs. Theſe abridgments have been of great uſe to us in the compiling compiling of our hiſtory: for in them are to be found the moſt material tranſactions of the Romans, from the period where Tacitus's hiſtory ends, to the time of the emperor Alexander: from that prince to Conſtantine, the hiſtory of the emperors is more perplexed and leſs certain. For Herodian wrote with more elegance than exactneſs; and Lampridius and the other Auguſtine writers ſcarce deſerve the name of hiſtorians. They wrote in the beginning of the fourth century; and Aurelius Victor and Eutropius only copied them about the cloſe of the ſame century. Zoſimus, who wrote at the end of the fifth century, ſhews by the miſtakes of which he is guilty in the very beginning of his work, that he either made uſe of bad memoirs, or did not underſtand the good ones. Dion Caſſius, beſides his Roman hiſtory, publiſhed a particular hiſtory of Trajan, the life of the philoſopher Arrian, the diſciple of Epictetus, itineraries, the hiſtory of the Perſians, and that of the Getæ (36). The latter was known to Jornandes, who copied from it what he writes of Telephus, king of the Getæ in the times of Achilles and Ulyſſes (37).

(33) Idem, l. lxxvi. p. 860. (34) Phot. c. 71. p. 103.
(35) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 15. p. 238.

(36) Suid. δ. p. 714. (37) Jornan. de reb. Gothic. c. 9.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Alexander Severus, to the captivity of Valerian, when the empire was uſurped by thirty perſons at once, commonly called the thirty tyrants.

THE murder of Alexander occaſioned a great tumult and confuſion in the army; during which the Pannonian troops, under the command of Maximinus, proclaimed him emperor; and the reſt, finding no other appeared to claim or diſpute that title, followed their example, and took the uſual oaths to Maximinus, after he had ſolemnly declared, that he had been noways concerned in, or acceſſory to, the death of Alexander. The new emperor immediately declared his ſon Maximinus Cæſar and prince of the Roman youth, inveſted him with the tribunitial and proconſular power, honoured him with the title of Auguſtus, and took him for his partner in the ſovereignty. The ſenate, whom he took care to acquaint as ſoon as poſſible with his aſſumption to the empire, not daring to oppoſe the choice of the ſoldiery, confirmed it; ſo that Maximinus was, without the leaſt oppoſition, acknowledged emperor by the ſenate, the people, and the army [r]. He was, according to Syncellus [s], a native of Thrace; according to Herodian, Capitolinus, and Jornandes, born in a village on the confines of that province, and the country of the barbarians. His father, by name Micea, or Micca, was a Goth; and his mother Ababa, or Abala, an Alan [t]. He is ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was of a very mean extraction, and in his early youth a ſhepherd, but of a gigantic ſtature, being eight foot and an half tall, and withal exceeding well ſhaped, all his limbs anſwering his ſtature in ſymmetry and proportion. Of his ſtrength, wonderful things are related by the antients, viz. that he was often ſeen to draw a loaded waggon, which two oxen could ſcarce move, to tear up trees by the roots, to crumble pebbles between his fingers, &c. Beſides, he was ſo bold and courageous, that he took delight in expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers: whence he was called, for his courage and valour, Achilles, Hector, and Ajax; for his ſtrength, Hercules, Antæus, and Milo; but at the ſame time, for his ſavage cruelty, Buſiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops. He was firſt known to the emperor Septimius Severus on the following occaſion: That prince having exhibited, as he paſſed through Thrace, ſome military games and exerciſes in honour of his ſecond ſon Geta, and propoſed prizes for the conquerors, Maximinus, at that time about twenty years old, begged leave of the emperor, partly in the Latin, and partly in the Thracian, language, to enter the liſts, and try his ſkill with the reſt. The emperor, admiring his ſize, matched him, not with the ſoldiers, as he was a barbarian, but with ſome of the ſtrongeſt ſlaves in the camp, whom he overcame, ſixteen one after the other. Hereupon the emperor ordered him to be liſted among the horſe. A few days after, as the emperor was viſiting the different quarters of the camp on horſeback, Maximinus, accoſting him, began to run by him. The emperor, to try whether he could run as well as he could wreſtle, put his horſe upon a full gallop, and rid round the camp, Maximinus keeping cloſe by him the whole time, till both he and his horſe were quite ſpent. Then turning to him, Thracian, ſaid he, art thou now diſpoſed to wreſtle? I am, anſwered Maximinus, as much as you pleaſe. The emperor immediately diſmounted, and ordered ſome of the the ſtrongeſt ſoldiers and beſt wreſtlers in the army to enter the liſts with him, of whom he overcame and threw down ſeven, as if they had been ſo many children; which ſo pleaſed the emperor, that he preſented him with a golden collar, placed him among his guards, and heaped many favours upon him, appointing him extraordinary allowances, the common pay not being ſufficient to ſupport him. For he uſed to eat, according to Julius Capitolinus, forty, according to Ælius Cardus, a more antient hiſtorian, ſixty, pounds weight of fleſh a day; and to drink eight amphoræ of wine, that is, ſix gallons, without ever eating or drinking to exceſs [u]. He was preferred by Caracalla to the poſt of a centurion, but quitted the army upon that prince's death, being unwilling to ſerve under Macrinus, the chief author of the murder, and retired to his own country. When Heliogabalus came to the empire, he offered his ſervice to him; and being admitted again into the army, he was, by the intereſt of his friends, raiſed to the rank of a tribune; but always declined, under ſome pretence or other, attending the emperor, who had diſobliged him with an impure jeſt, alluding to his mighty ſtrength [w]. He had even abſented himſelf from Rome, not being able to bear the ſight of that lewd monſter; but returned thither when he underſtood that Alexander was raiſed to the empire, and was by that prince received with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem, recommended by him to the ſenate, created ſenator, and honoured with the command of a new-raiſed legion, which the emperor thought him well qualified to inſtruct in the military exerciſes. In that office he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that Alexander preferred him to an higher command, and, at the breaking out of the German war, charged him with the care of diſciplining the new-raiſed troops, conſiſting chiefly of Pannonians. We are told, that Alexander had even ſome thoughts of marrying his ſiſter Theoclia to the ſon of Maximinus, who, in moſt inſcriptions, is ſtyled C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, in ſtature almoſt equal to his father, well ſhaped, brave, courageous, but proud and haughty to ſuch a degree, that, upon his being proclaimed Auguſtus, and his father's partner in the empire, he ſuffered his ſoldiers not only to kiſs his hand, but his knees and feet, which his father could never endure. When he was killed with his father in the year 238, he was betrothed to Julia Fadilla, the great neice of Antoninus Pius [x].

Maximinus declared emperor, and his ſon Maximinus Cæſar.

His extraction and preferments.

His mighty ſtrength.

[r] Max. vit. p. 142. [s] Sync. p. 361. [t] Herod. l. vi. p. 585. Max. vit. p. 138. Jornand. regn. c. 22.

He is greatly favoured by Alexander.

[u] Herod. l. vi. p. 585. Max. vit. p. 138, 139. [w] Max. vit. p. 139, 140.

His cruelty after his acceſſion to the empire.

MAXIMINUS no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the ſovereign power, than he diſmiſſed all thoſe who had been employed by Alexander in places of truſt, and appointed creatures of his own in their room, ſelected for the moſt part out of the very dregs of the people. He made it his chief ſtudy to gain the affections of the ſoldiery; but chuſing rather to be feared than loved by the reſt of his ſubjects, he began his reign with unheard-of cruelties. All thoſe who had been intimate with Alexander, or ſhewed the leaſt concern for his death, were by his orders inhumanly maſſacred; the ſenators, whom he had created, degraded; and ſuch officers as he had raiſed, under various pretences, diſcharged, and moſt of them baniſhed. Being aſhamed of the meanneſs of his extraction, he cauſed all thoſe who knew his parents, or any of his family, to be privately murdered, though many of them had relieved him when in a low condition, and by their intereſt raiſed him in the army. His cruelty was heightened by the conſpiracy of Magnus, a conſular of an illuſtrious family and great merit.

The conſpiracy of Magnus.

He conſpired with ſome of Alexander's old ſoldiers to break down the bridge which that prince had built over the Rhine, after Maximinus had paſſed it, and abandon him to the enemy. But the conſpiracy being diſcovered, all thoſe, whom Maximinus only ſuſpected to have been privy to it, were inhumanly maſſacred, to the number of four thouſand, without being tried, or even examined; which induced many to believe, that the plot was only a contrivance of Maximinus,

The Oſrhoenians revolt.

to rid himſelf of thoſe who gave him umbrage [y]. A few days after the conſpiracy of Magnus, the Oſrhoenians, who ſerved in the army, and had been always greatly attached to the late emperor, no longer doubting that he had been aſſaſſinated by Maximinus's orders, openly revolted, proclaimed T. Quartinus emperor, and attired him, much againſt his will, with the imperial purple and all the enſigns of ſovereignty. But ſoon after one Macedo, who had been the chief author of the revolt, and pretended great friendſhip for Quartinus, murdered him while he was repoſing in his tent, and carried his head to Maximinus, who, inſtead of rewarding him according to his expectation, cauſed him ſome time after to be executed, for Quartinus betrayed and murdered.

rebelling againſt his prince and betraying his friend [z]. The Oſrhoenians returning to their duty after the death of Quartinus, [x] Max. vit. p. 119, &c. [y] Idem, p. 142. Herod. l. vii. p. 589. [z] Herod. l. vii. p. 590. Max. vit. p. 142, &c.

tinus, the following year, when Severus and Quintianus were conſuls, Maximinus entered Germany at the head of a migh- Maximinus gains ſeveral victories oty army, ravaged the country far and wide, burnt the ene- ver the Ger-my's habitations, carried off their corn and cattle, and took mans.
an incredible number of priſoners. Several battles were fought in the woods and marſhes, in each of which the emperor killed many of the enemy with his own hand, diſcharging every duty of a gallant ſoldier and experienced commander. He choſe always to fight at the head of his troops, and often grappled with the enemy hand to hand like a common ſoldier. Having, in one encounter, to encourage his men, ruſhed ſword in hand into the midſt of the enemy, he was ſurrounded on all ſides, and had been either killed or taken, notwithſtanding his extraordinary ſtrength, in which he placed too much confidence, had not his men, animated by the example of their general, haſtened to his reſcue. He took care to tranſmit an account of his victories to the ſenate, telling them among other things, that he had laid waſte the enemy's country four hundred miles round; deſtroyed near one hundred and fifty of their villages; taken an incredible number of priſoners; and fought more battles, than any of the antients had ever done [a]. He ordered his exploits to be repreſented in painting, and hung up in the ſquares and public places at Rome. For theſe victories the ſenate decreed him and his ſon the title of Germanicus; which is ſtill to be ſeen on ſeveral of the medals [b]. From Germany he marched into Illyricum, and having paſſed the winter in Sirmium in Pannonia, where he entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, and took Africanus for his collegue, early in the ſpring he led his army into the countries of the Dacians and Sarmatians, gained ſeveral Overcomes the Dacians and Sarmatians.
victories over thoſe barbarous nations, and obliged them to ſubmit to ſuch terms as he was pleaſed to impoſe upon them. He had nothing leſs in view, than to extend the borders of the empire to the northern ocean; which he would have eaſily accompliſhed, ſays Herodian [c], had he not been interrupted by a civil war and great diſturbances at home. His cruelty.
occaſioned by his unheard-of cruelty and inſatiable avarice, He encouraged informers, feigned plots, and condemned, without diſtinction of quality, ſex, or age, all who were accuſed, ſeizing their eſtates, and reducing the richeſt families in Rome to beggary. Perſons of the greateſt diſtinction were ſnatched away from their friends and relations, and, upon various various groundleſs accuſations, carried into Pannonia, to be judged by the emperor, who never failed to condemn them either to death or baniſhment, and to ſeize their eſtates, whether the crimes laid to their charge were proved or no. Not ſatisfied with the wealth of ſo many illuſtrious families, he began to plunder the temples, to ſtrip the public buildings of their ornaments, and to ſeize on the public money in the cities allotted for the maintenance or diverſions of the people. This alarmed the populace, and diſpoſed them to a general revolt, which firſt broke out in Africa, about the middle of May of the enſuing year, when Perpetuus and Cornelianus were conſuls, on the following occaſion: Two young men of great diſtinction, being condemned by the emperor's receiver in that province, who oppreſſed the people in a moſt tyrannical manner, to pay a fine, which would have reduced them to beggary, conſpired to ſave their fortunes, by deſtroying him; and accordingly, having gained ſome ſoldiers of the legion quartered there, they fell upon him unexpectedly, and cut in pieces both him and ſuch of the ſoldiers as attempted to defend him. This murder, they well knew, the emperor would never forgive; and therefore, well appriſed, that the only means of eſcaping the puniſhment due to their crime, was to create a new prince, they openly revolted, and with the concurrence of the people, who could no longer bear the tyrannical government of Maximinus, proclaimed Gordianus, at that time proconſul of Africa, emperor in his room. Gordianus was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, and univerſally beloved both at Rome and in the provinces, many of which he had governed, on account of his extraordinary merit and virtues; but as he was ſtricken in years, being at this time eighty and upwards, when the people broke unexpectedly into his houſe, and ſaluted him with the title of Auguſtus, he threw himſelf upon the ground, and begged with many tears they would ſuffer him to ſpend the poor remains of his life in quiet, and chuſe ſome other more able, on account of his age, to deliver the ſtate from the tyrannical yoke under which it groaned. But the people, and at their head one Mauricius, a perſon of great authority among them, continuing unalterable in their former reſolution, Gordianus was in the end conſtrained to accept the enſigns and title of emperor; which he had no ſooner done, than, to the inexpreſſible joy of all the Africans, he took his ſon, who bore the ſame name, was then his lieutenant, and had been conſul, for his partner in the empire. From Thyſdrus, a city of no ſmall note in Byzacene, not far far from Adrumetum, where this happened, Gordianus marched to Carthage, and made his entry into that city arrayed with the imperial purple, amidſt the loud acclamations of the people, ſaluting him with the title of Gordianus Africanus. From Carthage he wrote to the ſenate and people of Rome, acquainting them with what had happened in Africa, and aſſuring them, that he had accepted of the empire againſt his will, and was ready to reſign it, if they did not think fit to confirm his election. In the decrees which he ſent with his letters, and ordered to be publicly ſet up with the approbation of the ſenate, he gave leave to all exiles to return home, baniſhed the informers, promiſed large ſums to the people, and to the ſoldiery a greater largeſs than any emperor had ever given. At the ſame time, he wrote to all the great men in Rome, moſt of whom were his particular friends, encouraging them to exert themſelves on the preſent occaſion, and join him in reſcuing Rome from the inſupportable tyranny of Maximinus, which was the only motive that had prompted him in his old age to ſubmit to ſo heavy a burden as the empire. In his letter to Junius Syllanus, then conſul, he charged that magiſtrate to diſpatch without delay Vitalianus, who commanded the body of prætorian guards that had been left in Rome, and was greatly attached to Maximinus, being of a no leſs cruel and ſavage temper than that tyrant. Syllanus, upon the receipt of this letter, ſent the quæſtor, attended by ſome reſolute men, with letters to Vitalianus, which he pretended to have juſt received from Maximinus, enjoining them to draw him aſide, and diſpatch him while he was peruſing them; which they did accordingly, and then gave out, that what they had done was by Maximinus's orders: which was believed; for thus he uſed to treat even his beſt friends. After this, the conſul Syllanus aſſembled at his houſe the prætors, ædiles, and tribunes of the people, and, attended by them, went to the ſenate, and there read, on the twenty-ſeventh day of May, the letters which Gordianus had written both to them and to him. Hereupon the ſenate, in great tranſports of joy, declared, without the leaſt heſitation, the two Gordians emperors, the two Maximins public enemies, and decreed a great reward to ſuch as ſhould kill either of them. At the ſame time, they named to the prætorſhip of the enſuing year a third Gordian, grandſon to the elder, tho' then only but twelve years old. Theſe proceedings, however, were kept ſecret, till ſuch time as the ſenate had taken the neceſſary meaſures for quaſhing at once the party of the Maximins in Rome;

[a] Idem ibid. [b] Goltz. p. 101, 102. Birag. p. 329. [c] Herod. l. vii. p. 592.

The people in Africa revolt.

Gordian proclaimed emperor in Africa.

He writes to the ſenate.

Who acknowledge him emperor, and declare Maximinus a public enemy.

Rome; which was no ſooner done, than they gave out, that they were both killed, and that the two Gordians reigned in their room. The edicts of the latter were publicly hung up, and their images carried to the camp, with their letters to the ſoldiery, who being, after the death of Vitalianus, deſtitute of a leader, readily ſubmitted to the Gordians. As for the people, tranſported with rage againſt Maximinus hardly to be expreſſed, they immediately ran and pulled down all his ſtatues and monuments, uttering dreadful imprecations againſt the bloody tyrant and his ſon. At the ſame time, the ſenate enacted a decree, ſentencing to death all the friends of Maximinus, and the miniſters of his cruelty. Hereupon ſuch of them as had not the good luck to eſcape were maſſacred without mercy by the enraged multitude, dragged through the ſtreets, and thrown into the common ſewer. Several innocent perſons periſhed with the guilty, many laying hold of that opportunity to diſpatch their private enemies or creditors. Sabinus, governor of Rome, endeavouring to put a ſtop to theſe diſorders, had his brains daſhed out with a blow from one of the mob, and his body was left for ſome time in the public ſtreet [d].

The friends of Maximinus at Rome murdered.

The ſenate all to a man revolt from Maximinus.

In the mean time, it being publicly known, that Maximinus was ſtill alive, the ſenate iſſued a ſecond decree againſt him, declaring anew both him and his ſon public enemies, and at the ſame time diſpatched perſons of the greateſt intereſt and authority into all the provinces, with letters to the proconſuls, preſidents, lieutenants, tribunes, &c. exhorting them to join in the common cauſe, and exert themſelves in defence of their common liberties, againſt a raging tyrant and public enemy (S). They likewiſe choſe twenty ſenators, who

[d] Gordian. vit. p. 153, & ſeq. Max. vit. 143, & ſeq. Herod. l. vii. p. 595—598.

(S) The letter, which the ſenate wrote on this occaſion, was conceived in the following terms: "To all proconſuls, preſi-
" dents, lieutenants, commanders, tribunes, free towns, cities, " villages and caſtles, the ſenate and people of Rome, whoſe de" liverance from the tyranny of the cruel monſter Maximin is " begun by the Gordians, greeting: By the favour of the gods
" we have for emperor Gordian, a perſon of the greateſt merit
" and virtue We have proclaimed him emperor, and, for the " greater ſecurity of the ſtate, his ſon in conjunction with him.
" It is incumbent upon you to concur with us in procuring and " promoting the public welfare and ſafety; in oppoſing the " wicked

who had all been conſuls, and ſent them into different parts of Italy, with orders to guard night and day all the roads, ports, and harbours, that no account of what had paſſed at Rome might be tranſmitted to Maximinus before the arrival of Gordian. The letters of the ſenate were received in moſt cities and provinces with incredible joy, and a dreadful ſlaughter was made of the officers and friends of Maximinus. Only a few places continued faithful to him, and either delivered up to the tyrant, or maſſacred, the deputies of the ſenate. At Rome perſons of all ranks and ages, even the women and children, crouded to the temples, beſeeching the gods, that they would never ſuffer the bloody tyrant to approach the city [c]. Maximinus, who was at this time either in Thrace or Sarmatia, ſoon received intelligence of what had paſſed at Rome and in Africa, notwithſtanding all the precautions of the ſenate; nay, a copy of the decree of the ſenate, declaring him a public enemy and ſetting a price upon his head, was tranſmitted to him; upon the reading of which he flew into ſuch a paſſion, as can hardly be expreſſed or conceived: more like a wild beaſt than an human creature, ſays the author of his life, he beat his head againſt the wall, threw himſelf upon the ground, tore his royal robes, drew his ſword, and, after having uttered dreadful menaces againſt the ſenate, fell upon thoſe who ſtood next to him, and would have killed his ſon, had he not quickly withdrawn, for having refuſed to quit him and live at Rome; which the father adviſed him to do upon their firſt coming to the empire, and which would, in his opinion, have kept the ſenate and people in awe, and prevented the preſent revolt. In ſhort, ſuch was his fury and rage, that his friends looking upon him as a man bereft of his underſtanding, with much-ado ſnatched his arms from him, and carried him to his room. Being returned to himſelf, he ſpent ſome days in deliberating with his council about the moſt proper meaſures to be purſued at ſuch an important conjuncture. Then aſſembling his army, he acquainted them with the ſtate of affairs, pretending to be under no apprehenſion, and promiſing to diſtribute among them the eſtates of the

His rage upon the news of the revolt.

[c] Herod. l. vii. p. 599. Max. vit. p. 141.

" wicked deſigns of thoſe who threaten us; and in purſuing to " death the cruel tyrant Maximin and his friends; for we have " declared him and his ſon public enemies (33)."

(33) Vit. Max. p. 143, 144.

the ſenators and African rebels. Having ended his ſpeech, he gave his ſoldiers a great bounty, and without loſs of time began his march towards Italy. The troops not ſhewing ſo much ardour and forwardneſs as he expected, he wrote to his ſon, who was marching with a ſeparate body at ſome diſtance, to join him with all poſſible expedition, leſt the army ſhould, in his abſence, attempt upon his life. At the ſame time, he diſpatched perſons to Rome, to publiſh there in his name a general pardon with reſpect to all paſt injuries, and with them letters to Sabinus, not being yet appriſed of his death, in which was incloſed a copy of the decree declaring him a public enemy; for he ſuppoſed Sabinus, who had abſented himſelf that day from the ſenate, to be altogether ignorant of what had paſſed there [f]. While Maximinus was marching towards Italy, the face of affairs was quite changed in Africa: A ſenator, by name Capelianus, had been appointed governor of Mauritania by Maximinus with a conſiderable body of troops under his command, to make head againſt the Moors not ſubject to Rome, who infeſted with daily incurſions the Roman territories. But Gordianus, to whom he had been a declared enemy, and whom he had on all occaſions oppoſed, immediately diſcharged him, and named another in his room. Capelianus, who was an officer of great valour and experience, inſtead of obeying the orders of the new emperor, aſſembled all his forces, levied ſeveral companies of Moors, and having with incredible diſpatch drawn together a very conſiderable body of well diſciplined and reſolute men, marched at the head of them ſtrait to Carthage. His approach alarmed the city. The inhabitants, however, betook themſelves to their arms, and marched out under the conduct of Gordianus the younger to meet the enemy. Hereupon a bloody engagement enſued, in which Gordianus's raw and undiſciplined troops performed wonders; but were in the end put to flight, and moſt of them cut in pieces either in the battle or the purſuit. Gordianus himſelf was killed in the field, which, together with the loſs of the battle and the approach of the enemy, reduced the father to ſuch deſpair, that he ſtrangled himſelf with his own girdle [g]. Such was the end of the two Gordians, after having reigned, according to the moſt probable opinion [h], one month and ſix days. They were ſprung from two of the moſt antient and illuſtri-

He marches for Italy.

Capelianus raiſes forces againſt the Gordians.

Their death.

ous

[f] Gord. vit. p. 157, 158. Herod. p. 601. Max. vit. p. 141.
[g] Herod. l. vii. p. 602, 603. Gord. vit. p. 158. Max. vit. p. 145. [h] Vide Petav. doct. temp, p. 337.

ous families in Rome. Gordianus the father, ſtyled in moſt medals and inſcriptions M. Antonius Gordianus, was the ſon of Mæcius Marullus, deſcended from the Gracchi, and of Ulpia Gordiana, of the family of the emperor Trajan. His father, grandfather, and great grandfather had been conſuls, and he himſelf twice diſcharged that honourable office, firſt with the emperor Caracalla in 213. and the ſecond time with Alexander Severus in 229. His wealth was anſwerable to his quality; for he poſſeſſed, according to Julius Capitolinus, more land in the provinces, than any private man in Rome [i]. The ſame writer obſerves, that he was the firſt private perſon who had a conſular habit of his own, the reſt, and even ſome of the emperors, contenting themſelves with the common robes that were lodged in the capitol [k]. He was well-ſhaped, of a comely and majeſtic aſpect, and thought to reſemble the emperor Auguſtus. He was highly eſteemed by the emperor Alexander, who returned public thanks to the ſenate for preferring ſo deſerving a perſon to the government of Africa, ſtyling him, in the letter which he wrote upon that occaſion, a nobleman of great magnanimity, eloquence, juſtice, moderation, integrity, goodneſs, &c. He was exceeding kind to all his relations, and paid ſuch reſpect to his wife's father, Annius Severus, that he never preſumed, before he was prætor, to ſit down in his preſence, and never failed waiting upon him once a day, even when he was conſul. He was very ſober in his diet, modeſt, but proper, in his dreſs, and regular in all his actions, without ever being guilty of any exceſs, or diſcompoſed by any paſſion [l]. He was well verſed in all the branches of literature, eſpecially in poetry, and wrote in his youth ſeveral poems, which were greatly eſteemed, and, among the reſt, one intitled Antoniniades, deſcribing in thirty books the lives and wars, the public and private actions of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius, or Antoninus Philoſophus. He wrote likewiſe in proſe the praiſes of the Antonini. His chief entertainment was to read Plato, Ariſtotle, Cicero, Virgil, and the other antient authors. No one ever gave greater ſatisfaction to the people, or diſcharged the public offices with more generoſity, than Gordianus. During the year of his ædileſhip, he exhibited public ſhews once a month, ſometimes five hundred couple of gladiators at a time, and never leſs than one hundred and fifty. He cauſed an incredible number of wild beaſts to be brought to Rome, for Extraction and preferments of the two Gordians.

[i] Gord. vit. p. 151, 152. [k] Idem, p. 152. [l] Idem, p. 152, 153.

for the diverſion of the people, from the moſt diſtant parts of the empire. In one day a thouſand bears were hunted and killed, and in his other ſhews, ſuch numbers of wild beaſts of all kinds, as had never before been ſeen in Rome; which gained him the affections of the people, entirely addicted to diverſions of that nature. After his ſecond conſulſhip, he was immediately ſent into Africa in quality of proconſul; which office he diſcharged with ſo much juſtice, equity, and moderation, that he was univerſally adored, and more beloved by the people than any governor had ever been before him, ſome calling him a Scipio, ſome a Cato, ſome a Mutius Scævola, a Rutilius, a Lælius. He married Fabia Oreſtilla, the daughter of Annius Severus, and grand-daughter to the emperor M. Aurelius, and had by her a daughter named Mæcia Fauſtina, who was married to Junius Balbus a conſular; and a ſon ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions and medals M. Antonius Gordianus [m], with the title of pontifex; whereas his father is diſtinguiſhed with that of pontifex Maximus. The ſon was killed in the year 237, the forty-ſixth of his age [n], and conſequently was born in 191, the twelfth of the reign of Commodus. He had an extraordinary memory, and was well verſed in polite literature, having had Serenus Sammonicus for his preceptor, who bequeathed to him his famous library, conſiſting of ſixty-two thouſand volumes. He wrote ſeveral pieces both in proſe and verſe, which ſhewed, ſays Capitolinus [o], that he had a fine genius, but neglected to cultivate and improve it. He was well ſkilled in the law, and one of Alexander's chief counſellors. He was univerſally beloved on account of his obliging carriage and extraordinary ſweet temper; but loved his pleaſures, and ſpent moſt of his time in baths, gardens, and groves. He kept conſtantly twenty-two concubines, and is ſaid to have had by each of them three or four children; whence he was called the Priamus, and ſatirically the Priapus, of his time. Ælius Cordus writes, that he could never be prevailed upon to marry, and conſequently had no lawful iſſue. On the other hand Dexippus tells us, that he married, and had by his wife Gordian, afterwards emperor [p]. But, according to Herodian, the emperor was not his, but his ſiſter's, ſon. But of him hereafter, Gordian, of whom we are now writing, was highly favoured by Heliogabalus, as a young man addicted to his pleaſures, and by that prince raiſed to the quæſtorſhip. Alexander preferred him, as he he was a man of known integrity and great abilities, to the prætorſhip, and ſoon after honoured him with the conſular dignity. In the reign of Alexander or Maximinus he was ſent into Africa, in quality of lieutenant to his father, who took him for his partner in the empire, and, upon his death, put an end to his own life in the manner we have related above.

[m] Goltz. p. 102. [n] Vit. Gord. p. 158. [o] Idem, p. 160. [p] Idem ibid.

To reſume now the thread of our hiſtory. The diſmal tidings of the death of the two Gordians in Africa threw the whole city into the utmoſt conſternation. However, as they dreaded above all things the cruel effects of Maximinus's reſentment, and expected to find no mercy at the hands of ſo barbarous a tyrant, they reſolved, not to ſubmit to him, but to defend themſelves to the laſt. The ſenate therefore, aſſembling in the temple of Concord, choſe two new emperors, M. Clodius Pupienus Maximus and Decimus Cœlius Balbinus. The former was a perſon of low birth, but extraordinary merit. His father was, according to ſome, a cart-wright, according to others, a lock-ſmith; but the ſon raiſed himſelf, chiefly by his courage and valour, to the firſt employments in the empire. He ſerved firſt in quality of a private ſoldier; but was ſoon preferred, as he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on all occaſions, to the poſt of a centurion, then to that of a tribune, and not long after to the command of ſeveral legions, in which he acquitted himſelf ſo well, that he was admitted into the ſenate, created prætor, honoured with the conſulſhip, and ſucceſſively appointed governor of Bithynia, Greece, and Narbonne Gaul. From Gaul he was ſent to command the troops in Illyricum, where he gained great advantages over the Sarmatians, and the forces in Germany, where he was attended with equal ſucceſs againſt the Germans. Upon his return from Germany, he was made governor of Rome, in which place he acquitted himſelf with ſuch prudence, integrity, and diſcretion, that he was both eſteemed and beloved by perſons of every rank and condition. He appeared always grave and ſerious, and ſhewed no great complaiſance to any one; but was juſt, merciful, and never guilty of the leaſt action that favoured of inhumanity, but on the contrary always ready to forgive. He addicted himſelf to no party, was ſteady and inflexible in his reſolutions, and, without truſting to others, examined every thing himſelf with great care and attention. In ſhort the ſenate entertained ſuch an high opinion of his extraordinary merit and virtues, that, in declaring him emperor, they ſolemnly proteſted, that, in the whole empire, they knew no perſon better qualified than he for ſuſtaining the name and dignity of a prince [q]. He is commonly called Pupienus by the Latin hiſtorians, and by the Greek writers Maximus, which has ſtrangely perplexed Capitolinus, who, after a long deſcant, concludes, that they were two names of one and the ſame perſon: this trouble he might have ſaved himſelf by only looking upon one of that prince's coins. Balbinus was deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and pretended to derive his pedigree from Cornelius Balbus Theophanes, a celebrated hiſtorian, and a man of the firſt rank in the iſland of Leſbos, who was made free of Rome by Pompey the Great. The preſent emperor had been twice conſul, and had governed without blame ſeveral provinces, viz. Aſia, Africa, Bithynia, Galatia, Pontus, Thrace, and Gaul. He had likewiſe commanded armies; but, being ſomewhat timorous, he was thought better qualified for civil than military affairs. He poſſeſſed immenſe wealth, lived with great ſplendor, was addicted to pleaſures, but at the ſame time univerſally beloved on account of his integrity, (for he injured no man but himſelf) his humanity, ſweet temper, and obliging behaviour. He was an excellent orator, no mean poet, and had an uncommon talent in making extemporary verſes [r].

Pupienus and Balbinus proclaimed emperors

The riſe and preferments of Pupienus.

The extraction and employments of Balbinus.

Maximus and Balbinus being, with the unanimous conſent of the ſenate, raiſed to the ſovereignty, and inveſted with the tribunitial and proconſular power, went, at the breaking up of the aſſembly, to the capitol. But while they were offering there the uſual ſacrifices, the populace roſe, and, armed with ſtones and clubs, declared, that they would not obey the new emperors, and demanded, with great clamour, a prince of the Gordian family. Maximus and Balbinus, backed by ſome young knights, attempted to open themſelves a way through the croud, ſword in hand; but were in the end, in ſpite of all their efforts, obliged to ſend for young Gordian, then only twelve years old, who was received by the populace with loud ſhouts of joy, and carried to the capitol; where the ſenate, to appeaſe the multitude, declared him Cæſar, arrayed him with the habit peculiar to that dignity, and in that attire ſhewed him to the people, who thereupon diſperſed, and, retiring quietly to their houſes, ſuffered the new emperors to take poſſeſſion of the palace [s], where they began to diſcharge the functions of ſovereignty with deifying the two Gordians. When that ceremony was over, they appointed Sabinus governor of Rome, and Pinarius Valens, uncle

The people mutiny.

Young Gordian declared Cæſar.

[q] Max. & Balb. vit. 166, 167. [r] Idem, p. 168, & ſeq. Herod. l. vii. p. 604. [s] Max. & Balb. vit. p. 145.

uncle by the father to Maximus, commander of the prætorian guards; and then, without loſs of time began to levy what forces they could, and make the neceſſary preparations for taking the field againſt Maximinus, who, upon the news of their election, quickened his march, breathing nothing but ruin and deſtruction. As moſt of the provinces had eſpouſed the party of the ſenate, troops were ſent from all parts to reinforce the army of Maximus, who, being charged with the conduct of the war, as the more able commander, ſet out from Rome ſoon after his election, leaving the prætorian guards, and part of the new-raiſed forces, to defend the city and awe the populace. After his departure, the ſenate diſpatched the moſt conſiderable men of their body into the different parts of Italy, with orders to fortify all the cities, and ſupply the inhabitants with arms; to remove all manner of proviſions into the fortified towns, and either to reap or deſtroy the corn in the fields; to mow the graſs, and lay waſte the whole country, through which Maximinus was to march with his numerous army. At the ſame time, they ſent circular letters into all the provinces, declaring ſuch, as ſhould lend him the leaſt aſſiſtance, traitors, rebels, and public enemies. Maximus had ſcarce left the city, when dreadful diſturbances aroſe there, occaſioned by the temerity of two ſenators, Gallicanus and Mecænas, who ſeeing two ſoldiers of the prætorian guards enter the hall, where the ſenate was aſſembled, quitting their places, ruſhed upon them unexpectedly, and diſpatched them with their daggers; for in thoſe diſtracted times moſt ſenators wore daggers under their robes. Hereupon the other ſoldiers of that corps, who were waiting at the door mixed with the populace, betook themſelves to flight, but were purſued by Gallicanus, who encouraged the mob to fall upon them as ſpies and partizans of the tyrant Maximinus. Some of them were wounded, but the reſt ſhut themſelves up in their camp, where they were attacked the ſame day by Gallicanus at the head of the multitude, (whom he had ſupplied with arms) and of all the gladiators he could draw together. The guards ſuſtained the attack with their uſual reſolution, repulſed the aſſailants, and falling upon them in their retreat, cut great numbers of them in pieces. This ſlaughter ſerved only to inſpire the multitude with new rage; and the ſenate, eſpouſing their quarrel, ordered the new-levied forces, which Maximus had left to maintain peace and tranquillity in the city, to march againſt the prætorian guards; which they did accordingly, and attacked the camp with great fury, but were, after repeated aſſaults, in which great numbers of them

Maximus marches againſt Maximinus.

Dreadful diſturbances in Rome.

A battle between the prætorian guards and the people.

periſhed, obliged to give over the attempt and retire. The incenſed multitude, finding all their efforts thus baffled, bethought themſelves at laſt of cutting the conduits that conveyed water into the camp; which reduced the ſoldiery to ſuch deſpair, that, throwing the gates of the camp open, they ruſhed unexpectedly upon the multitude, ſword in hand, and drove them, after a long diſpute, in which much blood was ſhed on both ſides, into the city, where the combat began a-new, the people diſcharging from the tops of their houſes ſhowers of ſtones and tiles upon the ſoldiery, who in revenge ſet fire to their ſhops and ſtore-houſes, which conſumed the greateſt part of the city, an incredible quantity of valuable effects, and many perſons of all ranks [t]. Herodian does not inform us how the tumult ended; but Capitolinus writes, that the temples were profaned, the private houſes pillaged, the ſtreets covered with dead bodies, &c. that the emperor Balbinus, attempting to appeaſe the tumult and part the combatants, was dangerouſly wounded on the head; but at length, having ſent for young Gordian, and ſhewed him to the people in his purple robes, the fury of both parties aſſwaged at once, hoſtilities ceaſed, the people retired to their houſes, and the ſoldiers to the camp. So great was the eſteem, reſpect, and veneration, both of the people and ſoldiery, for one ſprung from the Gordians, who had loſt their lives in the defence of the people of Rome [u].

Dreadful diſorders committed in the city.

THE next year, when Annius Pius, or, as others call him, Ulpius, and Pontianus were conſuls, Maximinus early in the ſpring purſued his march towards Italy, having with him, we may ſay, all the forces of the empire. Being arrived at the foot of the Alps that part Italy from Illyricum, he found the city of Hemona or Æmona abandoned by its inhabitants; which inſpired him with hopes of certain victory; for he thence concluded, that no place or city would dare to withſtand him. Herodian calls Æmona the firſt city of Italy; but he ought rather to have ſtyled it the laſt of Pannonia; for in that province it is placed by all the antient and modern geographers. Sanſon ſuppoſes it to have ſtood where the preſent city of Laubach ſtands, the capital of Carniola; others place it in the neighbourhood of Igg, in the ſame country. Maximinus, leaving Æmona, paſſed the mountains without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition; which heightened his joy and confidence. But his men, who expected to be refreſhed, after paſſing the mountains, with plenty of all manner of proviſions Maximinus purſues his march into Italy.

[t] Herod. l. vii. p. 607, 608. [u] Vit. Max. & Balb. p. 168, 169.

viſions in Italy, finding the country laid waſte far and wide, and themſelves deſtitute even of neceſſaries, began to mutiny. Maximinus puniſhed the ring-leaders of the tumult with great ſeverity, which only ſerved to exaſperate the reſt. However, he purſued his march; and being informed, that the city of Aquileia had ſhut its gates againſt a party, which he had ſent to take poſſeſſion of the place, he marched thither in perſon with all his forces, not doubting, but the inhabitants would ſubmit upon the approach of ſo formidable an army. But Criſpinus and Menophilus, two conſulars of great reſolution and intrepidity, to whom the ſenate had committed the defence of the city, anſwered the tribune ſent by Maximinus to ſummon them to ſurrender, that they were determined to hold out to the laſt, and rather forfeit their lives, than betray their truſt, or yield to ſuch a cruel, bloody, and faithleſs tyrant. At the ſame time, to animate the inhabitants, who began to waver, they gave out, that Apollo, the tutelar god of the place, had aſſured them of victory; which diſpelled all fear, ſo that every one began to prepare for a vigorous defence. In the mean while, Maximinus having ſpent ſome time in paſſing the river Sontius, now Iſonzo, about ſixteen miles from Aquileia, approached the city; and having cauſed all the vines and neighbouring groves, which were a great ornament to the place, to be cut down, he began to batter the walls with an incredible number of warlike engines, and to haraſs the beſieged with repeated aſſaults, which they ſuſtained with ſuch reſolution and intrepidity as can hardly be expreſſed. Even the women and children appeared on the ramparts, and bore their ſhare in the common danger; the women eſpecially ſignalized their zeal by yielding their hair to be employed in making ſtrings for the bows and other warlike machines. The ſenate, out of gratitude, after the death of Maximinus, cauſed a magnificent temple to be erected, which they conſecrated to Venus calva, or Venus the bald: on a medal of Quintia Criſpilla, wife to the emperor Maximus, is to be ſeen a temple with that legend and the figure of a bald woman [w]. The ſoldiers of Maximinus, in the beginning of the ſiege, ſhewed great ardour; which, however, began to abate, when they found the inhabitants firmly determined to undergo all labours and hardſhips, rather than ſubmit. Maximinus, highly provoked at their backwardneſs, and beſides enraged at the bitter reproaches uttered by the inhabitants a-

His ſoldiers begin to mutiny.

Maximinus ſummons the city of Aquileia to ſurrender.

The inhabitants ſuſtain a ſiege with great reſolution.

[w] Vide de Meneſtrier medailles des emper. & imperatr. p. 145. à Dijon, 1642.

gainſt him and his ſon, as often as they approached the walls, cauſed ſeveral of his officers to be publicly executed, aſcribing the coolneſs of the ſoldiers to want of courage in them. This exaſperated the ſoldiers, already inclined to mutiny for want of proviſions, of which, and even of water, there was great ſcarcity in the camp. Beſides, a report was ſpread, that the whole empire was arming againſt Maximinus, and ready to fall upon thoſe who ſupported him in his tyranny. Hereupon the Albanians, that is, the ſoldiers belonging to the camp in the neighbourhood of Alba, took a ſudden reſolution to diſpatch the author of ſo many calamities; and, without farther deliberation, went ſtrait at noon-day to the tent of Maximinus, diſpatched both him and his ſon with many wounds, cut off their heads, and ſent them to Rome, and threw their bodies into the river. With them were killed Anolinus, their captain of the guards, and all their chief miniſters and friends [x]. Such was the end of the reign, or rather of the tyranny, of the two Maximins, after it had laſted three years and a few days, the father being then in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the ſon in the twenty-firſt. The Pannonians, Thracians, and ſome other troops, heard the news of their death with regret, but did not attempt to revenge it. Thus the whole army preſented themſelves unarmed before the gates of Aquileia, acquainted the beſieged with the death of Maximinus, and deſired to be admitted into the city. It was not thought adviſeable to open the gates to them; but after they had adored the images of Maximus, Balbinus, and Gordian, placed for that purpoſe on the ramparts, a great quantity of proviſions was ſent to their camp; for they were almoſt famiſhed: and the next day they all took the uſual oaths to Maximus and Balbinus [y].

The ſoldiers of Maximinus mutiny, and murder him and his ſon.

His death occaſions great joy at Rome.

An expreſs was immediately diſpatched to Rome with theſe joyful tidings, who paſſing through Ravenna, found the emperor Maximus there buſy in aſſembling his forces, in order to march againſt the tyrant. But when he underſtood, that both the Maximins were killed, that their army had ſubmitted, and ſworn fidelity to him and his collegue, tranſported with joy, and laying aſide all military preparations, he repaired to the temples to return thanks to the gods for ſuch ſignal and unexpected ſucceſs. In the mean time, the expreſs purſuing his journey, and often changing horſes, reached Rome the fourth day, diſtant from Aquileia about two hundred hundred and eighty miles, which no one, ſays our hiſtorian, had ever done before. Upon his arrival, he found Balbinus and Gordian aſſiſting with the people at the public ſports in the theatre, where he delivered his letters to the two princes; which he had no ſooner done, than the whole multitude cried out with one voice, Maximinus is killed; and riſing up left the theatre, and crowded to the temples, whither Balbinus and Gordian followed. The ſenate immediately aſſembled; and, after decreeing ſeveral honours to the three princes, appointed ſacrifices to be offered in all the temples, and a day of public and ſolemn thankſgiving for their happy delivery. Balbinus, who uſed to tremble at the very name of Maximinus, offered an hecatomb, which was never done but upon ſome extraordinary occaſion, and cauſed the ſame ſacrifice to be offered in all the cities of the empire [z]. Thoſe who brought the heads of the two Maximins, arrrived at Rome ſoon after the courier; for they made what haſte they could. They were met every-where by crouds of the people, and received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. They entered Rome with the heads ſtuck upon two lances, that every one might ſee them: and no ſight was ever more pleaſing. They repaired again to the temples, offered new ſacrifices, and ſeemed no leſs tranſported with joy, than if they had been delivered from imminent death or captivity [a]. The two heads were abandoned to the rage of the populace, and, after many inſults, burnt in the field of Mars. The names of the Maximins were, by a decree of the ſenate, eraſed out of all inſcriptions, their ſtatues overturned, and their bodies ordered to be left unburied. The emperor Maximus haſtened from Ravenna to Aquileia, where he was received with loud acclamations, and acknowledged emperor by the army of Maximinus, among whom he diſtributed large ſums, and then ſent them back to their reſpective quarters, retaining with him only the prætorian guards, and a ſmall body of Germans, in whom chiefly he confided. During his ſtay at Aquileia, the ſenate, to do him honour, ſent a deputation to him, conſiſting of twenty of their body, who had been all conſuls, prætors, or quæſtors. With them he ſet out from Aquileia; and arriving at Rome with a numerous and ſplendid retinue, was there received at the gates by Balbinus, Gordian, the ſenate in a body, and all the people, and conducted in triumph to the palace [b]. The two emperors go- Maximus returns to Rome

[x] Herod. l. viii. p. 614. [y] Herod. l. vii. p. 626, 627. Max. vit. p. 146.

[z] Max. vit. p. 169, &c [a] Max. vit p. 169. Herod. p. 617.
[b] Herod. l. viii. p. 620. Max. & Balb. vit. p. 170.

verned with great prudence and moderation, enacted excellent laws, adminiſtered juſtice with the utmoſt impartiality, maintained the military diſcipline with due rigor, paid great reſpect and deference to the ſenate, and conducted themſelves in all things with ſuch wiſdom, equity, and moderation, that they were in a manner adored both by the ſenate and people.

The wiſe adminiſtration of the two emperors.

But the happineſs and tranquillity, which they enjoyed under theſe excellent princes, were ſhort-lived. The Carpi, a people beyond the Danube, paſſing that river, ravaged the province of Mœſia. The Goths, provoked perhaps by the death of Maximinus, invaded the Roman territories on the ſide of Scythia; and the Perſians, who had continued quiet ſince the year 233, when Alexander made war upon them, threatened the eaſtern provinces. It was therefore agreed among the princes, that Maximus ſhould march againſt the Perſians, Balbinus againſt the Goths and Carpi, and Gordian remain in the mean time at Rome. But while great preparations were making for the intended expeditions, the prætorian guards, diſſatisfied to ſee princes, who had been created by the ſenate, ſo much applauded, and provoked at the bitter invectives which were daily uttered againſt Maximinus, and reflected no ſmall diſhonour upon them, who had raiſed him to the empire, began to mutiny, and complain with one another, that the right of naming the emperors, which had hitherto proved ſo advantageous to them, was ſnatched out of their hands, and transferred to the ſenate. Beſides, they grew jealous of the Germans, whom Maximus had brought to Rome with him, with a deſign, as they imagined, to diſcharge the prætorian guards, as Septimius Severus had formerly done, and to take the Germans in their room. Being thus prejudiced againſt the two emperors, they reſolved to diſpatch them, and reſume their pretended authority, by ſetting up another in their room. Having taken this reſolution, they only waited for an opportunity of putting it in execution, which ſoon offered; for the Capitoline games being celebrated a few days after, and moſt of the emperors domeſtics reſorting thither, the diſcontented and mutinous ſoldiery marched ſtrait to the palace, where the two princes were left almoſt alone. Maximus, informed of their arrival before they had entered the palace, was for calling the Germans to his aſſiſtance, but was therein oppoſed by Balbinus. For theſe two princes were not, for all their great qualities, free from private jealouſies. Balbinus was piqued at the extraordinary honours

The Carpi, Goths, and Perſians, threaten the Romans with war.

The prætorian guards mutiny.

Jealouſies between the emperors.

[e] Max. & Balb. vit. p. 167, 171.

honours which the ſenate had heaped upon his collegue, as if the death of Maximinus, and bleſſings thence accruing, had been chiefly owing to him; and beſides, looked upon him as one greatly inferior to himſelf in birth and nobility. On the other hand, Maximus, knowing himſelf to be by far the better and abler commander, tacitly claimed on that ſcore the chief authority. Theſe mutual jealouſies, though prudently concealed, and rather gueſſed at by others, than ſeen, bred ſome miſunderſtanding between them, and occaſioned in the end the ruin of both. For Balbinus, not giving credit to what he was told of the deſigns of the prætorian guards, but rather ſuſpecting that his collegue intended to employ the Germans againſt him, would not ſuffer Maximus, to whom they were greatly attached, to ſend for them. This occaſioned a warm diſpute, and gave time to the prætorian guards to break into the palace, and diſperſe ſuch of the emperors friends and domeſtics as offered to oppoſe them. When they came to the apartment where the two princes were, they ruſhed upon them with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, tore in pieces their imperial robes, dragged them out of the palace with a deſign to carry them to their camp, wounded and inſulted them in a moſt dangerous manner. But, while they were hurrying them through the city to the camp, being informed, that the Germans had taken arms, and were advancing to reſcue the princes out of their hands, they killed them both, and leaving their bodies in the ſtreet, retired to the camp, carrying with them young Gordian, whom they proclaimed emperor, giving out, to appeaſe the populace, that they had killed thoſe whom the people had at firſt rejected, and ſet up in their room the perſon whom they had demanded. The Germans, informed that the emperors were killed, retired, without committing any hoſtilities, to their quarters without the city. Thus Gordian remained in peaceable poſſeſſion of the empire [d]. Maximus and Balbinus had reigned about one year and two months.

They are both killed. Gordian proclaimed emperor.

Of the deſcent and birth of Gordian we have ſpoken above. He was, according to Herodian, the ſon of Junius Balbus, by the ſiſter of Gordian the younger, from whom he borrowed the name of M. Antoninus Gordianus, as he is ſtyled in all the antient inſcriptions [e]. He was about thirteen years old when he came to the empire, and conſequently muſt have been born in the year 225, the fourth of Alexander's reign

His excellent qualifications.

[d] Herod. p. 621. Max. & Balb. vit. p. 170. [e] Herod. l. vii. p. 605. Occo. Goltz. Onuph. &c.

reign. He was a youth of a gay temper, comely aſpect, and exceeding ſweet diſpoſition, which gained him the love of all who approached him. Capitolinus tells us, that he was beloved by perſons of all ranks, more than any prince had ever been before him. The ſenate uſed to ſtyle him their ſon, the ſoldiers their child, and the people their darling. He was addicted to ſtudy and learning, and well inſtructed in moſt branches of polite literature. He had all the neceſſary qualifications for forming an excellent prince; but as he wanted experience, and ſuch a mother to direct and adviſe him as Mamæa, in the beginning of his reign, he fell into the hands of one Maurus and ſome other crafty freed-men and eunuchs, who, playing booty, and abuſing the confidence he repoſed in them, perſuaded him to do many things, which he ever after regretted. They ſoon drove all good men from the court, raiſed to the firſt employments perſons altogether unworthy of them, plundered the exchequer, and did all the miſchief which wicked and avaricious miniſters are capable of doing [f]. In the beginning of the year, the young prince entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, to which he had been named in the reign of Maximus and Balbus, and took for his collegue Aviola. This year he entertained the people with magnificent ſports, in order to make them forget their paſt heats and animoſities. The following year, when Sabinus was conſul, the ſecond time, with Venuſtus, Sabinianus revolted in Africa, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor; but the governor of Mauritania reduced the rebels to ſuch ſtreights, that they delivered up Sabinianus to him, acknowledged their fault, and ſubmitted. All the partizans of Sabinianus were pardoned [g]; but what was his fate, we are no-where told. The next year, the emperor took upon him his ſecond conſulſhip, having Pompeianus Civica for his collegue. The young prince married this year Furia Sabina Tranquillina, the daughter of Miſitheus, who was immediately honoured with the title of Auguſta; but whether he had any children by her, hiſtory does not inform us. The emperor choſe Miſitheus for his father-in-law, purely on account of his great wiſdom, integrity, and learning; and appointed him captain of the guards, that he might have a perſon of his extraordinary talents with whom to adviſe, not daring to truſt to his own judgment. Miſitheus had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of that important employment, than he Is deceived and impoſed upon by his miniſters.

Miſitheus, captain of the guards, and father-in-law to the emperor.

[f] Herod. l. viii p. 621. Gord. vit. p. 160—164. [g] Gord. vit. p. 161. Zoſ. l. i. p. 640.

he acquainted the emperor with the miſdemeanour of Maurus, and baſe practices of the other freed-men and eunuchs, who were thereupon all diſcharged and baniſhed the court. From a letter of Miſitheus to the emperor, quoted by Capitolinus, it appears, that the young prince had been ſtrangely miſled, and groſly impoſed upon by that infamous crew (T); and from the emperor's anſwer to it, that he was ſenſible of his former miſconduct, and deſirous to correct his faults; to know the truth, and to employ only ſuch perſons, as would ſpeak it without flattery or diſguiſe (U). He reſpected

(T) This letter was conceived in the following terms: "It is "with the greateſt pleaſure I congratulate you upon the alteration of times. Every thing was formerly bought and ſold by "the eunuchs, and ſuch as pretended to be your friends, but "were in reality your greateſt enemies. I am glad that this "blot is removed from your reign; the more, becauſe you are "glad of it yourſelf; which will convince the world, that the "diſorders hitherto complained of ought not to be imputed to "you. All poſts in the army have been diſpoſed of to perſons no-"ways qualified for them; others have been denied the rewards "due to their ſervices; innocent perſons have been condemned, "and ſuch as were guilty ſaved; the public revenues miſapplied, "the exchequer plundered, &c. But theſe, and many diſorders, "will be no longer imputed to you, but to thoſe who entered "into cabals to deceive you, to remove from the court all per-"ſons of virtue, honour, and integrity, and to introduce in their "room men as wicked as themſelves, that they might make you "a property to their evil deſigns. But now your eyes are open-"ed, you have begun to reform the ſtate, and many diſorders "have been already redreſſed. I reckon it my greateſt happi-"neſs to be father-in-law to ſo good a prince; a prince who, "without truſting to others, examines into every thing himſelf, "and has baniſhed from his court thoſe, who, conſulting not his "honour, but their own intereſt, led him aſtray (34)."

(U) The emperor returned to his father-in-law the following anſwer: "If the immortal gods had not protected the Roman "empire, I had been deluded, and, together with the empire, "utterly ruined by ſlaves and eunuchs. I am now fully convin-"ced, that Felix ought not to have been truſted with the com-"mand of the guards, nor Serapammo with that of the fourth "legion. But not to mention all my errors, I own, that I have "done many things amiſs, and now return thanks to the gods "for having by your means diſcovered many things to me, which have ſpected Miſitheus as his father, gave him that title, ordered him to call him his ſon, and returned thanks to the ſenate for diſtinguiſhing his father-in-law with the titles of father of princes, and guardian of the republic [a]; titles which he well deſerved, being one of the few miniſters who are ſaid to have had nothing in view, but the glory of their prince and the welfare of the ſtate [b]. This year, happened a dreadful earthquake, which overturned a great many cities, and deſtroyed an infinite number of people [c]. The following year, when C. Vettius Aufidius Atticus and C. Aſinius Prætextatus were conſuls, Rome was alarmed with news from the eaſt, where the Perſians, under the conduct of Sapor, ſon and ſucceſſor to Artaxerxes, the reſtorer of the Perſian monarchy, had entered the Roman dominions at the head of a mighty army, reduced all Meſopotamia, with the cities of Niſibis and Carrhæ; and entering Syria, committed moſt dreadful ravages in that province, putting all to fire and ſword. Capitolinus writes, that he had made himſelf maſter of Antioch itſelf, and threatened to over-run the other provinces, moſt of the Romans who defended them having, through fear, liſted themſelves in his army. Gordian reſolved to march in perſon againſt ſo formidable an enemy; and accordingly having cauſed the temple of Janus to be opened, according to the antient cuſtom, which had been long omitted, and perhaps was never after practiſed, he ſet out from Rome this year 242, the fourth of his reign, with a numerous and well diſciplined army; and taking his rout through Mœſia, defeated in that province the Goths and Sarmatians, who diſputed his paſſage, and obliged them to abandon their conqueſts, and return to their reſpective countries [d]. However,

(34) Gord. vit. p. 161.

Sapor, king of Perſia, over-runs the Roman dominions in the eaſt.

[a] Gord. vit. p. 161. [b] Idem, p. 163. [c] Idem, p. 162.
[d] Idem, p. 163.

" have been hitherto maliciouſly concealed from me. Maurus " entering into a confederacy with Gaudianus, Reverendus, and " Montanus, who confirmed what he ſaid, impoſed upon me; " ſo that, whatever they approved or condemned, I accepted or " rejected, relying entirely upon their integrity. Unhappy there- " fore is that prince, who has not ſuch about him, as will tell " him the truth without diſguiſe. For as he cannot immediate- " ly know what paſſes among his people, he muſt underſtand it " by the relation of others, and take his meaſures according to " their information (35)."

(35) Idem ibid.

ever, he was overcome in a tumultuary engagement by the Alani, in the celebrated plains of Philippi in Macedon, or, as others will have it, of Philippopolis in Thrace [e]. But the barbarians neglected, it ſeems, to improve their victory, and withdrew; for Gordian purſued his march unmoleſted through Thrace, and paſſing the Helleſpont, arrived ſafe in Aſia. To this paſſage perhaps alludes the ſhip, which is to be ſeen on ſome of his medals bearing no date [f]. From the Helleſpont he marched through Aſia into Syria, where he gained ſignal advantages over the enemy, of which hiſtorians give us but a confuſed account. However, they all agree, that he overcame the Perſians in ſeveral battles; that he recovered the cities of Niſibis and Carrhæ, and obliged the mighty Sapor, with his powerful and numerous army, to abandon the Roman dominions, and retire with ſhame and diſgrace into his own country, whither he purſued him as far as Cteſiphon [g]. Theſe ſucceſſes were chiefly owing to the wiſe counſels and directions of the brave Miſitheus, as the emperor himſelf acknowledged, in a letter which he wrote to the ſenate upon his arrival at Niſibis in Meſopotamia. In that letter he firſt acquaints the ſenate with the advantages he had gained over the barbarians in Macedon and Thrace; then coming to his victories over the Perſians, he tells them, that he had delivered the Antiochians from the Perſian yoke, recovered Carrhæ and other cities, and was arrived at Niſibis, whence he deſigned to proceed to Cteſiphon, provided the gods, adds he, continue their protection to us, and preſerve Miſitheus, my father, and captain of the guards, by whoſe wiſe conduct we have atchieved theſe, and hope to atchieve ſtill greater, things. It is incumbent upon you, conſcript fathers, to appoint public proceſſions, to recommend us to the gods, and to return thanks to Miſitheus. Upon the receipt of this letter, the ſenate decreed a triumph to the emperor, and a triumphal chariot to Miſitheus, with a pompous inſcription, ſtyling him the father of princes, captain of the guards, and the guardian of the republic [h]. This inſcription, which was placed on the baſis of his triumphal ſtatue, is ſtill to be ſeen at Rome almoſt entire. But the happineſs which the whole empire enjoyed under the government of Gordian, and the wiſe adminiſtration of Miſitheus, was ſhort-lived. The latter died the following year in the conſulſhip of Arrianus and Papus, and by his laſt will left the Roman people his heirs. We are told, that

He is defeated by Gordian, and obliged to retire.

Gordian is decreed a triumph, and Miſitheus a triumphal ſtatue.

Miſitheus dies.

[e] Idem, p. 165. Aur. Vict. Eutrop.
[f] Birag. p. 339.
[g] Gord. vit. p. 162.
[h] Idem, p. 160.

that Miſitheus being ill of a flux, the phyſicians preſcribed him a remedy to ſtop it, which, by the contrivance of Julius Philippus, of whom hereafter, was exchanged, and another adminiſtered in its room, which, as it had a quite contrary effect, put an end to his life. Upon his death, Philip was appointed captain of the guards, and commander in chief under the emperor of all the forces of the eaſt; for of him Gordian did not entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion [i]. The following year, when Peregrinus and Æmilianus were conſuls, the emperor entered the Perſian dominions, in order to purſue the war, which he had ſo ſucceſsfully begun. Plotinus, the celebrated philoſopher, liſted himſelf in his army, hoping by that means to have an opportunity of conferring with the Perſian and Indian philoſophers [k]. The philoſopher was then in the thirty-ninth year of his age, which, according to the chronology of Porphyrius, the author of his life, anſwers the preſent year, the 243d of the chriſtian æra and ſixth of Gordian's reign.

Julius Philippus, captain of the guards, in his room.

PHILIP no ſooner ſaw himſelf raiſed to the important poſt of captain of the guards, than he began to aſpire at the ſovereignty itſelf. As the ſoldiers were greatly attached to the young prince, in order to leſſen their affection to him, he ſometimes led them into places where no proviſions could be found; at other times ſent in his name the veſſels, which attended the army, loaded with corn, another way, hoping that the troops, diſtreſſed for want of neceſſaries, would, notwithſtanding their attachment to Gordian, begin to mutiny; which they did accordingly, the moſt turbulent among them, whom Philip had gained, whiſpering about in the mean time, that Gordian, a youth only nineteen years old, was not fit to command ſuch powerful forces; that they wanted ſuch a general as Philip, whom long experience had taught how to govern an empire, how to command an army [l]. Gordian, however, advanced againſt Sapor, and meeting him in Meſopotamia, gave him a total overthrow on the banks of the Aboras, or Aburas, and obliged him to take ſhelter in the heart of his own dominions [m]. But while the young conqueror was purſuing the advantages of his victory, Philip, who had already gained the chief officers of his army, led the troops through barren and deſert countries, where, through want of proviſions, which they aſcribed to want of experience in Gordian,

[i] Idem, p. 162. Zoſ. l. i. p. 641. [k] Porphyr. vit. Plot. p. 2. [l] Gord. vit. p. 163. Zoſ. l. i. p. 641. [m] Ammian. l. xxiii.

Gordian, they openly mutinied, and demanded, that Philip might reign in conjunction with Gordian, as his guardian and governor. The virtuous young emperor, unwilling to ſhed Roman blood, granted them their requeſt, and took Philip for his partner in the empire, who, ſeeing himſelf upon the level with his ſovereign, ſoon began to uſurp an authority over him, and to diſpoſe of all employments, as if he had been ſole emperor. This Gordian could not bear, and therefore attempted to depoſe him; but Philip's party prevailing, he was himſelf depoſed, and in the end murdered by the uſurper. Capitolinus writes, that Gordian, finding himſelf reduced to a private life, offered to ſerve under Philip as captain of the guards, and even condeſcended to beg his life; at which demand, Philip began to relent; but afterwards, conſidering how dear the young prince was to the ſenate and people of Rome, and not doubting, but they would uſe their utmoſt efforts to reinſtate him in the ſovereignty, he commanded him to be ſlain [n]. Other writers take no notice of theſe particulars, which, if true, betray great meanneſs and want of courage in Gordian; but only tell us, that Philip cauſed him to be murdered, and reigned in his room. His death happened, according to the moſt probable opinion, founded on the authority of the code [o], about the beginning of March, after he had lived nineteen years, and reigned five years and eight months. He was killed on the furtheſt borders of Perſia, in the place where his tomb was ſtill to be ſeen in the year 363, beyond the Euphrates and the Aboras, between the cities of Cercuſa, which ſtood near the conflux of thoſe two rivers, and that of Dura, which ſtands very near the latter, and is about twenty miles diſtance from the former, river. The place was called Zantha or Zaïthe [p]. There the ſoldiers erected to the memory of the deceaſed emperor a ſtately tomb with the following epitaph in the Greek, Latin, Perſian, Hebrew, and Egyptian tongues, that it might be read by all nations; To the deified Gordian, who conquered the Perſians, Goths, and Sarmatians, ſuppreſſed the civil diſcords, ſubdued the Germans, but could not overcome the Philips. The laſt words allude, according to Capitolinus, to his having been evercome by the Alani in the plains of Philippi, and his being killed by Philip [q]. But we can hardly perſuade

He induces the ſoldiers to mutiny.

Gordian depoſed.

And ſlain.

His tomb and epitaph.

[n] Gord. vit. p. 163, 165. [o] Cod. Juſt. l. ix. tit. 2. leg 7. p. 813, &c. [p] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 244—246. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 716. Noris epiſt. p. 287. [q] Gord. vit. p. 165.

perſuade ourſelves, that this epitaph was put up during the reign of the emperor Philip. The ſame writer adds, that Licinius, who pretended to derive his pedigree from Philip, cauſed this epitaph to be taken down. Victor the younger writes, that the body of Gordian was interred in that tomb; but Eutropius and Feſtus aſſure us, that it was conveyed to Rome, where the deceaſed prince was with the uſual ceremonies ranked among the gods. The ſenate granted this extraordinary privilege to the Gordian family, that they might for ever be exempted from taking upon them, unleſs it were by their own choice, guardianſhips, embaſſies, or any other public duty whatever [r]. All thoſe who had imbrued their hands in the blood of this excellent prince, periſhed ſoon after [s]. Capitolinus writes, that they diſpatched themſelves with the ſame ſwords which they had employed againſt him [t] (W).

Philip,

[r] Gord. vit. p. 164. [s] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 246. [t] Gord. vit. p. 165.

(W) The writers who flouriſhed under Gordian were, Cenſorinus, who wrote, or rather finiſhed, his famous book, intitled de die natali, in the firſt year of that prince's reign, the ſecond of the 254th olympiad, the 991ſt of Rome, when the Capitoline games were celebrated the thirty-ninth time (36). All theſe particulars give great light to chronology. He wrote the above-mentioned book, deſigning it as a preſent to one of his friends, by name Q. Cerellius, againſt his birth-day. Thence he takes occaſion to treat of the birth of man, and to make many learned obſervations on days, months, and years. This work was known to, and greatly eſteemed by, Apollinaris Sidonius and Caſſiodorus, of whom the latter quotes a book, written by Cenſorinus, on accents; but of that work only ſome fragments have reached our times, quoted by Priſcian, who ſtyles Cenſorinus a very learned grammarian (37). He is, by the beſt critics, looked upon as the moſt exact writer of his time (38) Cenſorinus himſelf quotes, as a work of his own, a book intitled indigitamentorum, in which he took particular notice of all the gods, who, in the opinion of the pagans, contributed to the life of man (39). Herodian wrote, in eight books, the hiſtory of the emperors, from the death of M. Aurelius to that of Maximus and Balbinus. He aſſures us, that he wrote nothing but what he himſelf had ſeen; ſo that he muſt have died very old;

(36) Cenſor. de die natal. c. 8. p. 131, 132, &c. 21. p. 155, 156. (37) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l ii. c. 3. (38) Vide append. ad Cyprian. diſſert. c. 9. (39) Cenſor. c. 3. p. 17.

PHILIP was by birth an Arabian, being born in Boſtra, a city of Arabia Petræa. He was of a very mean deſcent; for Birth and extraction of Philip.

old; for his work comprehends the ſpace of ſixty eight or ſeventy years (40). All we know of his life is, that he was at Rome in the latter end of the reign of Commodus (41), and had ſeveral employments under the ſucceeding emperors (42). As for his hiſtory, Photius commends his ſtyle as noble and ſublime, and at the ſame time clear, and free from all affectation (43). Capitolinus, who in many places only tranſlates and copies him, beſtows great encomiums upon his writings, but at the ſame time cenſures him, and with a great deal of reaſon, as too favourable to Maximinus, and highly prejudiced againſt Alexander (44). Voſſius and others approve of this cenſure (45); whence, in our hiſtory of the reigns of theſe two princes, we have preferred the authority of Capitolinus to his. He omits the dates, and many other things, which would have cleared up great difficulties in hiſtory and chronology, and ſeems to have been quite unacquainted with geography, as appears from the account he gives us of the rout, which he ſuppoſes the emperor Alexander's forces to have taken, when that prince marched againſt the Perſians. Under Gordian likewiſe flouriſhed Arrian, a Greek hiſtorian, quoted by Capitolinus in his hiſtory of the reigns of Maximinus and Gordian (46); and Ælius Junius Cordus, often quoted by the Auguſtine hiſtorians (47). He wrote the lives of the emperors, from Trajan to the two Gordians; but filled his hiſtory, according to Capitolinus, with many impertinent and trifling accounts, telling his readers how many ſuits of cloaths each emperor had, what number of courtiers and domeſtics, &c. (48). Voſſius places him among the Latin hiſtorians, with Ælius Sabinus, who wrote the life of Maximinus, Vulcanius Terentianus, author of the lives of the three Gordians, in whoſe times they lived, and Curius Fortunatianus, who wrote the hiſtory of the reign of the two Maximins (49). Some pretend, that the hiſtory of Fortunatianus is ſtill extant, and lodged in the emperor's library; nay, that it was formerly printed in Italy. To this Fortunatianus, Voſſius aſcribes the

(40) Herod. l. i. p. 465, & l. ii. p. 514. (41) Idem. l. i. p. 484. (42) Idem ibid. p. 465. (43) Phot. c. 99. p. 276. (44) Maximin. vit. p. 143. Alex. vit p. 134. (45) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. p. 239. (46) Voſſ. ibid. l. iv. p. 17. Maximin. vit. p. 150. (47) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii c. 3. p. 179. Macrin. vit, p. 93. (48) Gord. vit. p 152, 160. (49) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 3. Max. vit. p. 150. Gord. vit. p. 160.

for his father is ſaid to have been a famous captain of robbers in that country [w]. In the antient inſcriptions he is ſtyled M. Julius Philippus, and his wife Marcia Otacilia Severa. He had a ſon, named likewiſe Philip, born in the year 237, and conſequently ſeven years old when his father came to the empire. The emperor himſelf was at that time, according to the chronicle of Alexandria [x], about forty; but Aurelius Victor ſuppoſes him to have been much older. Whether or no Philip was the firſt chriſtian emperor, has been the ſubject of great diſputes among the learned. The affirmative ſeems to us by far the moſt probable, being maintained by the following writers, viz. Jerom, Chryſoſtom, Dionyſius of Alexandria, Zonaras, Nicephorus, Cedrenus, Rufinus, the chronicle of Alexandria, Syncellus, Oroſius, Jornandes, the anonymous writer publiſhed by Valeſius, with Ammianus Marcellinus, the learned cardinal Bona, Abulfaragius, Vincentius Lirinenſis, and Huetius. The arguments which ſome modern critics have alledged in favour of the oppoſite opinion, are not of weight enough with us to bear down the authority of ſo many eminent writers; nay, moſt of them have but little or no force in themſelves, and only prove, that Philip was guilty of ſeveral actions highly diſcountenanced by the chriſtian religion; ſuch as his murdering his ſovereign; his ſtyling him a god; his aſſiſting at the public ſhews, which were always attended with idolatrous ceremonies, and his being deified after his death. But in all times there have been chriſtians, whoſe lives were a diſgrace to their profeſſion; and in that number ſome rank the preſent emperor, tho' there are not wanting writers of no ſmall account, who, bating the murder of Gordian, for which, they ſay, he atoned by ſubmitting to a public penance, think he did nothing inconſiſtent with the principles of the religion which the three books on rhetoric, which have reached our times, under the name of Curius Fortunatianus Conſultus, and are deſervedly eſteemed by the learned (50). In the reign of the emperor Conſtantine were ſtill extant ſome books of epigrams by Fabilius a Greek grammarian, and one of the præceptors of Maximinus the younger, and various poems written by Toxotius, a ſenator of the family of Antoninus Pius. He married Junia Fadilla, formerly betrothed to young Maximinus, and died ſoon after he had diſcharged the office of prætor (51).

Whether the firſt chriſtian emperor.

[w] Gord. vit. p. 163. Zonar. p. 229. Vict. epit. [x] Chron. Alexand. p. 630.

(50) Voſſ. ibid. (51) Maximin. vit. p. 148.

which he profeſſed: and truly we are no-where told, that he demanded of the ſenate the apotheoſis of Gordian. He uſed indeed, as we read in Capitolinus, to honour that prince, when he mentioned his name, with the title of divus, the deified Gordian; but that title was given even by Conſtantine after his converſion, and by other chriſtian emperors, to the princes who had reigned before them, as appears from their reſcripts. Philip is ſaid by Victor the younger to have been preſent at the public ſhews that were exhibited on occaſion of the thouſandth year of Rome; but that he aſſiſted at the religious, or rather idolatrous, ceremonies, which uſually preceded the ſports, we find no-where recorded. His being deified after his death was no crime in him, but a kind of compliment paid by the ſenate to moſt emperors: the ſame honour was conferred upon Mamæa the mother of Alexander; and yet no one pretends to infer from thence, that ſhe was not a chriſtian. But to proceed to the hiſtory of this prince's reign: Upon the death of Gordian, Philip was acknowledged emperor by the whole army, on the fourteenth of March of the year 244. The new prince no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the ſovereign power, than he declared his ſon Cæſar, and took him, tho' but ſeven years old, for his partner in the empire. He then wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the death of Gordian, which he falſely aſcribed to a natural diſtemper, and with his own election [y]. Some authors write, that the ſenate believing, or pretending to believe him, confirmed without heſitation the choice of the ſoldiery; while others pretend, that the ſenate did not acknowledge Philip, till M. Marcius and L. Aurelius Severus Hoſtilianus, two ſenators of great diſtinction, whom they ſucceſſively created emperors, were ſnatched away by ſudden deaths [z]. Philip, deſirous to return to Rome, immediately concluded a peace with the Perſians, and led back his army into Syria. Zonaras writes, that he yielded to Sapor Meſopotamia and Armenia; but ſoon after broke the treaty, and recovered, to the great ſatisfaction of the Romans, both countries [a]. Be that as it will, he arrived at Antioch before Eaſter, which, according to Euſebius [b], was celebrated this year on the fourteenth of April, and went with the empreſs to aſſiſt at the prayers and ſacred ceremonies that were performed by the primitive chriſtians the night preceding that great feſtival. But Babylas, who was then biſhop of Antioch, and afterwards ſuffer-

He takes his ſon for his partner in the empire.

He concludes a peace with the Perſians.

[y] Gord. vit. p. 164. [z] Zonar. p. 229. Onuph. p. 260. Cedren. p. 257. [a] Zonar. ibid. [b] Euſeb. l. vi. c. 34.

ed martyrdom under Decius, appriſed of his coming, went out to meet him; reproached him with the murder of his ſovereign; declared him unworthy of being admitted into the congregation of the faithful; and ſtopping him with his hand, proteſted, that he would by no means ſuffer him to enter the ſacred place, unleſs he made a public confeſſion of his ſins, and ranked himſelf among the penitents. The emperor with great humility ſubmitted to both, and was thereupon by the holy biſhop admitted into the church. This St. Chryſoſtom [c] and ſeveral other writers relate as a thing altogether certain; but Euſebius ſpeaks of it as what in his time was ſaid to have happened [d]. It was probably on this occaſion, that Origen wrote both to Philip and to his wife Severa, which St. Jerom miſtakes for his mother, commending their piety, and putting them in mind of their duty [e]. Both theſe letters were ſtill extant in St. Jerom's time [f]; that is, about the end of the fourth century. From Syria the emperor ſet out for Rome, where he was received with the uſual demonſtrations of joy by the ſenate and people, whoſe affections, tho' they at firſt ſeemed averſe to him, he ſoon gained by his mild adminiſtration and obliging behaviour [g]. He appointed his brother Priſcus commander in chief of the troops in Syria, and Severianus, his father-in-law, of the forces in Mœſia and Macedon, perſons but ill qualified for thoſe important poſts [h]. As the works of Trebellius Pollio and others, who wrote the lives of Philip and his ſucceſſors to Valerian, have not reached our times, we cannot help borrowing many things of Zoſimus; but we think it incumbent upon us to acquaint our readers, that he was a profeſſed and implacable enemy to the chriſtian religion, and therefore omits no opportunity of blackening the character of Philip, and crying up his ſucceſſor Decius, by whom the church was moſt cruelly perſecuted.

He ſubmits to be ranked in the church among the penitents.

He gains the affections of the people at Rome.

THE following year, the emperor entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, having Titianus for his collegue; and ſoon after, leaving the city, marched againſt the Carpi, who, paſſing the Danube, had invaded Mœſia, and laid waſte great part of that province. The emperor defeated them in two battles, and obliged them to repaſs the Danube, and ſue for peace; which Defeats the Carpi.

[c] Chryſoſ. de S. Babyla, contra Gentil. tom. 1. p. 656, 657. Pariſ. ann. 1636. [d] Euſeb. l. vi. c. 34. [e] Idem, ibid. c. 36. Vincent. Lirin. c. 23. Ruſin. c. 26. [f] Hier. vit. illuſt. vir. c. 54. p. 285. [g] Aur. Vict. Zoſ. l. i. p. 646. [h] Idem, p. 642, 643.

which he readily granted, and returned to Rome [i]. The next year, when Præſens and Albinus were conſuls, nothing happened at Rome, or in the provinces, which hiſtorians have thought worth tranſmitting to poſterity, except the burning by accidental fire of the theatre of Pompey, and another ſtately building called Centum Columnæ, or the Hundred Pillars. In the beginning of the following year, the emperor entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having his ſon for his collegue, whom he honoured with the title of Auguſtus, and inveſted with the tribunitial power [k]. Both princes retained the faſces all this and the following year, to celebrate with the greater pomp and magnificence the thouſandth year of Rome, begun on the twenty-firſt of April of the year 247 of the chriſtian æra and fifth of Philip's reign, according to the computation of Varro, which was then, and is ſtill, followed by moſt hiſtorians and chronologers. Extraordinary rejoycings were made at Rome, ſhews of all kinds exhibited for ten days together, and an incredible number of wild beaſts, reſerved by Gordian for his triumph over the Perſians, killed, and diſtributed among the people [l]. Oroſius writes, that the pious emperor turned this extraordinary ſolemnity to the honour of Chriſt and his church [m]. We wiſh he had informed us in what manner. This year the emperor publiſhed an edict truly worthy of a chriſtian prince, forbidding under the ſevereſt penalties all manner of unnatural luſt, and thoſe infamous practices which had long prevailed in Rome, being countenanced by the wicked, and tolerated by the good, princes [n]. The following year, when Æmilianus was, the ſecond time, conſul with Julius Aquilinus, the eaſtern provinces, no longer able to pay the taxes with which they were loaded, nor bear with the haughty conduct of Priſcus their governor, (we follow Zoſimus for want of a better guide) openly revolted, and proclaimed one Papianus, or Jetopianus, emperor; but he was ſoon killed, and with his death put an end to the diſturbances on that ſide [o]. At the ſame time, the provinces of Mœſia and Pannonia revolted, continues Zoſimus, and ſet up one P. Carvilius Marinus, who was but a centurion. Hereupon Philip, in great conſternation, beſought the ſenate either to enable him to quaſh the rebellion, or to depoſe him, if they were diſſatisfied with his conduct. This unexpected

The thouſandth year of Rome.

Unnatural luſt ſuppreſſed at Rome.

Several rebellions.

[i] Idem, p 641. [k] Onuph. p. 260. Goltz. p. 107.
[l] Pagi, p. 247. Spanh. l. iii. p. 147. [m] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 10.
[n] Alex. vit. p. 121, Aur. Vict. [o] Zoſ. l. i. p. 642.

ſpeech ſurpriſed the ſenate; but Decius, while the other ſenators continued ſilent, addreſſing the emperor, told him, that he had no reaſon to fear Marinus, whoſe preſumption, as he was unequal to any great undertaking, would ſoon prove his ruin. What Decius had foretold, happened a few days after, when Marinus was killed by thoſe very perſons who had raiſed him to the empire. Hereupon Philip recalling his father-in-law Severianus, obliged Decius, much againſt his will, to accept of the government of Mœſia and Pannonia in his room. He no ſooner appeared there, than the ſoldiers proclaimed him emperor, and forced him to accept the ſovereignty, by threatening to put him to death, if he declined it. Fear therefore getting the better of his fidelity, he ſuffered himſelf to be arrayed with the imperial purple, and the ſoldiers to ſwear allegiance to him [p]. Zonaras tells us, that he immediately wrote to Philip, aſſuring him that he deſigned to reſign the ſovereignty as ſoon as he reached Rome [q]. But Philip, without relying upon ſuch promiſes, marched with all poſſible expedition againſt the uſurper, hoping to ſurpriſe him. His ſon he left at Rome, with a detachment of the prætorian guards, to keep the city in awe. Decius having timely notice of his march and approach, received him with his troops in battle array. Hereupon a battle enſued, in which great numbers of Philip's men were cut in pieces, and the reſt obliged to retire to Verona, where he himſelf was killed by the army [r], whether by his own, or by that of Decius, we are not told. The news of his death no ſooner reached Rome, than the prætorian guards diſpatched his ſon who was then in their camp. Such was the end of the emperor Philip, after he had reigned five years and ſome months; for he was proclaimed emperor on the 14th of March of the year 244, and killed after the ſeventeenth of June of the year 249, as appears from the dates of his laws [s]. Both he and his ſon were, according to Eutropius, ranked among the gods; which, however injurious to the memory and religion of Philip, ſhews, that his adminiſtration was not diſpleaſing to the ſenate, though he had ſucceeded Gordian, a prince ſo much and ſo univerſally beloved. Euſebius and Dionyſius of Alexandria, who was raiſed to that ſee in his reign, tell us, that under him the chriſtian religion was publicly preached; that it flouriſhed and Decius declared emperor by the troops in Illyricum.

Philip overcome and killed.

[p] Idem, ibid. & p. 643. [q] Zonar. p. 229. [r] Zoſ. l. i. p. 643. Aur. Vict. Zonar. p. 229. [s] Cod. Juſt. l. ix. tit. 32 leg. 6. p. 489. & l. viii. tit. 56. leg. 1. p. 804, &c.

and encreaſed more than it had done under any other prince [t]; And no wonder, adds the former writer, without explaining himſelf any further; but meaning, as to us ſeems plain from the context, that he profeſſed it himſelf [u]. Gregory of Nyſſa writes, that, in the reign of Philip, all the inhabitants of the city and territory of Neocæſarea in Pontus being converted to chriſtianity, the idols were every-where overturned with their altars and temples, and churches erected in their room to the honour of the true God [w]. Of Philip the ſon authors obſerve, that he was of ſuch a grave, or rather melancholy, temper, that no one could, by any contrivance, ever make him laugh or ſmile; and add, that his father one day breaking into a loud laughter, he could not help turning away his face, and expreſſing his diſpleaſure with a more grave and reſerved look than uſual [x]. Both he and his mother Marcia Otacilia Severa profeſſed, according to St. Jerom [y] and the chronicle of Alexandria [z], the chriſtian religion; nay, Petrus de Natalibus reckons the two Philips among the martyrs of the church [a], upon the authority of Oroſius, who writes, that Decius put them to death, either becauſe they were chriſtians, or that he might, when they were removed, perſecute the chriſtian religion [b]. But the authority of Oroſius, who lived many ages after, is of no great weight with us, unleſs confirmed by that of more antient writers. Euſebius ſays, that Decius perſecuted the church out of hatred to Philip [c]; but we cannot from thence conclude, that he put Philip to death on account of his religion. Of the authors who flouriſhed under him, we ſhall ſpeak in our note (X).

The chriſtian religion flouriſhed under him.

P 4 Upon

[t] Euſeb. l. vi. c. 36. p. 232. [u] Idem, c. 41. p. 238. [w] Greg. Nyſſ. vit. Greg. Thaumat. tom. 3. p. 563. [x] Vict epit. [y] Hier. chron. [z] Chron. Alexand. p. 630. [a] Pet. de Natal. catalog. ſanct. c. 92. p. 218. [b] Oroſ, l. vii. c. 21. [c] Euſeb. l. vi. c, 39

(X) Under Philip flouriſhed Nicagoras, a celebrated ſophiſt of Athens. He was the ſon of one Mneſeus, an orator, and wrote the lives of illuſtrious men (52). Philoſtratus reckons him and Apſinas among the great men of his time, with whom he was intimately acquainted (53). Minucianus, the ſon of Neagoras, publiſhed a book of rhetoric, on which Porphyrius wrote comments (54), and a ſmall treatiſe on ſyllogiſms, which has reached our

(52) Suid. p. 223. (53) Philoſ. ſoph. lix. p. 629. (54) Suid. p. 573.

UPON the death of Philip and his ſon, Decius was acknowledged emperor, firſt by the ſoldiery, and ſoon after by the ſenate and people, who wanted both ſtrength and courage to diſpute the election of the new prince. He was a native of Bubalia, or Budalia, a borough in the territory of Sirmium in Lower Pannonia, and, according to the chronicle of Alexandria [d], raiſed to the empire in the fifty-ſeventh, but according to Victor the younger, only in the forty-ſeventh year of his age. He had by his wife Herennia Etruſcilla four ſons, viz.

The birth and deſcent of Decius.

[d] Chron. Alexand. p. 632.

our times (55). Apſinas flouriſhed at the ſame time, and is greatly commended by Philoſtratus, on account of his exactneſs in writing and extraordinary memory (56): He was a native of Phœnicia; but ſpent great part of his life at Athens; and is thence by Suidas called an Athenian (57). Onaſimus, the Athenian ſophiſt, whom we muſt diſtinguiſh from another of the ſame name and profeſſion, born in Cyprus or Sparta, was the ſon of Apſinas, and father to another Apſinas, who ſeems to have flouriſhed under Conſtantine (58). Suidas mentions a third ſophiſt of this name, who flouriſhed under Maximian; but was a native of Gadara on the confines of Paleſtine and Syria, and attained to the rank and title of conſular (59). Major, an Arabian ſophiſt, flouriſhed likewiſe under Philip, and publiſhed thirteen books of rhetoric (60), none of which have reached us. Syncellus mentions one Theopompus a philoſopher, who became very famous at Cheronea in Bœotia (61); but of him no notice is taken either by Suidas, or any other writer. Aſinius Quadratus wrote the Roman hiſtory in the Ionic dialect, from the foundation of the city to the reign of Alexander, ſays Suidas (62); but he muſt have brought it down to the fifth year of Philip's reign, which was the thouſandth of Rome; for his book was intitled the χιλιας, or the thouſand years (63). This work is quoted by Stephanus the geographer, by the Auguſtine writers, by Zoſimus, and by Xiphilin; but it has been long ſince loſt. He likewiſe wrote the hiſtory of the Parthians, often quoted by the antients, and that of Germany. Of the former Stephanus cites the ninth book; and Agathias ſpeaking of the latter, tells us, that he was a native of Italy, and wrote with great exactneſs (64).

(55) Porphyr vit. c. 6. p. 51. Jonſ. l. iii. c. 14. (56) Philoſ. p. 623. (57) Suid. p. 523. (58) Idem ibid. (59) Idem ibid. (60) Euſeb. præp. evang. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. (61) Syncel. p. 362. (62) Suid. p. 1484. (63) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 16. p. 239. (64) Agath l. i. p. 17.

viz. Decius, Hoſtilianus, Etruſcus, and Trajan. The name of Meſſius was common to them all; whence we may conclude, that it was the name of the family. The emperor is ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions Caius Meſſius Quintus Trajanus Decius. He was, according to Zoſimus his panegyriſt, deſcended of an illuſtrious family, and endowed with every good quality [e]. Victor the younger ſtyles him the beſt of princes, and Vopiſcus equals him to the moſt renowned commanders of antiquity [f]. He was no ſooner inveſted with the ſovereignty, than he declared his eldeſt ſon Cæſar and prince of the youth. The ſame title he ſoon after beſtowed upon his three other ſons [g]. In the very beginning of his reign, he raiſed the moſt dreadful and bloody perſecution that had ever oppreſſed the church, prompted thereunto by his hatred to the deceaſed emperor, and his zeal for the cauſe of declining paganiſm, which he ſaw fatally undermined by the wonderful progreſs of chriſtianity. Concluding therefore, that the one could not be ſupported but by the utter ruin of the other, he enacted moſt cruel edicts againſt all who profeſſed the chriſtian religion; purſuant to which, the chriſtians were in all places driven from their habitations, ſtripped of their eſtates, dragged to execution like public malefactors, and racked with the moſt exquiſite torments cruelty itſelf could invent. The laws of nature and humanity were trod under foot; friend betrayed his friend, brother his brother, and children their parents; every one thinking it meritorious to betray a chriſtian and procure his death. It is eaſier, ſays Nicephorus, ſpeaking of this perſecution, to count the ſand on the ſea-ſhore, than the martyrs who ſuffered under Decius. The tyrant vented his rage chiefly upon the biſhops, of whom many were ſeized, inhumanly racked and executed, and among the reſt Fabian biſhop of Rome, Babylas biſhop of Antioch, and Alexander biſhop of Jeruſalem. Great numbers of chriſtians betook themſelves to barren mountains, rocks, and deſerts, chuſing rather to live amongſt wild beaſts, than men who had deveſted themſelves of all reaſon and humanity. Among theſe was the celebrated hermit Paul, who, withdrawing into the deſerts of Egypt, led there a ſolitary life for the ſpace of ninety years at leaſt, and became the father and founder of the order of anchorets [h]. This perſecution did not rage, at leaſt

His character.

His cruel perſecution of the church.

[e] Zoſ l. i. p. 641. [f] Aurel. Vict. p. 223. [g] Goltz. p. 109. Onuph. p. 261. Occo. p. 454. [h] Hier. vit. Paul. 237. Euſeb. l. iii. c. 39. Lact. perſec. c. 4. Greg. Nyſſ. vit. Thaum. p. 567. Cyp. diſ. xi. c. 53. Optat. l. iii. p. 71. Hilar. in Conſ. p. 113. Cyp. epiſt. 52.

leaſt with its firſt violence, above a year, as appears from the epiſtles of St. Cyprian [i], the emperor and magiſtrates being, by the invaſion of ſeveral barbarous nations, diverted from ſearching after the chriſtians; for about the end of the firſt year of Decius's reign, when he was conſul, for the ſecond time, with Vicius Gratus, the Scythians, that is, the Goths, having paſſed the Danube, under the conduct of their king Cniva, inveſted with ſeventy thouſand men the city of Euſterium in Lower Mœſia; but meeting there with a vigorous oppoſition from Gallus, who was afterwards emperor, they raiſed the ſiege of Euſterium, and ſat down before Nicopolis, another city in the ſame province. Againſt them Decius diſpatched his eldeſt ſon, at the head of a numerous and well diſciplined army; who, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut thirty thouſand of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire beyond mount Hæmus, which parted Mœſia from Thrace. However, they ſoon recruited their army, and entering Thrace, laid ſiege to Philippopolis on the Hebrus. Young Decius haſtened to the relief of the place; but while his troops were refreſhing themſelves, after a long march, in the neighbourhood of Berea, a city of the ſame province, Cniva, coming unawares upon them, cut the whole army in pieces, and obliged the young prince to ſave himſelf by flight into Mœſia. Cniva then returned before Philippopolis; and having made himſelf maſter of the place, put the inhabitants, to the number of one thouſand ſouls, ſays Ammianus [k], without diſtinction of ſex or age, to the ſword, ravaged Thrace, and laid waſte great part of Macedon [l], where L. Priſcus, probably brother to the late emperor, commanded at that time; but he, inſtead of oppoſing, joined the enemy, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Hereupon Decius, who had ſtaid at Rome to conſecrate the walls of the city, which he had ordered to be built, or rather repaired, immediately ſet out for Pannonia; where, in the beginning of the following year, he took upon him his third conſulſhip, and honoured with that dignity his eldeſt ſon, ſtyled in the inſcriptions of this year Q. Herennius Decius Cæſar; whence it is manifeſt, that the emperor had not yet conferred upon him the title of Auguſtus [m]. Decius overcame the Goths, ſays Zoſimus, in ſeveral engagements, obliged them to quit the booty they had taken, and drove them out of the Roman

Young Decius gains great advantages over the Goths.

But his army is in the end entirely cut off.

The Goths are overcome by the emperor.

[i] Cyp. epiſt. 36, &c. [k] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 446. [l] Zoſ. l. i. p. 644. Jornand. de reb. Goth. c. 18. p. 637. [m] Spanh. p. 234.

man dominions [n]. What that author writes is confirmed by ſeveral medals, mentioning his conqueſts in Dacia, and victories over the Carpi, who had probably joined the Goths [o]. Priſcus was declared by the ſenate a public enemy, and ſlain; but where, or in what manner, hiſtory does not inform us.

The office of cenſor re-eſtabliſhed.

From Thrace the emperor wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them, that he deſigned to re-eſtabliſh the office of cenſor, an antient magiſtracy of great authority, and leaving to them the choice of a perſon fit for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt. This employment, famous in the times of the republic, had been aboliſhed by the emperors, who diſcharged the functions annexed to it, without aſſuming the title; for, ſince Domitian's time, the title of cenſor had been quite laid aſide, and neglected by moſt of the princes who reigned before him [p]. The laſt private perſons who diſcharged that office, were Paulus Æmilius Lepidus and L. Munatius Plancus, in the year of Rome 732, the tenth of Auguſtus's reign, and twenty-ſecond before the birth of Chriſt. The ſenate, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, aſſembled in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux; and there, inſtead of waiting till their votes were aſked, cried out with one voice, as ſoon as the letter was read, Let Valerian be cenſor; let him cenſure and correct the faults of others, who has no faults of his own.

Valerian choſen cenſor.

Of Valerian, who was raiſed to the empire two years after, we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place. He was then in Thrace with Decius; who, upon his receiving the decree of the ſenate, cauſed it to be publicly read; exhorted Valerian not to decline an office, to which he had been named by the republic with ſuch extraordinary marks of eſteem and diſtinction; and explained to him the nature and importance of his new employment, with the authority and power annexed to it, which, he ſaid, extended over all perſons civil and military, of what rank and condition ſoever, except the governor of Rome, the conſuls for the time being, the pontiff ſtyled rex ſacrorum, and the ſuperior of the veſtal virgins, ſo long as, mindful of her vow, ſhe preſerved herſelf undefiled. Valerian, ſays the author of his life, earneſtly beſought the emperor not to lay a burden upon him, to which he was in every reſpect unequal [q]; but does not tell us whether he was in the end prevailed upon to ſubmit to it. Soon after the emperor marched againſt the Goths, overcame them, and reduced them to ſuch ſtreights, that they offered to ſet at liberty

Decius gains new advantages over the Goths.

[n] Zoſ. p. 543. [o] Oceo. p. 450. [p] Dio, l. liii. p. 598.
[q] Valer. vit. p. 173, 174.

liberty all the priſoners they had taken, and relinquiſh their booty, provided he would ſuffer them to retire unmoleſted. But the emperor, bent upon cutting off at once the whole nation, and delivering Rome from ſo troubleſome an enemy, without hearkening to their propoſals, ſent Trebonianus Gallus with a ſtrong detachment, to cut off their retreat; and purſuing them cloſe with the reſt of the army, came up with them before they reached the Danube, and engaged them a ſecond time. The Goths, knowing that all lay at ſtake, fought like men in deſpair. Young Decius ſignalized himſelf on this occaſion in a very eminent manner, and is ſaid to have killed many of the enemy with his own hand; but being in the end mortally wounded with an arrow, he fell from his horſe in the ſight of the whole army. The emperor, ſeeing him fall, cried out to his ſoldiers, without betraying the leaſt concern, We have loſt but one man; let not, fellow-ſoldiers, ſo ſmall a loſs diſcourage you. Having uttered theſe words, he ruſhed into the midſt of the enemy; but, inſtead of revenging the death of his ſon, he was himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides, overpowered, and killed. Thus Zoſimus [r] and Jornandes [s]. But Aurelius Victor and Zonaras tell us, that Gallus, who kept a private correſpondence with the Goths, adviſed them to encamp behind a moraſs, in which the emperor, while he attempted to paſs it, purſuant to the treacherous counſel of the ſame Gallus, periſhed with his ſon and the greateſt number of the army, partly ſuffocated in the mud, and partly deſtroyed by the ſhowers of arrows, which the barbarians diſcharged upon them, while they could neither advance nor retire [t]. The ſame writers add, that the bodies of the two princes could never be found. Euſebius [u] and the chronicle of Alexandria [w] only ſay, that the two Decii were killed by the treachery of one of their own officers. Lactantius writes, that Decius having engaged the Carpi, was by them ſurrounded, cut in pieces with great part of his army, and left unburied a prey to the ravens and wild beaſts. Thus, concludes that writer, an enemy to God, and a perſecutor of his church, deſerved to periſh [x]. St. Jerom likewiſe [y], St. Cyprian [z], and Conſtantine the Great [a], aſcribe

Young Decius is killed.

And likewiſe the emperor.

[r] Zoſ. l. i. p. 643. [s] Jornand. de reb. Goth. c. 18. p. 637. [t] Zonar. p. 231. Aur. Vict. in Dec. [u] Euſeb. chron. p. 236. [w] Chron. Alexand. p. 251. [x] Lactant. perſecut. c. 4. p. 4. 5. [y] Hier. in Zach. xiv. p. 285. [z] Cypr. epiſt. de lapſ. p. 238. [a] Conſtant. orat. apud eum. Euſeb. oper. c. 24. p. 600.

aſcribe the unhappy end of Decius to divine vengeance. With him periſhed, according to Euſebius, three of his ſons, viz. Decius, Etruſcus, and Trajan [b]. He had reigned two years and ſome months, and was, after his death, ranked among the gods with the uſual ceremonies.

The Roman army cut in pieces.

THE Goths, after the death of Decius, purſued their victory, and made a dreadful havock of the diſheartened army. Such of the Romans as eſcaped the general ſlaughter, fled to the legions commanded by Gallus; who, pretending a great concern for the unfortunate end of Decius and the defeat of his army, and feigning to march againſt the barbarians, gained the hearts of the ſoldiery, and was by them, with loud ſhouts of joy, proclaimed emperor. He immediately declared his ſon Voluſianus, Cæſar; married him to Herennia Etruſcilla, the daughter of the deceaſed prince; and, to remove all ſuſpicion of his being any-ways acceſſory to the misfortunes which had befallen him and his army, he adopted Hoſtilianus, his only ſurviving ſon; conferred upon him the title of Auguſtus; inveſted him with the tribunitial power; and named him conſul for the enſuing year [d]. Caius Vibius Trebonianus Gallus, as he is ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions, was, according to Victor the younger, a native of the iſland of Meninx on the coaſt of Africa, called afterwards Garba, and at preſent Gerbi and Zerbi. Of his family no mention is made by the writers who have reached us; and all we know of his employments is, that he commanded the troops on the frontiers of Mœſia in 250, and in the preſent year 251. He was, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, fifty-ſeven; but, according to Victor the younger, only forty-five, when raiſed to the empire. Hoſtilia Severa, honoured on ſome medals with the title of Auguſta, is ſuppoſed to have been his wife. His ſon is ſtyled in ſome inſcriptions C. Vibius Voluſianus, and in others Annius Gallus Trebonianus [e]. His election was no ſooner confirmed by the ſenate, than, inſtead of revenging the death of Decius and the overthrow of his army, he concluded a diſhonourable peace with the Goths; ſuffered them to retire unmoleſted with all their booty and priſoners, among whom were many Romans of great diſtinction; and even engaged to pay them yearly a conſiderable ſum, provided they continued quiet in their own country [f].

Gallus proclaimed emperor.

He concludes a diſhonourable peace with the Goths.

After

[b] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 1. p. 250. [c] Goltz. p. 108. [d] Zoſ. l. i. p. 644. Goltz. p. 111. Zonar. p. 644. [e] Golitz. p. 110. Occo. p. 457. [f] Goltz. ibid. Spon. hiſt. de Genev. p. 371. [g] Jornand. de reb. Goth. c. 19. p. 631. Zoſ. p. 644.

After this ignominious peace, he returned to Rome; and, in the beginning of the following year, entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, having his ſon for his collegue. He began his reign with reviving all the edicts which had been publiſhed by his predeceſſor againſt the chriſtians, and which he cauſed to be put in execution with the utmoſt rigor. At the ſame time, a dreadful plague, breaking out in Ethiopia on the confines of Egypt, ſpread in a ſhort time over all the provinces of the empire, and ſwept away incredible numbers of people, eſpecially at Rome, where it raged with great violence. Some authors write, that it carried off among the reſt Hoſtilianus, the ſon of Decius, ſoon after he had been honoured with the title of Auguſtus [h]; but Zoſimus aſſures us, that Gallus cauſed him to be put to death, and then gave out, that he was dead of the plague [i]. The ſame year was remarkable for a general drought, a great famine, and wars kindled in moſt parts of the empire. M. Aufidius Perpenna Licinianus took upon him the title of Auguſtus; but this revolt was ſoon quaſhed [k]; in what manner we are no-where told. The Goths, the Borani, the Carpi, the Burgundi, or Burgundiones, a people dwelling on the banks of the Danube, broke into Mœſia and Pannonia; the Scythians over-ran Aſia; and the Perſians entering Syria, laid waſte that province, and even made themſelves maſters of Antioch [l]. Æmilianus, who commanded in Mœſia, overcame the barbarians in a pitched battle, and obliged them to quit the Roman dominions. Elated with this ſucceſs, and deſpiſing Gallus, who was wallowing in pleaſures at Rome, while his generals were expoſing their lives in defence of the empire, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, and was ſaluted by the troops under his command, whoſe affections he had gained, with the titles of Auguſtus and father of his country. This rouzed Gallus from his lethargy, who immediately ordered Valerian to march with the Gauliſh and German legions againſt this new rival. But Æmilianus, without giving him time to aſſemble his troops, marched ſtrait to Italy, and, by long marches, arrived in a ſhort time at Interamna, now Terni, about thirty-two miles from Rome. There he was met by Gallus and his ſon, at the head of a conſiderable army; but the troops of the latter, deſpiſing their leaders, ſlew them in the ſight of Æmilianus's army, and proclaimed him emperor. Such was the end of

He perſecutes the chriſtians.

Æmilianus proclaimed emperor in Mœſia.

Gallus is killed by his own men.

[h] Vict. epit. [i] Zoſ. p. 644. [k] Vict. epit. Occo. p. 454. [l] Zoſ. ibid. Zonar. p. 232.

of the emperor Gallus, after he had reigned a year and ſix months [m]. Mention is made on ſome medals of the apotheoſis of Voluſianus [n]; whence we may conclude, that Gallus, was likewiſe deified. No ſooner was the news of their death brought to Rome, than the ſenate confirmed the election of the ſoldiery, and honoured the new prince with the uſual titles. Æmilius Æmilianus, as Aurelius Victor calls him, or C. Julius Æmilianus, as he is ſtyled on the antient coins, was by nation a Moor, and of a very mean deſcent. He had ſerved from his youth in the Roman armies, and raiſed himſelf to the firſt employments in the ſtate; for he had been conſul before he came to the empire [o]. In the letter which he wrote to the ſenate after the death of Gallus, he promiſed to drive the Goths out of Thrace, and the Perſians out of Meſopotamia and Armenia; to comport himſelf in every thing as the lieutenant of the republic; and to leave the exerciſe of the ſovereign power to the ſenate [p]. Aurelius Victor writes, that he governed with great moderation; wherein he diſagrees with Zonaras, who tells us, that he acted more like a ſoldier than a prince, and did many things highly unbecoming an emperor [q]. Be that as it will, the troops, which Valerian was leading to the aſſiſtance of Gallus, hearing in Rhœtia that he was dead, refuſed to ſubmit to the new prince, and proclaimed their own general emperor; who thereupon quickening his march, paſſed the mountains, and entered Italy at the head of a numerous and well-diſciplined army. Æmilianus's army no ſooner underſtood, that Valerian, of whom they entertained a mighty opinion, had been proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command, than they fell upon their own leader, and diſpatched him, to avoid, ſays Zonaras, a civil war, and the ſhedding of the blood of their fellow-citizens [r]. Æmilianus was killed at Spoletum, now Spoleti, or at a bridge in that neighbourhood; which Victor the younger pretends to have been thence called, The bloody bridge. He died in the forty-ſixth year of his age, after a ſhort reign of three, or, at moſt, of four, months [s]. Euſebius does not even rank him among the emperors [t], and is therein followed by the chronicle of Alexandria, and that of Nicephorus, in which Valerian is placed immediately after Gallus. Aurelius Victor writes, that Æmilianus died a natural death [u]. In his reign C. Vi-

Æmilianus proclaimed emperor.

He is killed by his own men, and Valerian proclaimed emperor in his room.

rius

[m] Zoſ. p. 645. Zonar. p. 242. Syncel. p. 376. [n] Birag. p. 362. [o] Idem, p. 364. [p] Zonar. p. 233. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Hier. chaon. Eutrop. Aur. Vict. [t] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 10. p. 255. [u] Aur. Vict. in Æmil.

rius Paulinus was governor of Rome and comes domeſticorum [w]. This is the firſt time we find the latter employment, which in the fourth century became very famous, mentioned in hiſtory. Pancirollus takes the words domeſtici and protectores to be ſynonymous terms. The province of the latter was to guard the prince's perſon, and, under the chriſtian emperors, to carry the great ſtandard with the croſs. They were ſuperior in rank to the prætorian guards, and diſtinguiſhed with particular badges peculiar to them. This corps conſiſted of three thouſand five hundred men before Juſtinian's time, who is ſaid to have encreaſed them to the number of five thouſand five hundred. They were divided into ſeveral bands of horſe and foot, called ſcholæ, and commanded by ſome perſon of great diſtinction, ſtyled comes domeſticorum [x]. From ſeveral inſcriptions of this time, we learn, that the word comes was already a title of dignity; ſo that the title of comes, or count, does not, as ſome imagine, owe its original entirely to Conſtantine.

His deſcent, employments, and character.

ÆMILIANUS being killed, according to the moſt probable opinion, in the month of Auguſt of the year 253, the ſenate, with great joy, confirmed the election of Valerian, and conferred upon his ſon Gallienus the title of Cæſar. Valerian was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, had commanded armies, and diſcharged with great reputation the chief employments of the empire, both civil and military. He was adored by perſons of all ranks, on account of his integrity, prudence, modeſty, and extraordinary accompliſhments; for he was well verſed in all the branches of learning, and had ever lived free from the vices, which generally prevailed in thoſe diſſolute times; a friend to virtue, an enemy to all wickedneſs and tyranny, a great admirer of the cuſtoms of the primitive Romans, and no-ways inferior to thoſe among them, who were moſt cried up for their love of virtue, and averſion to vice; inſomuch, that if every perſon in the empire had been allowed the liberty of naming to the ſovereignty whom he pleaſed, no one, ſays the hiſtorian, would have thought of chuſing any but Valerian [y]. Thus he was univerſally judged worthy of the empire before he attained it; but was afterwards found no-ways equal to ſuch a mighty charge; whence moſt writers aſcribe to his want of activity, prudence, and reſolution, the many calamities which befel the empire in his and his ſon's reign [z]. Before his acceſſion [w] Onuph. in faſt. p. 262. [x] Pancir. in not. imp. Rom. c. 89.

[y] Valer. vit. p. 173. [z] Vict. epit. Eutrop. Zoſ. l. i. p. 640.

ceſſion to the empire, he was prince of the ſenate, which gave him a right to vote before all the conſulars. Afterwards he commanded the third legion, and was by degrees raiſed to the firſt poſts in the army. He attended Decius in his wars with the Goths, and was, while he continued with him in Thrace, named by the ſenate to the cenſorſhip, in the manner we have related above. In the antient inſcriptions he is ſtyled P. Licinius Valerianus; to theſe names Victor the younger adds that of Colobius; and Onuphrius quotes an inſcription, in which he is named P. Aurelius Licinius Valerius Valerianus [a]. He married two wives, and had by the firſt, whoſe name is not mentioned in hiſtory, Gallienus, who ſucceeded him in the empire. By his ſecond wife, named by ſome writers Mariniana [b], he had Valerian, who was twice conſul, viz. in 258, and 263, and honoured, either by his father, or by his brother Gallienus, with the title of Cæſar [c]. He had other ſons; for Gallienus is ſaid to have married his brother's ſons, and to have ſtyled himſelf the brother of many princes [d]. Valerian began his reign with great applauſe, and behaved himſelf ſo as to gain the affections both of the ſenate and people, paying the utmoſt reſpect to the former, and eaſing the latter of the heavy taxes, with which they had been loaded by his predeceſſors. He enacted many excellent laws, and by that means ſuppreſſed moſt of the diſorders, which in thoſe unhappy times prevailed, not only at Rome, but all over the empire. Authors obſerve, that he employed only men of merit, and that moſt of thoſe whom he preferred to the command of his armies, were afterwards raiſed to the empire [k]. In the beginning of the following year 254, he entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having his ſon Gallienus for his collegue. Zoſimus writes, that this very year, the firſt of his reign, he took Gallienus for his partner in the empire, being prompted thereunto by the danger to which the empire, invaded on all ſides by the barbarians, was then expoſed [l]; for the Germans and the Franks committed great devaſtations in that part of Gaul which bordered on the Rhine; the Goths and the Carpi invaded the provinces of Mœſia, Thrace, and Macedon; and the Perſians, paſſing the Euphrates, over-ran

He gains the affections of all.

The empire invaded on all ſides by the barbarians.

[a] Onuph. ubi ſupra. [b] Birag. p. 369. [c] Val. vit. p. 175. Goltz. p. 114. [d] Idem ibid. [k] Aur. vit. p. 211. Trebel. Pollio. hiſt. triguit. tyrann. c. 9. p. 189. Prob. vit. p. 234 [l] Zoſ. l. i. p. 646.

over-ran Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia. Aurelian, at that time tribune of a legion quartered in Mentz, fell upon the Franks, while they were ravaging the neighbouring country, killed ſeven hundred of them, took three hundred priſoners, whom he ſold for ſlaves, and obliged the reſt to quit their booty, and retire [m]. The country of the Franks, now for the firſt time mentioned in hiſtory, was bounded on the north by the ocean; on the weſt by the ocean and the river Rhone; and on the ſouth by the Weſer: according to which deſcription, they poſſeſſed the modern countries of Weſtphalia, Heſſe, and ſome adjacent ſtates [n]. They were a motely multitude, conſiſting of various German nations dwelling beyond the Rhine; who, uniting in defence of their common liberty, took thence the name of Franks, the word Frank ſignifying in their language, as it ſtill does in ours, free [o]. Among them we find the following nations mentioned, viz. the Actarii, Chamavi, Bructeri, Salii, Friſii, Chauci, Amſivarii, and Catti [p]. The Franks are ſometimes called Sicambri, becauſe they inhabited the country formerly poſſeſſed by that nation, which was entirely cut off by Auguſtus, as we have related in our thirteenth volume. The following year, Valerian being conſul the third time, and Gallienus the ſecond, a great victory was gained in Germany by the latter, who thereupon aſſumed the title of Germanicus Maximus, as appears from ſeveral medals of this year [q]; but what nation he overcame, whether the Franks or the Alemanni, who inhabited the countries lying between the Rhine, the Maine, and the Danube, hiſtory does not inform us. The next conſuls were Maximus and Glabrio, during whoſe adminiſtration, Gallienus, with a body only of ten thouſand men, defeated, if Zonaras is to be credited, three hundred thouſand Alemanni in the neighbourhood of Milan; overcame the Heruli, a Gothic nation, and with great ſucceſs made war upon the Franks [r]. We wiſh that writer had given us a more diſtinct account of theſe mighty exploits. In Gaul, Poſthumius, a commander of great proweſs and experience, gained great advantages over ſeveral German nations, who had invaded that province [s]. The following year, Valerian being conſul the fourth time, and Gallienus the third, a violent perſecution broke out againſt the chriſtians,

The Germans defeated by Gallienus,

The chriſtians perſecuted,

[m] Vit. Aur. p. 211. [n] Adrian. Voleſ. rer. Francicar. Buch. p. 209. [o] Buch. ibid. [p] Vide Adrian Valeſ. not. Gall. p 201. & Buch. p. 210. [q] Birag. p. 367, & 371. [r] Zonar. vit. Gallien. p. 235. [s] Trebel. Pol. in vit. trigint. tyrann. p. 184.

chriſtians, Macrianus, a celebrated magician of Egypt, having ſeduced the emperor, who had been hitherto a great patron of the chriſtian religion, by perſuading him, that the affairs of the empire would never proſper, till the pagan rites were reſtored, and the religion of the chriſtians, ſo odious to the gods, utterly aboliſhed. This perſecution, commonly reckoned the eighth, raged throughout the whole empire with no leſs fury than that under Decius had done. Perſons of all ranks, ſays Dionyſius of Alexandria, without diſtinction of ſex or age, were dragged to the tribunals, hurried to execution, and racked with the moſt exquiſite torments, which the implacable hatred of their enemies could invent. This perſecution laſted three years; that is, from the preſent year 257, to the year 260, when Valerian was taken priſoner by the Perſians. The ſame year, Aurelian being ſent to ſucceed Ulpius Crinitus in the command of the troops in Illyricum and Thrace, drove the Goths out of thoſe provinces, took an incredible number of them priſoners, and purſuing them beyond the Danube, laid waſte their country, and returned to Mœſia loaded with booty [t]. At the ſame time Probus, paſſing the Danube, made war with great ſucceſs upon the Sarmatians and Quadi, and reſcued out of the hands of the latter Valerius Flaccus, a youth of a noble deſcent, and nearly related to the emperor, who rewarded Probus with a civic crown; which, in the times of the republic, was given to ſuch as had ſaved the life of a citizen [u]. About the latter end of this year, the emperor leaving Rome, ſet out for the eaſt, to make head againſt the Perſians, who had invaded Meſopotamia and Syria, and committed dreadful ravages in thoſe provinces. He reached Byzantium in the beginning of the following year, when Memmius Tuſcus and Baſſus were conſuls; and there held a council, at which aſſiſted all the chief officers of the empire, to deliberate about the meaſures to be taken with reſpect to the Perſian war; for Sapor, king of Perſia, had already ſeized all Armenia, made himſelf maſter of Niſibis and Carrhæ in Meſopotamia; and thence advancing into Syria at the head of a mighty army, had ravaged that province, and taken Antioch itſelf. His guide in this expedition was one Cyriades, deſcended of an illuſtrious family, but abandoned from his youth to all manner of wickedneſs; inſomuch that, not able to bear the reproaches and wholſome admonitions of his father, he fled from home, and retired into Perſia, carrying thither with him a great quantity of gold and ſilver, which he had purloined. There he entered into the ſervice of the Perſian king, ſtirred him up to make war upon the Romans, and ſerved him as a guide, being well acquainted with the countries, in his marches through Meſopotamia, Armenia, and Syria. Sapor, after he had taken and plundered Antioch, returned into Perſia, to diſcharge his army of the immenſe booty, with which they were incumbered, and left Cyriades governor of the conquered countries, who thereupon aſſumed the title of Cæſar, and ſoon after that of Auguſtus, and was acknowledged as emperor by moſt of the eaſtern provinces [w].

The Goths defeated by Aurelian, and the Sarmatians by Probus.

The Perſians over-run ſeveral provinces.

[t] Aurel. vit. p. 213. [u] Prob. vit. p. 234, 235.

The Scythians commit great devaſtations in Aſia.

At the ſame time, the Borani, a Scythian nation, croſſing the Euxine ſea, ſurpriſed and plundered the cities of Pytus in Boſphorus, and Trapezus in Pontus; and thence advancing to the neighbourhood of Byzantium, croſſed over into Aſia, and ſurpriſed the cities of Chalcedon, Nicea, Apamea, Pruſa, and ſeveral other places, which they plundered, and then returned with an immenſe booty into their own country, before Valerian could come up with them [x]. The following year, when Secularis and Baſſus were conſuls, Valerian marched from Cappadocia, whither he had purſued the Scythians, into Syria, recovered Antioch, and thence advanced into Meſopotamia, where he met Sapor, engaged him, but, by the treachery of Macrianus, who perſuaded him to engage in a diſadvantageous poſt, loſt the flower of his troops in the engagement, and was himſelf taken priſoner [y]. Thus Zonaras, Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and Agathias; but Zoſimus writes, that Valerian having, after the battle in which he was defeated, been prevailed upon to confer in perſon with Sapor, was by that treacherous prince ſeized and carried into Perſia. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken priſoner, carried in triumph by Sapor into Perſia, and there inſulted in a moſt outrageous manner by that haughty conqueror; who, after having ſhewn him loaded with chains in all the chief cities of his empire, treated him with greater indignities than the meaneſt ſlave, making him his foot-ſtool whenever he mounted on horſeback [z]. He was taken in the year 260, the ſeventieth of his age, and ſixth of his reign, and was ſtill alive in the year 263, nay, the chronicle of Alexandria tells us, that he did not die till the year 269. After his death, his body was flayed by Sapor's orders, and preſerved in ſalt, and and his ſkin dreſſed, dyed red, and expoſed in a temple; where, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, it was ſhewn to all foreign princes and embaſſadors, as a laſting monument of the power of the Perſian monarch. Agathias writes, that Valerian was flayed alive [a]; but is therein contradicted by all the antient hiſtorians. We are told, that nothing grieved the unhappy Valerian in his deplorable condition ſo much, as to ſee himſelf entirely neglected by his ſon Gallienus, who was ſo far from preſſing the Perſian king to ſet him at liberty, or offering to ranſom him, that, on the contrary, he expreſſed no ſmall joy when news was brought him of his captivity, tho' moſt foreign princes, nay, even thoſe who had aſſiſted Sapor in his wars againſt the Romans, did all that lay in their power to prevail upon him to grant the Roman emperor his liberty; but the haughty Perſian was too much elated with his ſucceſs, to be terrified with the menaces of his enemies, or to hearken to the entreaties of his friends.

Valerian defeated by the Perſians, and taken priſoner.

[w] Vit. trigint. tyran. p. 185. [x] Zoſ. l. i. p. 648. [y] Zonar. p. 234. Vict. epit. Eutrop. feſt. Agath. l. iv. p. 153. [z] Euſeb. orat. Conſt. c. 24. Lact. perſecut. c. 5. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 22. Vit. Valer. p. 175.

[a] Agath. l. iv. p. 233.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Roman hiſtory, from the captivity of Valerian, to the reſignation of Diocleſian.

THE news of the defeat of the Roman army by the Perſians, and the captivity of Valerian, no ſooner reached the barbarous nations at war with Rome, than they flew to arms; and, pouring on all ſides incredible multitudes into the Roman territories, threatened the empire and Rome itſelf with utter deſtruction. The Goths and Scythians ravaged anew Pontus and Aſia, committing every-where dreadful devaſtations: the Germans, that is, the Alemanni and the Franks, having over-run Rhœtia, entered Italy itſelf, and advanced as far as Ravenna, putting all to fire and ſword: the Quadi and Sarmatians ſeized on great part of Dacia and Pannonia; and other barbarous nations, invading Spain, made themſelves maſters of Tarraco and other important places in that province [b]. Gallienus, who was then in Gaul, hearing that the Alemanni and Franks had entered Italy, and were advancing towards Rome, flew to the defence of the capital, and obliged the enemy to retire. Whether they were overcome in battle, as ſome authors write, or marched back upon the news of his approach, as we read in others, is uncertain. The barbarians, who had invaded Dacia and Pannonia, were driven back by Regillianus, who commanded there, and is ſaid to have gained ſeveral victories over them in one day [c]. While Regillianus was employed againſt the barbarians, whom he had purſued into Mœſia, Ingenuus cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in Pannonia, and was acknowledged by the inhabitants both of that province and of Mœſia; for he was a man of great valour and experience in war, and univerſally beloved both by the people and ſoldiery. Gallienus no ſooner heard of his revolt, than he marched from the neighbourhood of Ravenna, where he then was, into Illyricum, engaged Ingenuus, and put him to flight. Some authors write, that Ingenuus was killed after the battle by his own ſoldiers, while others tell us, that he put an end to his own life, to avoid by that means falling into the hands of ſo cruel an enemy as Gallienus, who uſed his victory with a barbarity hardly to be equalled, commanding his ſoldiers to put all the inhabitants of Mœſia they could meet with to the ſword, whether they had taken up arms in favour of the uſurper, or no; as appears from the following letter, which he wrote to Verianus Celer, one of his officers: "I ſhall "not be ſatisfied with your putting to death ſuch only as "have borne arms againſt me, and might have fallen in the "field: you muſt in every city deſtroy all the males, old "and young: ſpare none who have wiſhed ill to me, none "who have ſpoken ill of me, the ſon of Valerian, the fa"ther and brother of princes. Ingenuus emperor! tear, "kill, cut in pieces without mercy: you underſtand me; "do then as you know I would do, who have written to "you with my own hand [d]." Purſuant to theſe cruel orders, a moſt dreadful havock was made of that unhappy people, and in ſeveral cities not one male child left alive. The troops, who had formerly ſerved under Ingenuus, and the inhabitants of Mœſia, who had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, provoked by theſe cruelties, proclaimed Q. Nonius Regillianus emperor. He was a Dacian by nation, deſcended, as was ſaid, from the celebrated king Decebalus, whom Trajan had conquered, and had by ſeveral gallant actions gained great reputation

The empire invaded on all ſides by the barbarians.

[b] Zoſ. l. 1. c. 650.

Ingenuus cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor,

But is defeated and killed.

The cruelty of Gallienus,

Regillianus emperor.

[c] Trig. tyran. vit. p. 188. [d] Idem ibid. c. 8.

reputation in the Roman armies. Claudius, who was afterwards emperor, wrote the following letter to him, congratulating him upon the victory he had gained over the Quadi and Sarmatians in Mœſia: "Happy is the republic in having "at this time ſuch a commander as you; happy Gallienus, "tho' no one dares ſpeak truth to him, nor blame or com-"mend men according to their deſerts. Bonitus and Celſus, "two of the prince's life-guard-men, have given me an ac-"count of your gallant behaviour in the neighbourhood of "Scupi, where you gained ſeveral victories over the barba-"rians in one day. In antient times you would have been "thought worthy of a triumph; but at preſent I would have "you to conquer with more caution, mindful of a certain "perſon, to whom your victories may give umbrage, &c."

After he was proclaimed emperor, he gained very conſiderable advantages over the Sarmatians, but was ſoon murdered by his own ſoldiers and the people of Illyricum, who had raiſed him to the empire, but, not long after his aſſumption, began to dread the effects of Gallienus's cruelty. The Roxolani, who ſerved under him, revolted the firſt; and their example was ſoon followed by the reſt of the army and the people of Illyricum [e]. Aurelius Victor writes, that he was overcome in battle by Gallienus. The ſame year, M. Caſſius Labienus Poſthumius revolted in Gaul. He was meanly born, but endowed with extraordinary parts, and reckoned one of the beſt commanders in the whole empire. Valerian, when he ſet out for the eaſt, committed to his care both his ſon Gallienus and the troops that were left in the weſtern provinces, declaring, that he loved and eſteemed Poſthumius above all officers of his army. When he appointed him governor of Gaul and commander of the troops on the Rhine, he wrote on that occaſion a letter to the inhabitants of Gaul, in which he expreſſed his eſteem for Poſthumius in the following terms: "You will, I hope, be convinced, "that I have particular regard for you, ſince I have ſet over you "ſuch a man as Poſthumius. He is one whom I eſteem "above the reſt, and think the moſt worthy of all to repre-"ſent the prince. If I am deceived in the opinion I enter-"tain of him, I will not pretend to know any man [f]."

He is murdered by his own men.

Poſthumius revolts in Gaul.

When Gallienus, upon the news of his father's captivity and the invaſion of the Franks and Alemanni, ſet out for Italy, he left his eldeſt ſon Saloninus, named alſo Valerian, then an [e] Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 9. p. 189. [f] Idem, c. 2. p. 185.

infant, at Cologn, under the tuition, ſome ſay, of Poſthumius, and others of Sylvanus, ordering all things to be tranſacted in his name. Soon after the emperor's departure, Poſthumius having defeated ſome German nations who had invaded Gaul, Sylvanus obliged him to ſend all the booty to him and the young prince; which provoked the ſoldiery to ſuch a degree, that they revolted, and proclaimed Poſthumius emperor, who marching without loſs of time to Cologn, beſieged the place, and reduced the inhabitants to ſuch ſtreights, that they were forced to deliver up to him both Sylvanus and Saloninus, whom he cauſed to be immediately put to death. Thus Zoſimus [g]: but Trebellius Pollio aſcribes the revolt and the death of the young prince to the Gauls, who, hating Gallienus, and not able to brook the government of a child, ſtirred up the ſoldiers to murder him, and proclaimed Poſthumius emperor [h], who was with great joy acknowledged, not only in Gaul, but in Spain and Britain [i]. He reigned ſeven years, during which time he drove all the Germans out of Gaul, and even built ſeveral forts in their country, reſtored peace and tranquillity to that afflicted province, and governed with ſuch equity and moderation, that he was univerſally adored, and honoured with the titles of The reſtorer of Gaul, The defender of the empire; for had he not repulſed the Germans, they would, in thoſe diſtracted times, have overrun with great eaſe the whole empire [k]. On ſeveral of his medals mention is made of his victories over the Germans, that is, according to Adrianus Valeſius [l], over the Franks; and on ſome he is ſtyled Germanicus Maximus [m]. He had by his wife Junia Donata, perhaps the daughter of Junius Donatus, who was governor of Rome in the year 257, and this year conſul, at leaſt one ſon, ſtyled on the antient coins C. Junius Coſſius Poſthumius. The emperor Valerian appointed him tribune of a band or company of Vocontii, that is, of Dauphinois. His father afterwards created him Cæſar, took him for his partner in the empire, and honoured him with the title of Auguſtus [n]. He was thought to have equalled in eloquence Quintilian, whom he ſtudied to imitate; whence his declamations were inſerted among thoſe of that excellent writer [o]; and the nineteen declamations, which paſs under

The ſon of Gallienus murdered.

Poſthumius acknowledged by Gaul, Spain and Britain.

He delivers Gaul from the Germans.

[g] Zoſ. p. 651. [h] Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 2. p. 185. [i] Claud. vit. p. 204. Spanh. l. ix. p. 845. [k] Trig. tyrann. vit. ibid. Birag. p. 393. [l] Val. rer. Franc. l. i. p. 6. [m] Birag. p. 394. Goltz. p. 116. [n] Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 2. p. 185. [o] Idem ibid. p. 186.

under the name of Quintilian, but ſeem not altogether worthy of him, are by ſome modern critics aſcribed to young Poſthumius [p]. Gallienus, though greatly concerned for the death of his ſon, whom he immediately cauſed to be ranked among the gods [q], did not march in perſon againſt the uſurper till ſome years after.

The Perſians over-run and plunder all the eaſtern provinces.

DURING theſe diſturbances in the weſt, Sapor king of Perſia, elated with his late ſucceſs, over-ran moſt of the eaſtern provinces, laid waſte Meſopotamia, and entering Syria, took Antioch, the third, or at leaſt the ſecond, time, and levelled with the ground all the public buildings of that ſtately metropolis. From Syria he led his army into Cilicia, took and plundered the city of Tarſus, the capital of that province; and advancing from thence into Cappadocia, made himſelf maſter of Cæſarea, and cut all the inhabitants, to the number of four hundred thouſand, in pieces, for having oppoſed him under the conduct of one Demoſthenes, a man of great reſolution and intrepidity, who, after the city was taken, opened himſelf a way, ſword in hand, through the midſt of the enemy, and made his eſcape [r]. Thus the Perſian over-ran all the provinces of the eaſt, committing every-where moſt dreadful ravages. Agathias tells us, that he filled up deep valleys with dead bodies, and took pride in paſſing over them on horſeback from one hill to another [s]. To the captives, whom he was pleaſed to ſpare, he allowed only what food was barely ſufficient to keep them alive, and ordered them to be driven once a day in herds to water like ſo many cattle [t]. In the mean time, the Roman troops, who had diſperſed upon the captivity of Valerian, rallying, choſe for their leader Calliſtus, or rather Baliſta, who had been captain of the guards to Valerian, and was a man of great addreſs, intrepidity, and experience in war. He, without loſs of time, tranſported his forces in boats into Cilicia, and obliged the Perſians to raiſe the ſiege of Pompeiopolis, a maritime city of that province, when it was upon the point of ſubmitting. From Cilicia he flew with great celerity into Lycaonia, and there made a dreadful havock of the Perſians, whom he found buſied in plundering the open places, and no-ways upon their guard. He took from them all their booty and captives, made a great many priſoners, and among the reſt the wives of Sapor. From Lycaonia he retired with his booty and captives, before the Perſians could draw together their diſperſed forces; and Baliſta cuts many of them in pieces.

[p] Vide Voſſ. rhet. c. 15. p. 192. [q] Birag. p. 382. [r] Zonar. p. 234. [s] Agath. l. iv. p. 134. [t] Zonar. p. 234.

and embarking his army on the veſſels and boats he had aſſembled, landed ſome of his men at Sebaſte, and others at Corycus, two cities on the coaſt of Cilicia, and in both places ſurpriſed and cut in pieces above three thouſand Perſians [u].

Odenatus of Palmyra.

Baliſta was well ſeconded in his attempts by Odenatus, whoſe name is famous in the hiſtory of thoſe times on account of the many victories he gained over the Perſians, and his ſaving the Roman empire in the eaſt. All authors agree, that he was a native of Palmyra, a city of Phœnicia, about one day's journey from the Euphrates; but ſome writers call him a citizen and decurion, while others ſtyle him prince of that place. Procopius gives him the title of prince of the Saracens, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates, and were allies of the Romans [w]. Zoſimus tells us, that his army had been long before diſtinguiſhed with particular marks of honour by the Roman emperors, and that he had troops of his own [x]. As Palmyra was at this time a Roman colony [y], Odenatus was prince, not of that city, but probably of the Saracens, who dwelt in that neighbourhood. As he had been accuſtomed from his infancy to the manly exerciſes of hunting, he bore with great chearfulneſs and alacrity the toils of a military life [z]. Of his wife Zenobia, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. Odenatus was ſcarce known till the captivity of Valerian, when, dreading the power of that mighty conqueror, as he lived in amity with the Romans, he wrote to him a moſt reſpectful and ſubmiſſive letter, proteſting, that he had never borne arms againſt the Perſians, and at the ſame time ſent him ſeveral camels loaded with rich preſents. But How treated by Sapor.

Sapor, highly provoked at the arrogance of ſuch an inſignificant perſon, as he expreſſed himſelf, in preſuming to write to him, tore his letter, ordered his preſents to be thrown into the river, and, with a threatening voice, told his embaſſadors, that he would teach their maſter the reſpect a man of his mean condition owed to his lord and ſovereign; that he would exterminate and utterly deſtroy him, his whole family, and country.; adding, that if he came and threw himſelf proſtrate at his feet, with his hands tied behind his back, he might perhaps by that ſubmiſſion atone in ſome degree for his temerity and preſumption. Odenatus, reſenting, as it became a man of his ſpirit, this vile treatment, ſwore he would purſue the Perſians to the laſt with fire and ſword, and either [u] Zonar. p. 382. Syncell. p. 235. [w] Procop. p. 97. [x] Zoſ. p. 651. [y] Noris. de epoch. Syromaced. p. 103. [z] Trig. tyran. c. 14.

ther bring down the pride of their mighty monarch, or periſh in the attempt [a]. With this view, he immediately declared for the Romans; and joining Baliſta with all his forces, bore a great, if not the chief, ſhare, in the above-mentioned exploits; for to him Trebellius Pollio aſcribes the taking of Sapor's wives [b]. The Perſian, greatly concerned for that loſs, and apprehending it might be attended with others ſtill greater, (for Odenatus and Baliſta purſued him cloſe) reſolved to retire; and accordingly bent his march towards the Euphrates. But as he was marching through the province of Euphrateſiana, at a ſmall diſtance from Palmyra, Odenatus, falling upon his rear, made a dreadful havock of them, and obliged the reſt to repaſs the Euphrates with great hurry and confuſion. Many periſhed in the river; and Sapor was glad to compound with the Roman garriſon in Edeſſa, which city he had never been able to reduce, for the liberty of returning into his own country, by yielding to them all the Syrian money he had amaſſed in the plunder of ſo many cities [c]. Zonaras writes, that Odenatus found among the Perſian captives, and likewiſe among the dead, many women attired and armed like men [d]. After theſe victories, Odenatus aſſumed the title of king of Palmyra, which he likewiſe gave to his eldeſt ſon Herod, as he did that of queen to his wife Zenobia. Gallienus, to reward his eminent ſervices, appointed him commander in chief of all the Roman forces in the eaſt; which truſt he diſcharged with great fidelity, and was attended with better ſucceſs than any of the Roman generals. For the following year 261, when Gallienus was conſul, the fourth time, with Petronius Voluſianus, Odenatus, not ſatisfied with having driven Sapor out of the Roman dominions, entered Meſopotamia, and there recovered the cities of Niſibis and Carrhæ. From Meſopotamia he advanced into the very heart of the Perſian dominions, being extremely deſirous of crowning his other exploits with the deliverance of Valerian. Sapor met him at the head of a mighty army; whereupon an engagement enſuing, the Perſians were utterly defeated, and Sapor with his children obliged to ſhelter themſelves within the walls of Cteſiphon, the metropolis of the Perſian dominions. Thither Odenatus purſued them, and laid cloſe ſiege to the place, after having deſtroyed with fire and ſword the neighbouring country to a great diſtance. The Perſian lords, alarmed at the danger that threatened their prince

He ſides with the Romans.

And gains great advantages over the Perſians.

Odenatus aſſumes the title of king of Palmyra.

Defeats Sapor and beſieges Cteſiphon.

[a] Petr. Patr. in excerpt. de legat p. 29. [b] Trig. tyr. c. 14. p. 192. [c] Petr. Patr. ibid. p. 25. [d] Zonar. p. 235.

prince and country, armed all their vaſſals, and flew from the moſt diſtant parts of the kingdom to Cteſiphon. Many battles were fought under the walls of that metropolis, which ſerved only to encreaſe the number of Odenatus's victories; many Perſians of great diſtinction were taken priſoners, and ſent by the conqueror to Gallienus: Sapor on one ſide, and the brave Odenatus on the other, exerted their utmoſt efforts, the latter to deliver Valerian, and the former to avoid the like doom, which now threatened him [e]. But here Trebellius Pollio, after having raiſed our expectation, drops at once both Odenatus and the ſiege of Cteſiphon; and, giving himſelf no farther trouble about either, leaves us quite in the dark as to the iſſue of ſo glorious and important an undertaking. The reader may thence judge of his abilities in the capacity of an hiſtorian. All we know for certain is, that Sapor was not taken, nor Valerian reſcued from his cruel bondage. Some writers ſeem to inſinuate, that the revolt of Ma-

The riſe of Macrianus.

crianus, which, according to moſt hiſtorians, happened this year, obliged Odenatus to raiſe the ſiege of Cteſiphon. Macrianus was of a mean deſcent; but had, by his courage and experience in war, raiſed himſelf from the low ſtation of a common ſoldier to the higheſt poſts in the army. He was exceeding rich, and had married a lady of great diſtinction, by whom he had two ſons Macrianus and Quietus, who had been raiſed to the rank of tribunes by Valerian, and were eſteemed two of the beſt officers of the whole army [f]. The father is ſtyled by Dionyſius of Alexandria, the chief of the Egyptian magicians [g]; whence we conclude him to have been by nation an Egyptian, and greatly addicted to the ſtudy of magic. As the abominable myſteries of that art were abhorred and deſervedly cried down by the chriſtians, Macrianus thence became their implacable enemy, and inſpired Valerian, with whom he bore great ſway, with an irreconcileable hatred to them, which occaſioned the eighth perſecution, as we have hinted above [h]. Some authors write, that abuſing the confidence Valerian repoſed in him, he betrayed that prince to the Perſians [i], but others clear him from that imputation. Be that as it will, about a year after the captivity of the unhappy emperor, he revolted from his ſon; and having gain-

He is proclaimed emperor.

ed over Baliſta, was by his means acknowledged emperor by moſt of the troops who had ſerved under Valerian, but deſpiſed

[e] Vit. Gall. p. 179. Zoſ. p. 651. [f] Gall. vit. p. 175. Trig. tyrann. c. 13. [g] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 10. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Trig. tyran. p. 174.

Piſed Gallienus. He immediately took his two ſons for his partners in the empire, and appointed Baliſta his captain of the guards. Trebellius Pollio, of all writers the leaſt exact, to ſay no more, does not inform us in what country Macrianus was created emperor, nor where, or how long he reigned; and as to the other hiſtorians, Zonaras is the only one among them that takes any notice at all of him. That writer tells us, that the inhabitants of Aſia received him with extraordinary marks of joy [k]. Dionyſius of Alexandria gives us room to think, that he was acknowledged in Egypt; and that his and his ſon's reign ended before the ninth year of Gallienus, that is, before the Auguſt of the year 262 [l]. During his uſurpation happened, in all likelihood, at Alexandria the diſturbances deſcribed by that writer, whowas biſhop of the place. Fury and diſcord, ſays he, raged there to ſuch a degree, that it was more eaſy to paſs from the eaſt to the moſt remote provinces of the weſt, than from one place of Alexandria to another: the inhabitants had no intercourſe but by letters, which with great difficulty were conveyed from one friend to another: it was more dangerous to croſs the ſtreet, than the moſt tempeſtuous ſeas, the moſt dry and inhoſpitable deſert: the port reſembled the ſhore of the red-ſea, ſtrewn with the carcaſſes of the drowned Egyptians; the ſea was dyed with blood, and the Nile choaked up with dead bodies [m]. The war was attended with a general famine, and the famine by a dreadful plague, which daily ſwept off great numbers of people, inſomuch, that there were then in Alexandria fewer inhabitants from the age of fourteen to that of eighty, than there uſed to be from forty to ſeventy [n]. Of ſuch perſons a regiſter, it ſeems, was kept; and a certain quantity of corn diſtributed among them.

Egypt ſubmits to him.

Great diſturbances at Alexandria.

MACRIANUS no ſooner ſaw himſelf inveſted with the ſovereignty, than he marched with all the forces he could aſſemble into the eaſt, ſays Pollio, that is, as we conjecture, from Egypt into Syria. He engaged ſeveral times and defeated the Perſians; but looked upon P. Valerius Valens as a far more formidable enemy. Valens had been ſent by Gallienus into Achaia, or Greece, with the title of proconſul; but hearing there, that Macrianus had been proclaimed emperor, he aſſumed the ſame title. Hereupon Macrianus immediately detached Piſo, with a competent force, to ſuppreſs this new uſurper. But Piſo, finding him upon his guard, and ready Valens proclaimed emperor in Achaia, and Piſo in Theſſaly; but they are both killed.

[k] Zonar. p. 236. [l] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 23. [m] Idem ibid. c. 21. [n] Idem ibid.

ready to receive him, retired into Theſſaly, and there aſſumed the ſame title of emperor, with the ſurname of Theſſalicus, as appears from his medals [o]. But he did not long enjoy that empty and ſeducing title, being ſoon after murdered by ſome ſoldiers ſent by Valens for that purpoſe. Valens himſelf was ſlain a few days after by his own men; and his death, as well as that of his rival, was known at Rome before the twenty-fifth of June [p]. Piſo, who was deſcended from one of the moſt antient and illuſtrious families of Rome, was univerſally lamented there on account of the merits of his anceſtors, as well as his own. He had been highly eſteemed by the emperors, nay, and by Valens himſelf, who upon hearing the news of his death, What account, ſaid he, ſhall I give to the gods, the infernal judges, of the death of Piſo? The Roman empire has not a perſon equal to Piſo. Upon the news of his death, it was moved in the ſenate, that divine honours might be decreed to him as to a lawful prince; nay ſome writers tell us, that he was actually ranked among the gods with this remarkable elogium, That there never was a better man, nor a man of more firmneſs and conſtancy. However that be, he was decreed a ſtatue with a triumphal chariot: the ſtatue was ſtill to be ſeen in the time of Conſtantine; but the chariot had been taken down, to make room for the famous baths of Diocleſian, and was never after ſet up again [q]. About the ſame time that Macrianus uſurped the empire in the eaſt, Manius Acilius Aureolus was forced by the army, which he commanded in Illyricum, to take upon him the ſovereignty; for the ſoldiers every-where abhorred Gallienus, and would only obey emperors ſet up by themſelves. Aureolus from Illyricum marched into Italy, and made himſelf maſter of Milan [r]. Gallienus, after various unſucceſsful attempts to ſuppreſs him, was in the end obliged to come to an accommodation with him, and accept of his aſſiſtance againſt Poſthumius, as we ſhall relate hereafter. He was, according to Zonaras, a native of Dacia, of a mean deſcent, and in his youth a ſhepherd; but lifting himſelf afterwards in the army, he was ſoon raiſed from the rank of a common ſoldier to the command of a body of horſe. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner under Gallienus, in the battle againſt Ingenuus; for ſome authors aſcribe to him the whole glory of that victory [s]. This year 261, the Scythians breaking anew

The character of Piſo.

Aureolus made emperor in Illyricum.

[o] Birag. p. 388. [p] Trig. tyrann. p. 194, 195. [q] Trig. tyr. vit. c. 20. p. 194. [r] Idem, c. 10. p. 189. Vict. epit. [s] Zonar. p. 235.

new into Bithynia, laid waſte the whole country a ſecond time, levelled with the ground ſeveral cities, plundered Nicomedia, and returned unmoleſted into their own country, with a great booty and many captives [i]. At the ſame time, that no part of the empire might be exempt from ſome ſignal calamity, the iſland of Sicily, leſs expoſed than other countries to the ravages of the barbarians, was miſerably haraſſed by a band of robbers, who, roving up and down, committed dreadful devaſtations, and kindled a kind of ſervile war, which was not ſuppreſſed without much difficulty and bloodſhed [k]. The following year, Gallienus being conſul, the fifth time, with Fauſtianus, the empire was in many places afflicted by other calamities, beſides the wars and commotions we have mentioned. The ſun was overcaſt with thick clouds, and a great darkneſs continued for ſeveral days together, attended with a violent earthquake and dreadful claps of thunder, not in the air, but in the bowels of the earth, which opened in many places, and ſwallowed up great numbers of people, with their habitations. The ſea, ſwelling beyond meaſure, broke in upon the continent, and drowned whole cities; the plague raged with great violence in Greece, Egypt, and eſpecially at Rome, where it ſwept off for ſome time five thouſand perſons a day. The books of the Sibyls were conſulted, public proceſſions ordained, ſacrifices offered to Jupiter the author of health, &c. But all to no purpoſe; nay, to their other calamities were added the incurſions of the Goths in great ſwarms into Greece, and of the Scythians into Aſia. The former having made themſelves maſters of Thrace, over-ran all Macedon, and laid ſiege to Theſſalonica, the capital of that province, which threw all Greece into the utmoſt conſternation: troops were diſpatched to guard the ſtreights of Thermopylæ, ſo famous in hiſtory; the Athenians rebuilt their walls, which had lain in ruins ever ſince the time of Sylla; the inhabitants of Peloponneſus ſhut up the iſthmus from ſea to ſea; new levies were made; the troops quartered in that province drawn together, &c. But, in the mean time, Macrianus arriving in Greece on his march into Italy, fell upon the barbarians while they were attempting to enter Achaia, put them to flight, and obliged them to retire into their own country, whither they carried, however, great part of their booty [l]. At the ſame time, the Scythians, that is, another party of Goths, croſſing the Helleſpont under the conduct of one Raſpa, committed dreadful ravages in Aſia, Bithynia plundered by the Scythians.

The empire affected with a plague, famine, earthquakes, &c.

New irruptions of the Scythians.

[i] Gall. vit. p. 177. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Idem ibid.

Who plunder the temple of Diana at Epheſus.

Aſia, burnt ſeveral cities there, and plundered the celebrated temple of Diana at Epheſus, ſo much reſpected by the pagans, and ſo famous for its rich ornaments and immenſe wealth [m]. Thus was the deſtruction of the moſt illuſtrious monuments of paganiſm begun by the Goths, who were themſelves pagans; and we ſhall ſee them in the two following centuries complete what they now begin. In this irruption they ruined the city of Chalcedon, deſtroyed the poor remains of antient Troy and the famous Ilium; and, repaſſing the Helleſpont, laid waſte all Thrace, and returned to their own country with an immenſe booty [n].

In the mean time, Macrianus having ſettled the affairs of Syria, left there his younger ſon Quietus, with Baliſta, to guard that province againſt the Perſians; and ſet out for Italy, with his eldeſt ſon Macrianus, at the head of forty-five thouſand men, to try his fortune againſt Aureolus in Illyricum, and Gallienus at Rome. He was met by the forces of the former either in Illyricum, or on the borders of Thrace; whereupon a battle enſued, in which Macrianus and his ſon being killed, their whole army ſubmitted to Aureolus, and were incorporated in his troops [o]. The news of their defeat and death was no ſooner heard in the eaſt, than moſt cities there revolted from Quietus, who thereupon ſhut himſelf up with Baliſta in the city of Emeſa, whither Aureolus, to complete his victory, ſent ruffians to diſpatch him. But before their arrival, Odenatus had beſieged the place; which ſo terrified the inhabitants and the garriſon, that they killed Quietus, threw his head over the walls, and then ſubmitted to Odenatus. Macrianus and his children being thus cut off, Gallienus was acknowledged a-new in Egypt and Syria; for Odenatus, tho' maſter of almoſt all the eaſtern provinces, acted, or at leaſt pretended to act, in his name [p]. He had no ſooner withdrawn his troops from before Emeſa, than Baliſta, whom he had ſpared on account of his adviſing the inhabitants to murder Quietus, aſſumed the title of emperor, and put ſuch numbers of the citizens of Emeſa to the ſword, no doubt for refuſing to acknowledge him, that the unhappy city was almoſt turned into a deſert [q]. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of him hereafter for he ſeems to have reigned at Emeſa three years. About the ſame time, Æmilianus, ſtyled on the Macrianus and his eldeſt ſon defeated and killed by Aureolus.

Baliſta aſſumes the title of emperor.

[m] Idem p. 177, 178. Jornand. rer. Goth. c. 20. [n] Jornand. ibid. [o] Zonar. p. 236. Trig. tyran. c. 10. Gall. vit. p. 176. [p] Gall. vit. p. 179. Trig. tyran. c. 14. [q] Gall. vit. p. 176.

the antient medals Tiberius Ceſtius Alexander Æmilianus [e], commander of the legions in Egypt, took upon him the title of emperor, hoping, by thus openly revolting from Gallienus, who was no leſs abhorred in Egypt than in the other provinces, to appeaſe the populace of Alexandria, who had riſen upon a very trifling occaſion, and inveſted the houſe where Æmilianus lodged, threatening him with preſent death. He no ſooner proclaimed himſelf emperor, in oppoſition to Gallienus, than the rage of the incenſed multitude was aſſwaged, and the whole city of Alexandria, with loud acclamations, acknowledged him for their ſovereign. He immediately ſeized all the corn in the public granaries, and by that means occaſioned a famine in ſeveral provinces. He viſited in perſon the moſt diſtant parts of Egypt, redreſſed many grievances, repulſed with great vigor the neighbouring barbarians, which procured him the name of Alexander, and was preparing for an expedition into India, when the troops ſent againſt him by Gallienus arrived in Egypt [f], as we ſhall relate hereafter. This year, Gallienus, agreeing with Aureolus, marched into Gaul with him and Claudius, who ſucceeded him in the empire, to make war upon Poſthumius, who had reigned three years undiſturbed. As Poſthumius was greatly beloved, and vigorouſly ſupported by the Gauls, the war laſted ſome years. Gallienus was defeated in the firſt general engagement of this year, and Poſthumius in the ſecond, after having loſt the flower of his troops. But Aureolus, who was ſent to purſue him, having ſuffered him to eſcape when he might have eaſily taken him, he levied new forces, and began the war with freſh vigor [g]. Gallienus, however, quitting Gaul the following year, when Albinus and Dexter were conſuls, returned to Rome, and from thence haſtened into the eaſt, where he wreaked his rage on the city of Byzantium; but upon what provocation, Trebellius Pollio, who deſcribes the miſerable condition to which that place was reduced, has not thought proper to acquaint us. All we know is, that Gallienus, as ſoon as he appeared before it, loſt all hopes of ever being able to maſter it; but being nevertheleſs admitted, the day after his arrival, within the gates, upon terms, without any regard to the agreement, he cauſed the garriſon, and all the inhabitants, to be put to the ſword. Not one perſon, ſays Trebellius Pollio was left alive in the place [h].

And likewiſe Æmilianus.

Gallienus makes war upon Poſthumius in Gaul.

The Byzantines ſlaughtered by Gallienus.

Vorburgius

[e] Goltz. 115. Zon. p. 236. [f] Trig. tyr. c. 21. [g] Gall. vit. p. 178. [h] Gall. vit. p. 178, 179.

Vorburgius aſcribes this ſlaughter to the ſoldiers of Gallienus; and pretends, that the emperor left Gaul, and haſtened into the eaſt, on purpoſe to revenge the ſlaughter of the Byzantines, and puniſh the cruelty of the ſoldiers [i]. From Byzantium, Gallienus returned to Rome, where he celebrated the tenth year of his reign with extraordinary pomp, and a kind of triumph, in which were led mock-captives, dreſſed like Goths, Sarmatians, Franks, and Perſians. During this ſhew, ſome perſons of humour, mixing with thoſe who perſonated the Perſians, viewed with great attention their faces, examined their dreſs, and ſeemed to betray great ſurprize. Being in the end aſked, what they wanted? We are looking, ſaid they, for the emperor's father; which ſo incenſed Gallienus, that he commanded them immediately to be burnt alive [k].

Saturninus aſſumes the title of emperor, and is murdered by his ſoldiers.

This year, a new tyrant ſtarted up, by name P. Sempronius Saturninus. He was a man of great parts, and renowned for his victories over the barbarians. Hiſtory does not inform us where or how long he reigned; but only tells us, that he performed great things while he was emperor, and was, on account of his ſeverity, put to death by the ſame ſoldiers who had raiſed him to the empire. When he was firſt proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command, he told them, that they had loſt a good captain, and made a bad prince [l].

Æmilianus defeated, taken, and ſtrangled.

Towards the end of the year, Theodotus, a native of Egypt, diſpatched by Gallienus againſt Æmilianus, who reigned in that country, overcame him in a pitched battle, took him priſoner, and ſent him to Rome; where he was, by the emperor's orders, ſtrangled in priſon, according to the antient cuſtom of putting captive princes to death. The emperor, to reward Theodotus, deſigned to make Egypt a proconſular province, and honour him with that proconſulſhip; but was diverted from it by the prieſts alledging a prediction, which had prevailed even in Cicero's time, viz. that Egypt would recover its antient liberty, when the faſces appeared there [m]. The faſces were carried, as is well known, before the proconſuls.

Bruchium beſieged and taken.

At this time, happened, as we conjecture, the ſiege of Bruchium, deſcribed by Euſebius; Æmilianus himſelf, or his partizans, having probably taken ſhelter there after the battle. Bruchium, or as Euſebius ſtyles it, Pyruchium, was a quarter of the city of Alexandria near the ſea, on the ſide of the Pharos, and as it were, the citadel of that metropolis. There ſtood the royal palace, the place where the Egyptian ſenate ſenate or council met, the public granaries, the muſeum, and the celebrated library of the Egyptian kings, containing once ſeven hundred thouſand volumes, of which four hundred thouſand were burnt in Julius Cæſar's time. The Roman army, under the command of Theodotus, having taken the reſt of the city, laid ſiege to this quarter, and in the end reduced it by famine [n]. This year the Scythians made a new irruption into Aſia, but were with great ſlaughter driven back into their own country by the Roman forces quartered in that province [o].

[i] Vorb. hiſt. Rom. Germanic. p. 339. [k] Gal. vit, p. 179.
[l] Trig. vit. c. 22. p. 196, [m] Idem ibid. c. 21. p. 195.

THE next conſuls were Gallienus, the ſixth time, and Saturninus. Gallienus, by the advice of his brother Valerian and his kinſman Lucillus, to reward the brave Odenatus for the many victories he had gained over the Perſians, took him for his partner in the empire, honoured him with the titles of Cæſar, Auguſtus, and emperor, and all the badges of ſovereignty, and cauſed money to be coined with his name, on which he was repreſented leading the Perſians captive. The title of Auguſta was given to his wife, and that of Cæſar to his children [p]. This action of Gallienus was highly applauded by the ſenate, by the people of Rome, and the whole empire; for to his valor was entirely owing the preſervation of the eaſtern provinces, over-run and ſorely haraſſed by the Perſians. This year, 264, Baliſta, who had held ſome provinces in the eaſt ever ſince the death of Macrinus and his children, was at laſt killed, according to the moſt probable opinion, by a ſoldier ſent by Odenatus for that purpoſe [q]. Gallienus, in the ſpring of this year, left Rome, and marched a ſecond time in perſon againſt Poſthumius, who ſtill reigned in Gaul. At his approach, Poſthumius withdrew into a ſtrong hold, which the emperor immediately inveſted, but ſoon after raiſed the ſiege, having received a wound in the back with an arrow while he was viewing the walls [r]. On ſeveral medals of this year, notice is taken of a victory gained by Gallienus in Gaul, and he is ſtyled the reſtorer of that province [s]. However, Poſthumius ſtill maintained himſelf in poſſeſſion of great part of that country; and this year being preſſed by Gallienus, he choſe for his collegue M. Aurelius Piauvonius Victorinus, as he is ſtyled on the antient coins, of whom we read the following character in Julius Aterianus, a writer of thoſe times: No one, in my opinion, ought to be preferred Gallienus declares Odenatus his partner in the empire.

Baliſta murdered.

Gallienus goes into Gaul.

Poſthumius takes Victorinus for his partner.

[n] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 31. p. 285. [o] Gall. vit. p. 178. [p] Gall. vit. p. 179. Goltz. p. 115. [q] Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 17. p. 193. [r] Gall. vit. p. 177. [s] Birag. p. 376, 377.

to Victorinus, who reigned ſome time in Gaul; he equalled Trajan in bravery, Antoninus in clemency, Nerva in gravity, Veſpaſian in managing the public money, and Pertinax and Severus in his care of the military diſcipline: but his unbridled luſt drowned all his good qualities, and caſt ſuch a blemiſh upon his reputation, that no one dares to record the virtues of a man, whom all owned to have deſerved the doom which in the end overtook him [t]. Of this doom we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place. The next year, Valerian, the emperor's brother, and Lucillus, his kinſman, being conſuls, the Iſaurians revolting in Aſia Minor, choſe for their leader C. Annius Trebellianus, who took upon him the title of Auguſtus, cauſed money to be coined with his name, and reigned ſome time in Iſauria and Cilicia; but was in the end drawn by Cauſiſoleus, the brother of Theodotus, from among the rocks and mountains, where he had taken refuge, into a plain, and there defeated and killed. The Iſaurians ranked him after his death among the gods; and, refuſing to ſubmit to Gallienus, whoſe cruelty they dreaded, maintained themſelves a free people in the very heart of the Roman empire, at leaſt till the time of the emperor Conſtantine, and committed dreadful ravages in Aſia Minor and Syria [u]. While Gaul, Pontus, Thrace, and Illyricum, were held either by a domeſtic or foreign enemy, Africa too had its tyrant, viz. T. Cornelius Celſus, ſet up by Vibius Paſſienus, proconſul of Africa, and Fabius Pomponianus, who commanded on the frontiers of Libya. He was but a tribune, and led at that time a retired life in the country. A lady, by name Galliena, nearly related to the emperor, bore a great ſhare in this revolt. Celſus was a man of great integrity, and worthy of the rank to which he was raiſed; but he held it a ſhort time, being killed the ſeventh day after his election. The inhabitants of Sicca, who had continued faithful to Gallienus, threw his body to the dogs, and crucified him in effigie, which, as our hiſtorian obſerves, had never been practiſed before [v]. Among the other misfortunes of this unhappy reign, we may reckon the loſs of all the conqueſts of Trajan, that is, of the whole province of Dacia, ſeized by the Goths and other northern nations; and the dreadful ravages committed by the Franks in Spain. Victor is of opinion, that they entered that province on the ſide of Gaul [p]; but Adrianus Valeſius proves, from the panegyric of Nazarius on Conſtantine, that they conveyed

The Iſaurians revolt.

Celſus made emperor in Africa, and ſoon after murdered.

Spain plundered by the Franks.

[t] Trig. tyrann. c. 5. p. 186, 187. [u] Idem, c. 25. p. 198.
[v] Idem, c. 28. p. 198. [p] Aur. Vict. in Gall.

conveyed themſelves thither by ſea [q]. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that they entered Spain, ravaged the country far and wide, and took by ſtorm, plundered, and almoſt utterly deſtroyed, the city of Tarraco, which for the ſpace of an hundred and fifty years, bore the marks of what it ſuffered at this time [r]. Some of the Franks from Spain croſſed over into Africa [s]; but what was the iſſue of that raſh undertaking, we are no-where told.

THE following year, Gallienus being conſul, the ſeventh time, with Sabinillus, the brave Odenatus, entering the Perſian territories, put all there to fire and ſword, overcame Sapor in ſeveral battles, beſieged a ſecond time, and, according to Syncellus, made himſelf maſter of, Cteſiphon. But in the mean time, the Goths entering Aſia by the Euxine ſea, over-ran Lydia, Bithynia, Phrygia, Troas, Cappadocia, and Galatia, laying waſte the country, plundering the towns, and carrying off an immenſe booty and an incredible number of captives [t]. The next year, Paternus and Arceſilaus being conſuls, Odenatus, leaving Cteſiphon, haſtened back to the relief of Aſia; but the Goths, not thinking it adviſeable to wait his arrival, reimbarqued at Heraclea in Pontus, and returned home, loaded with booty. Many of them, however, were drowned, being overtaken in the Euxine ſea by the Roman fleet. Odenatus gains great advantages over the Perſians.

All authors agree, that Odenatus was killed about this time, but differ both as to the place and manner of his death. According to Syncellus, he was killed at Heraclea [u]; according to Zoſimus, at Emeſa [w]. Trebellius Pollio writes, that he was murdered by one Mæonius, his couſin, who was proclaimed emperor in his room, but ſoon after put to death. Syncellus aſcribes his death to another Odenatus, who was himſelf murdered by the guards [x]. Some writers ſuppoſe Zenobia herſelf to have aſſiſted the conſpirators underhand, being provoked againſt her huſband for preferring his eldeſt ſon Herod, by a former wife, to the children he had by her [y]. It is certain, that Herod was killed with his father, who, according to ſome writers had taken him for his partner. Such was the end of Odenatus, deſervedly ranked by hiſtorians among the greateſt princes that ever reigned in the eaſt. God, ſays Trebellius Pollio, was angry with the Romans, ſince he took Valerian He is murdered.

[q] Val. rer. Francic. l. i. p. 3, 4. [r] Oroſ. l. vii p. 223. Hier. chron. Eutrop. Vict. [s] Vict. & Val. p. 5. [t] Gall. vit. p. 179. [u] Syncell. p. 382. [w] Zoſ. p. 651. Trig. tyr. c. 14, 16. [x] Syncell. p. 382. [y] Trig. tyrann. c. 16. p. 193.

from them, and did not long preſerve Odenatus [z]. He had begun, as appears from ſome medals [a], the fourth year of his reign. He left behind him three ſons by Zenobia, Herennianus, Timolaus, and Vabalath, or, as he is ſtyled on ſome medals, Hermias Vhaballat [b]. As they were very young at the time of their father's death, Zenobia governed in their name with the title of queen of the eaſt, arrayed them with purple robes and other enſigns of the imperial dignity; and in that attire preſented them, after the death of their father, to the armies, and the aſſemblies of the people [c]. It is uncertain, whether they were put to death by Aurelian, or died before [d]. From their medals it appears, that Herennianus reigned at leaſt two years, Timolaus three, and Vhaballat ſeven [e]. Zenobia did not, it ſeems, tread in the footſteps of her huſband, and keep up, as he had done, a good underſtanding with Gallienus. For we find, that Heraclianus, whom the emperor, upon the news of the death of Odenatus, had ſent into the eaſt to make war upon the Perſians, was this very year defeated by Zenobia, and obliged to return to Rome. Towards the end of the year, one L. Ælianus aſſumed the title of emperor at Mentz; but was ſoon overcome by Poſthumius, who reduced the rebellious city, but would not give it up to be plundered by his ſoldiers, who, thereupon mutinied, and tranſported with rage, murdered their brave leader, with young Poſthumius his ſon. Trebellius Pollio aſcribes his death to Lollianus, who had revolted from him and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Lollianus, ſtyled on the antient coins Spurius Servilius Lollianus [f], was meanly born, but had raiſed himſelf in the army by his gallant conduct. He reigned in that part of Gaul which bordered on the Rhine, while Victorinus, whom Poſthumius had taken for his partner, held the reſt. But he did not long enjoy the ſovereignty, being murdered on account of his ſeverity by his own ſoldiers, ſtirred up by Victorinus, who, upon his death, became ſole maſter of all Gaul, but was ſoon after mortally wounded at Cologn, by one whoſe wife he had debauched. Before he died, he named his ſon L. Aurelius Victorinus his ſucceſſor, though then an infant. But the Gauls, not able to brook the government of a child, murdered him, and ſet up in his room one M. Aurelius Marius, originally an armourer,

His wife Zenobia governs in the name of her children.

Poſthumius murdered in Gaul, and Lollianus declared emperor.

Victorinus and his ſon murdered.

[z] Idem, c. 14. p. 192. [a] Goltz. p. 115. [b] Idem, p.
[c] p. 386. [c] Trig. tyrann. c. 26. p. 192. [d] Idem
[e] Goltz. p. 116. [f] Idem, p. 117.

armourer, but a man of great valour and extraordinary ſtrength. He was killed the third day of his reign by a ſoldier, who had formerly worked under him. The aſſaſſin run him through with his ſword, telling him that it was of his own making [g]. Upon his death the troops in Gaul proclaimed P. Piveſus or Peſuvius Tetricus emperor. He was a Roman ſenator, had been conſul, and was at this time governor of Aquitaine. He was acknowledged in Spain and Britain, as well as in Gaul, and held thoſe provinces with the title of emperor till the fourth year of Aurelian's reign, when he was taken and led in triumph by that prince [h], as we ſhall relate hereafter. He immediately conferred the title of Cæſar upon his ſon C. Pacuvius Piveſus Tetricus, who was then but an infant. All theſe uſurpers in Gaul, viz. Poſthumius, Lollianus, Victorinus, Marius, and Tetricus, were ſet up by Victorina, or Victoria, the mother of Victorinus, who had a great intereſt in Gaul, and bore an irreconcileable hatred to Gallienus. She was honoured, probably by her ſon Victorinus, with the titles of Auguſta, and The mother of the armies. As ſhe was a woman of maſculine courage, and poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, which ſhe liberally diſtributed among the ſoldiers, ſhe gave the empire of Gaul to whom ſhe pleaſed, and bore under all the uſurpers, who were but her creatures, an abſolute ſway. She died during the uſurpation of Tetricus; but whether a natural or violent death, is uncertain; for ſome writers ſeem to inſinuate, that ſhe was privately diſpatched by his orders [i].

Marius declared emperor and murdered; and Tetricus raiſed to the empire in his room.

THE ſame year, the Scythians, that is the Goths, ravaged anew the provinces of Aſia, Bithynia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, and thence carried back with them an immenſe booty; while the Heruli paſſing from the Palus Mœotis into the Euxine ſea with five hundred veſſels, landed at Byzantium and Chryſopolis, now Scutari, under the conduct of one Naulobat. At the latter place they were attacked and defeated by Venerianus, who was himſelf killed in the engagement. Notwithſtanding their defeat, inſtead of returning to their own country, they croſſed the Boſphorus; and ſteering their courſe towards Cyzicus, ſurpriſed and plundered that great and wealthy city, with part of Aſia, and the iſlands of Lemnos and Scyros in the Archipelago. Then they ſailed towards Greece; and landing there, beſieged and burnt Athens, Corinth, Sparta, and Argos, and laid waſte all Achaia; but were in the end attacked and defeated with great ſlaughter by the Athenians,

The irruptions of the Goths.

And the Heruli.

[g] Trig. tyrann. c. 7. p. 187. [h] Idem ibid. c. 23. p. 196.
[i] Idem, c. 30. p. 200.

under the conduct of Dexippus the hiſtorian. However, in their retreat, they committed dreadful devaſtations in Bœotia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Thrace [k]. Gallienus, who was juſt then returned from Gaul, where he had been making war upon Lollianus, leaving Aureolus at Milan, haſtened into Illyricum; and coming unexpectedly upon the barbarians there, gave them a total overthrow. Naulobat, their leader, was obliged to yield himſelf to the emperor's mercy, who treated him with great humanity; and, to gain the affections of the barbarians, even honoured him either with the conſulſhip, or the conſular ornaments [l]. Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, St. Jerom, Oroſius, and Trebellius Pollio, ſpeak of a great victory gained by Gallienus in Illyricum over the Goths, meaning no doubt the Heruli; for all the northern nations are by ſome writers ſtyled Goths, by others Scythians. After this victory, Gallienus haſtened back to Italy, leaving Marcianus in Illyricum, to purſue the war with the Heruli; which he did with no leſs courage than ſucceſs, cutting off great numbers of them, and obliging the reſt to quit their booty, and abandon the Roman dominions [m]. The revolt of Aureolus was what obliged Gallienus to return in great haſte to Italy. For Aureolus, not ſatisfied with the power which he already enjoyed, took advantage of Gallienus's abſence to march with all the troops under his command towards Rome, with a deſign to depoſe Gallienus, and cauſe himſelf to be proclaimed ſole emperor; for ſome writers tell us, that Gallienus had already taken him for his partner in the empire; while others ſtyle him only the emperor's general. Gallienus, hearing of his march, and ſuſpecting his deſign, left Illyricum, and reaching Italy in a few days, came up with him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to ſhelter himſelf within the walls of Milan; which city Gallienus immediately inveſted. This happened in the beginning of the year 268, the fifteenth of Gallienus's reign, when Paternus was conſul, the ſecond time, with Marinianus [n]. All authors agree, that Gallienus was killed during this ſiege, but differ both as to the manner and authors of his death. The moſt probable opinion is, that Marcianus, who was returned from Illyricum, Heraclianus, and Cecrops, a native of Mauritania and commander of the Dalmatian cavalry, no longer able to bear his tyrannical government, conſpired againſt him, and alarming the

Who are defeated by Gallienus.

War beween Aureolus and Gallienus.

Gallienus murdered.

[k] Gall. vit. p. 184. Syncell. p. 382. Zoſ. p. 651. [l] Gall. vit. p. 181. Syncell. ibid. [m] Claud. vit. p. 208. Gall. vit. ibid. [n] Gall. vit. p. 181.

the camp in the dead of the night, as if Aureolus were ſallying out with all his forces, killed him in the dark, with his ſon Gallienus, and his two brothers, Valerian and Egnatius. The ſoldiers, hearing the emperor was dead, and ſuſpecting he had been murdered, began to mutiny; but Marcianus diſtributing large ſums among them, twenty pieces of gold a man, (for Gallienus always carried immenſe treaſures with him) the mutiny was appeaſed, and the whole army declared Gallienus a tyrant, and took the uſual oaths to Claudius, whom the conſpirators propoſed to them as the beſt qualified man in the whole empire to ſuſtain the name and dignity of a Roman emperor [o]. Such was the end of Gallienus, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, according to the moſt probable opinion, after he had reigned fifteen years, ſeven before, and eight after the captivity of his father Valerian. The ſenate declared him a public enemy, ordered moſt of his friends, miniſters, and relations to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock, and cauſed his name to be erazed out of all public inſcriptions. He was one of the moſt wicked princes mentioned in hiſtory, and is ſaid to have equalled Nero in cruelty, and Heliogabalus in lewdneſs. He paſſed his whole time in the company of the moſt infamous proſtitutes in Rome, and, laying aſide all care and thought of the public, ſuffered the Roman dominions to be over-run by the barbarians, and the empire to be rent in pieces by the many uſurpers who ſtarted up in his time, ſhewing no more concern for the loſs of a province, to uſe the expreſſion of Trebellius Pollio, than for that of an old garment. He exerted his cruelty chiefly againſt the ſoldiers, of whom he is ſaid to have ſometimes ordered three or four thouſand to be put to death in one day. He excluded all ſenators from military employments, and would not even ſuffer any of that illuſtrious body to appear in the camp, or among the ſoldiers. Notwithſtanding all his vices, he was a great encourager of learning, being himſelf well verſed in all the branches of polite literature, eſpecially in oratory and poetry. His hiſtorian tells us, that on occaſion of the marriage of his brother's ſon, he made an extemporary epithalamium, which far excelled thoſe that were written at the ſame time, after many days ſtudy, by the beſt Greek and Latin poets then in Rome [p]. After his death, Claudius cauſed him, though univerſally abhorred both by the ſenate and people, to be deified with the uſual ceremonies. His body was in all likelihood conveyed by

And moſt of his miniſters and friends condemned by the ſenate.

Gallienus generally abhorred but deified.

[o] Idem ibid. [p] Idem, p. 180.

by Claudius's orders to Rome; for Ammianus Marcellinus ſpeaks of his tomb on the Appian way, about nine miles from the city [q]. Of the few writers who flouriſhed under him, we ſhall ſpeak in our note (Y).

Claudius proclaimed emperor.

As ſoon as the tumult occaſioned by the death of Gallienus was appeaſed, the ſoldiers, with loud acclamations, proclaimed Claudius emperor. The news of what had happened at Milan reaching Rome on the twenty-fourth of March, the ſenate immediately aſſembled; and the letter which Claudius wrote to them being publicly read, they unanimouſly confirmed the election of the army, proclaimed Claudius emperor, and heaped upon him all the honours which had ever been conferred upon any prince, repeating forty times, That they had always wiſhed to have Claudius, or ſuch a perſon as Claudius, [q] Ammian. p. 472.

(Y) Palfurius Sura wrote the hiſtory of the reign of Gallienus (65); and this is all we know of him. Cœleſtinus and Mæonius Aſtyanax, quoted by ſome of the Auguſtine writers, are equally unknown. They all flouriſhed under Gallienus; for of the tranſactions of his reign they ſpeak as of things happening in their time (66). Voſſius ranks them among the Latin hiſtorians (67). Suidas mentions one Ephorus of Cumæ, who wrote the hiſtory of Calenus, or rather, as others read, Gallienus, in twenty ſeven books (68). Voſſius places him among the Greek hiſtorians, and takes him to have been a native of Cumæ in Aſia (69). He wrote other hiſtories; but none of them have reached us (70). Trebellius Pollio quotes a paſſage out of one Julius Acerianus, much to the credit and reputation of Victorinus, who uſurped the empire in Gaul (71). The ſame writer quotes another paſſage out of one Gallus Antipater, who wrote the hiſtory of Aureolus, and probably of the other tyrants: but he ſeems to have entertained a very bad opinion of him; for he calls him a ſlave to honours, and the diſgrace of hiſtorians, though the paſſage he quotes, does not, in our opinion, deſerve ſuch a ſevere cenſure (72). Under Gallienus flouriſhed likewiſe Lupercus of Berytus, a celebrated grammarian, who wrote ſeveral grammatical pieces, and was in many things preferred to Herodian (73).

(65) Gall. vit. p. 183. (66) Valer. vit. p. 175. Trigint. tyrann. c. 11. p. 190. (67) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. p. 182. (68) Suid. p. 1111. (69) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii c. 16. p. 240. (70) Idem l. i. c. 7. p. 37. (71) Trigint. tyrann. c. 5. p. 187. (72) Claud. vit. p. 203. (73) Suid. p. 58. Voſſ. hiſt Græc. l. ii. c. 16. p. 240.

Claudius, for emperor [r]. He was a native of Illyricum, born, according to ſome, in Dardania, according to others, in Dalmatia. Of his father and anceſtors, Trebellius Pollio owns, that he knows but very little, though, after his acceſſion to the empire, ſome flattering genealogiſts pretended to derive his pedigree from Dardanus and the Trojans [s]. On moſt medals he is ſtyled M. Aurelius Claudius [t]. He had no children, but two brothers, Quintillus, who ſucceeded him, and Criſpus, the father of Claudia, who married Eutropius, and had by him Conſtantius, the father of Conſtantine the Great. The name of Conſtantine was, it ſeems, peculiar to the family of Claudius; for one of his ſiſters was called Conſtantia, a name hitherto never mentioned in hiſtory. The preſent emperor is by all writers, even by Zoſimus, an avowed enemy to Conſtantine, cried up as one of the beſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. He was highly eſteemed by the emperor Valerian, who firſt gave him the command of the fifth legion, and afterwards, at the requeſt of the ſenate, appointed him general of all the troops in Illyricum, which comprehended Thrace, Mœſia, Dalmatia, Pannonia, and Dacia. The ſame emperor deſigned to raiſe him to the conſulſhip, and give him the command of the prætorian guards. Gallienus ſtood in great awe of him; and being informed, that Claudius diſapproved of his conduct, he did all that lay im his power to attach him to his intereſt, ſent him rich preſents, and wrote to one Venuſtus, his particular friend, charging him by all means to gain Claudius, and remove from him all jealouſies and ſuſpicions [u]. In his letter he ſtyled Claudius his friend and kinſman. Claudius attended him in his wars againſt Poſthumius in Gaul, and the Heruli in Illyricum, and was ſent by him, after the revolt of Aureolus, to defend the city of Ticinum, or Pavia. But, in the mean time, Gallienus being killed, he was, though, according to ſome writers, not privy to the conſpiracy, proclaimed emperor [w]. His election was no ſooner confirmed by the ſenate, than he attacked Aureolus, encamped at a ſmall diſtance from Milan, utterly defeated the troops under his command, and took the uſurper himſelf priſoner. He deſigned to grant him his life; but the ſoldiers killed him without his orders. The emperor raiſed a monument to his memory, cauſed his body to be honourably interred, and ordered a bridge to be built over the Adda, at the place where he had been killed; which, which, from his name, he called Pons Aureoli, The bridge of Aureolus; whence the preſent village of Pontirolo, on the Adda, between Milan and Bergamo, in all likelihood, took its name [x]. After the death of Aureolus, the troops that had ſerved under him acknowledged Claudius, who, without loſs of time, led them and the reſt of his army againſt the Germans, who had broken into Italy, and were advanced as far as the lake Benacus, now Lago di Garda, near Verona. There the emperor defeated them in a pitched battle, cut incredible numbers of them in pieces, obliged thoſe who outlived the general ſlaughter to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight into their own country, and returning to Rome, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, paſſed the remaining part of the year in ſettling affairs there; which he did with great prudence and juſtice, redreſſing all grievances, and ſuppreſſing the many abuſes and diſorders which had prevailed in the late reign.

His extraction and preferments.

Aureolus defeated and killed.

[r] Claud. vit. p. 203. [s] Idem, p. 206. [t] Goltz. p. 117. Birag. p. 402. [u] Claud. vit, p. 207. [w] Idem, p. 203.

The Germans defeated by Claudius.

In the beginning of the following year, he entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having Paternus for his collegue, and ſoon after ſet out from Rome, to make head againſt the Goths and other northern nations, who, to the number of three hundred and twenty thouſand fighting men, beſides women, ſervants, and children, had invaded the Roman dominions, and committed every where moſt dreadful ravages, laying waſte whole provinces, burning cities, and putting all to fire and ſword. The emperor came up with them, as they were retiring, loaded with booty, through Upper Mœſia. As he was upon the point of engaging them, he wrote with his own hand the following letter to the ſenate: "I am, conſcript fathers, in ſight of the enemy, "and ready to engage them: they are three hundred and "twenty thouſand ſtrong. If I overcome them, you will "not, I hope, be ungrateful. If I ſhould not be attended "with ſucceſs, you will remember that I fight after the reign "of Gallienus. The whole empire is quite ſpent and ex-"hauſted, partly by him, and partly by the many tyrants, "who, during his reign, uſurped the ſovereignty, and laid "waſte our provinces. We want even ſhields, ſwords, and "ſpears. The provinces of Gaul and Spain, the main "ſtrength of the empire, are in the hands of Tetricus. Our "archers to our great ſhame, are with-held from us by Ze-"nobia. Whatever therefore we perform ſucceſsfully in "our preſent circumſtances, muſt be accounted great."

He marches againſt the Goths, and other northern nations.

But,

[x] Trigint. tyran. c. 10. p. 190.

But, notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, Claudius advanced boldly againſt the barbarians, and, after a long and obſtinate diſpute, gained one of the greateſt victories mentioned in hiſtory; for no fewer than three hundred thouſand of the enemy were killed or taken priſoners. The emperor himſelf gave the following account of this memorable victory in a letter, which he wrote after the battle, to Junius Brocchus, governor of Illyricum: "We have utterly defeated an amy "of three hundred and twenty thouſand Goths, and deſtroy-"ed their fleet, conſiſting of two thouſand ſail. The fields "and ſhores are covered with ſwords, ſhields, and dead "bodies. We have taken ſuch numbers of captives, that, "not to mention the men, two or three women will fall "to the ſhare of each ſoldier in our victorious army [x]." Among the priſoners were many princes and perſons of great diſtinction. All the provinces of the empire were filled with captives, who were employed to till the ground, and every city could ſhew you, ſays Pollio, glorious monuments of the fortune and courage of the brave and invincible Claudius [y]. For this victory the emperor took the ſurname of Gothicus [z]. While Claudius was thus employed againſt the barbarians, Zenobia, having overcome Probus, who commanded ſome troops in Egypt, reduced that province, and, after a long ſiege, took and utterly deſtroyed Bruchium, the citadel of Alexandria. Probus, finding he could not by any means eſcape falling into the hands of the victorious queen, diſpatched himſelf with his own ſword [a]. The following year, when Antiochianus and Orphitus were conſuls, the emperor having nothing to fear from the barbarians, reſolved to march againſt Zenobia, who held all the provinces in the eaſt; but was prevented by a violent plague which broke out in his army, and made a dreadful havock of his men. The emperor himſelf was in the end ſeized and carried off by the raging diſtemper at Sirmium in Pannonia, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, after he had reigned, according to the moſt probable opinion, two years and one month [b]. In him centered, ſays Trebellius Pollio, the moderation of Auguſtus, the valour of Trajan, the piety of Antoninus, and all the virtues of the good princes who had reigned before him [c]. He may be truly ſaid to have re-eſtabliſhed, during his ſhort, but glorious reign, the tottering empire, and to have reſtored it to its former

And gains a memorable victory over them.

Zenobia reduces Egypt.

The death of Claudius.

[x] Claud. vit. p. 204. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Goltz. p. 118.
[a] Zoſ. p. 654, 655. [b] Idem, p. 654. Euſeb. chron. p. 138. Gruter, p. 276. [c] Claud. vit. p. 203.

Extraordinary honours conferred on him by the ſenate and people of Rome.

former luſtre. The ſenate not only beſtowed divine honours upon him after his death, but hung up in the place where they aſſembled a ſhield of gold, on which was engraved his image. This ſhield was ſtill to be ſeen in the reign of Conſtantine the Great. The people erected to him at their own expence two ſtatues, one of gold ten foot high, which they placed by that of Jupiter in the capitol, and another of ſilver in the forum, weighing fifteen hundred pounds, and repreſenting the emperor in his triumphal robes [d]. Claudius, and not Gallienus, as Spanhemius pretends [e], was the laſt emperor, who aſſumed on his medals the titles of high pontiff and tribune of the people [f]. Upon the death of Claudius, the ſenate and people of Rome proclaimed his brother Quintillus emperor, who was then at Aquileia, in which city he was murdered by his ſoldiers, after a ſhort reign of ſeventeen days, for attempting to reſtore with too much ſeverity the diſcipline of the primitive times. Thus Trebellius Pollio [g]. But Zoſimus [h] and Zonaras [i] tells us, that Quintillus, hearing Aurelian had been acknowledged emperor by the army in Pannonia, and finding his own troops ready to revolt, by the advice of his friends, cauſed his veins to be opened, and by that means put an end to his life and reign. Moſt writers ſpeak of him as one in every reſpect equal to his brother.

His brother Quintillus proclaimed emperor; but dies ſoon after.

Upon his death, the ſenate readily confirmed the election of Aurelian, and honoured him with the title of Auguſtus. He was, according to moſt writers, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, of a mean deſcent, but univerſally admired on account of his extraordinary ſtrength and courage. He had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a very eminent manner under the emperors Valerian, Gallienus, and Claudius, in their wars with the barbarians, of whom he is ſaid to have killed with his own hand forty-eight in one engagement, and in ſeveral others nine hundred and fifty; whence ſongs were made upon his exploits, and ſung publicly by the youth on feſtival days. As there were two Aurelians at the ſame time in the army, and both tribunes, the ſoldiers uſed to diſtinguiſh the preſent Aurelian with the ſurname of Manu ad ferrum, that is, Hand to the ſword; ſo ready was he on all occaſions to draw his ſword, and encounter the enemy [k]. He was a moſt ſtrict obſerver of the military diſcipline, and uſed to puniſh with the Aurelian raiſed to the empire.

His extraction and preferments.

[d] Idem, p. 208. [e] Spanh. l. viii. p. 699. [f] Vide Birag. p. 402. Noris. de Licinii nummo, c. 3. p. 49. [g] Claud. vit. p. 206. [h] Zoſ. p. 654. [i] Zonar. p. 239. [k] Aurel. vit. p. 210, 211.

the utmoſt ſeverity the leaſt neglect of duty, and the leaſt injury offered by his ſoldiers to any of the inhabitants of the provinces, through which he marched. He was, when proclaimed emperor, commander in chief of the cavalry, to which poſt he had raiſed himſelf from the low ſtation of a common ſoldier [1]. From Sirmium, where he was ſaluted emperor by the whole army, after the death of Claudius, he haſtened to Rome, and was received there, both by the ſenate and people, with extraordinary demonſtrations of joy; but, before he could ſettle affairs in the metropolis of the empire, he was obliged to return in great haſte to Pannonia, the Goths, notwithſtanding their late moſt dreadful overthrow, having anew broken into that province. Aurelian engaged them, and the battle laſted without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide, till night, when the enemy repaſſed the Danube, and the next day ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace; which Aurelian readily granted them, being informed, that the Alemanni, the Juthongæ, whoſe country bordered upon Rhœtia, and the Marcomanni, threatened to invade Italy itſelf, and were committing dreadful ravages and devaſtations in ſeveral parts. Againſt them therefore Aurelian led the flower of his army, and meeting them in Vindelicia, which comprehended all the preſent Bavaria and great part of Suevia, he put them to flight, and cut off great numbers of them, as they attempted to paſs the Danube. Hereupon they ſent embaſſadors to the emperor, offering to renew their antient alliance with Rome, provided they were allowed to return unmoleſted into their own country; for Aurelian had cut off their retreat, and detached part of his army to guard the banks of the Danube. The emperor, elated with his victory, would hearken to no terms; which threw the enemy into the utmoſt deſpair. After various conſultations and debates among themſelves, they reſolved at length to enter Italy, ſince they could not return to their own country; and accordingly, finding the paſſes unguarded, (for Aurelian apprehended no attempt of that nature) they advanced before the emperor came up with them, as far as Placentia. There Aurelian attacked them; but, after having loſt moſt of his troops, was put to flight and utterly defeated. The barbarians, puffed up with ſo ſignal a victory, purſued their march, not doubting, but they ſhould be able to take Rome itſelf, as the Gauls had formerly done. But, in the mean time, Aurelian, having rallied his diſperſed troops, and reinforced them with the legions Concludes a peace with the Goths.

He defeats ſeveral German nations;

Who nevertheleſs enter Italy, and put the emperor to flight:

[1] Idem, p. 211.

gions quartered in Illyricum, came unexpectedly upon the enemy in the neighbourhood of Fanum Fortunæ, now Fano, and gave them a dreadful overthrow. Such of them as eſcaped from this firſt battle, were ſlain in two others, one of which was fought near Placentia, and the other in the plains of Ticinium. Thus was the whole multitude cut off to a man [m]. To this day is to be ſeen at Peſaro, a city about five miles from Fano, a monument erected by the inhabitants in memory of the victory gained there by Aurelian over the Germans [n]. While the emperor was preparing to return to Rome, news was brought him, that the Vandals had paſſed the Danube, under the conduct of two of their kings and ſeveral other princes. This obliged him to haſten to the defence of the threatened provinces. The Vandals retired upon his approach; the emperor, however, purſued and overtook them before they reached the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſue for peace; which he readily granted them, upon their delivering to him as hoſtages the ſons of their two kings, and ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction. He incorporated two thouſand of their beſt men in his army, and ordered the reſt to be ſupplied with proviſions at the public expence, till they reached the Danube [o]. Aurelian, having thus happily ended the wars with the Goths, Germans, and Vandals, returned to Rome, and, in the beginning of the following year, entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, having for his collegue, Numerius Ceionius Virius Baſſus. As ſeveral diſturbances had happened in Rome during his abſence, he puniſhed the authors of them with great ſeverity, and ſuch too as were accuſed of having blamed his conduct in the German war. Trebellius Pollio tells us, that, tho' he was in other reſpects an excellent prince, he often ſufferred his paſſion to get the better of his reaſon, and puniſhed with exceſſive rigor faults, which an humane prince would have over-looked. He put ſeveral ſenators to death, upon the depoſition of a ſingle witneſs; and often gave ear to the accuſations of perſons, who deſerved no credit; which much leſſened the reputation he had gained by his exploits in the field, and eſtranged from him the minds both of the ſenate and people [p]. The emperor Julian charges him with having put many perſons to death unjuſtly [q]; and Ammianus Marcellinus writes, that he was glad of any pretence

But are in the end all cut off.

The Vandals defeated.

Aurelian eſtranges the minds of the ſenate and people with his ſeverity.

[m] Idem, p. 215, 216. Dexipp. legat. p. 7.—11. [n] Gruter. p. 276. [o] Dexipp. legat. p. 12. [p] Aurel. vit. p. 116. [q] Julian. Cæſ. p. 16.

tence to condemn the rich, being in great want of money to carry on the war and pay his troops [r]. This year, with the consent and approbation of the senate, he undertook the repairing the walls of the city, which he likewise extended; so that they were near fifty miles in compass [s]. This great work was not accomplished till the latter end of the reign of Probus [t].

THE following year, when Quietus and Voldumianus were consuls, Aurelian, having settled affairs in Pannonia, Italy, and at Rome, left the city anew, and set out for the east, to make war upon the celebrated Zenobia, who, to the great disgrace of the empire, had held for several years most of the eastern provinces. This queen, one of the most illustrious women mentioned in history, is styled on several medals Septimia Zenobia [u]; whence some writers conclude her to have been allied to the family of the emperor Septimius Severus. She pretended to derive her pedigree from the Cleopatras and Ptolemies of Egypt, and her family was reckoned one of the most conspicuous in the east. She was well versed in all the branches of polite literature, understood thoroughly the Egyptian, Greek, and Latin languages, and in the knowledge of history, excelled most men of her time. She is even said to have compiled an abridgment of the Egyptian and Oriental historians, which was in great request among the learned [w]. St. Athanasius writes, that she professed the Jewish religion [x], and is therein followed by Abulfaragius [y]. She married the celebrated Odenatus, prince of Palmyra, and afterwards partner in the empire with Gallienus. She had great share in the many signal victories gained by her husband over the Persians, and is said to have been no less courageous than that brave commander, and equally experienced in military affairs. Upon his death, she arrayed her three sons, Herennianus, Timolaus, and Vhaballat, in purple, caused them to be acknowledged by all the eastern provinces as joint-emperors of Rome, and obliged them to conform to the Roman customs, and use not the Greek, which was spoken by other eastern princes, but the Latin, tongue. As they were under age, she governed in their name, with the title of queen of the east, for the space of five, or, as others will have it, six, years, discharging each duty of an excellent prince and experienced commander,

He marches against Zenobia.

Her extraction, conduct, and administration.

[r] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 431. [s] Aur. Vict. epit. Aurel. vit. p. 216. [t] Zos. p. 655. [u] Birag. p. 385. Spanh p. 937. [w] Aur. vit. p. 219. [x] Athan. solit. p. 857. [y] Abul. p. 81.

mander, with all the prudence and intrepidity of a man. She ſhewed great wiſdom in her counſels, was ſteady in her reſolutions, kind and generous to perſons of merit, but inexorable when ſeverity was judged neceſſary. She lived with all the grandeur of a queen, imitating the pomp and magnificence of the Perſian monarch, and cauſing all thoſe who approached her to fall proſtrate before her, after the manner of the Perſian court. She often appeared at the head of her troops, armed with an helmet and arrayed with the imperial robes, harangued them, and marched with them ſeveral miles on foot, uſing a horſe, and ſometimes a chariot, when the marches were long, but ſeldom a litter. In imitation of the Roman emperors, ſhe gave magnificent entertainments, not ſcrupling on theſe occaſions to drink plentifully with the officers of her army, and the Perſian and Armenian embaſſadors, though otherwiſe very ſober and temperate [z]. In the reign of Gallienus, ſhe defeated Heraclianus, as we have related above, and, by his overthrow, remained in peaceable poſſeſſion of all Syria and Meſopotamia, to which ſhe added Egypt, while Claudius was taken up with the Gothic war. Not ſatisfied with theſe acquiſitions, in the reign of Aurelian, ſhe ſeized on great part of Aſia, and attempted to reduce Bithynia *. Aurelian, deſirous to put an end to her uſurpation, ordered all his forces to aſſemble in Illyricum, and ſetting out from Rome early in the ſpring of this year 272, bent his march through Thrace, where he engaged and put to flight ſeveral barbarous nations, who had madeirruptions into that province. He even paſſed the Danube, and in an engagement with Caunabaud, a Gothick prince, ſlew him and five thouſand of his men [a]. Having thus defeated the Goths, he purſued his march to Byzantium, and, croſſing the Boſphorus, entered Bithynia, which was held by Zenobia, according to Vopiſcus, but immediately ſubmitted. From Bithynia he advanced into Cappadocia, where the inhabitants of Tyana ſhut their gates againſt him; which ſo incenſed Aurelian, that he ſwore he would not leave a dog alive in the place. His ſoldiers attacked it with great fury; but were in their repeated aſſaults repulſed with conſiderable loſs by the inhabitants, till one of them, by name Heraclammon, betrayed his country and fellow-citizens to the enemy. We are told by Vopiſcus, that the ghoſt of the famous Apollonius Tyaneus, appearing to Aurelian, warned him not to deſtroy the place of his nativity; and that the emperor, moved

Her exploits.

Aurelian defeats the Goths, and kills one of their kings.

Takes Tyana in Cappadocia.

[z] Trigint. tyran. c. 29. p. 198. * Zoſ. p. 655. [a] Aur. vit. p. 216.

moved by this apparition, would not ſuffer his ſoldiers to offer the leaſt injury to the inhabitants, anſwering them, when they put him in mind of his vow not to leave a dog alive in the place, that they might kill, if they pleaſed, all the dogs, provided they ſpared the inhabitants. This anſwer was received with great applauſe by the ſoldiers themſelves, who were no leſs pleaſed, ſays Vopiſcus, with the humour of their general, than if he had abandoned to them all the riches of that opulent city [b]. Heraclammon, who betrayed the place, was the only perſon whom the emperor ſuffered to be put to death. Concerning him he wrote the following letter to Mallius Chilo, who was, it ſeems, the emperor's particular friend:

Suffers the perſon who betrayed it to be put to death.

" I have taken Tyana, and ſuffered the perſon, by whoſe fa" vour, and, as it were, good offices, I took it, to be cut " in pieces by my ſoldiers. I have ſpared the reſt; but could " not endure ſuch a traitor. Would he ever have been faith" ful to me, who betrayed his own country? He was rich,
" I own it; but his eſtate I have given to his children, that " no one might accuſe me, as if I had put him to death for
" the ſake of his wealth [c] ". From Tyana Aurelian led his army ſtrait to Antioch, defeated the troops of Zenobia in the neighbourhood of that city, and entered, as it were, in triumph the metropolis of Syria. This victory, however, coſt him dear; for the Palmyrenians (ſo the troops of Zenobia are ſtyled by hiſtorians) fought with incredible bravery, and the Romans owed the victory rather to art than valour; for obſerving the enemy's cavalry heavily armed, they betook themſelves to flight; and facing about unexpectedly, when they were quite ſpent with the long purſuit, put them eaſily in diſorder, and gained a complete victory [d]. From Antioch Aurelian purſued his march to Emeſa, whither Zenobia had retired with her army, conſiſting of ſeventy thouſand men. Under her commanded one Zabas, or Zabdas, a man of great courage and experience, who had ſignalized himſelf in the Perſian wars in the time of Odenatus. After ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with various ſucceſs, both armies came to a general engagement, in which the Roman horſe were put to flight at the firſt onſet; but their infantry attacking the enemy both in the front and flanks, left naked and expoſed by the departure of their cavalry, who were purſuing the Romans, obliged them, after a long and obſtinate diſpute, to give ground, and ſhelter themſelves behind the walls of Emeſa; which place, however, they abandoned at the approach of the victorious army, and withdrew with Zenobia to Palmyra, whither Aurelian purſued them cloſe, though ſtrangely haraſſed in his march by the Syrian robbers, who cut off great numbers of his men.

Zenobia's army defeated.

Zenobia defeated a ſecond time.

[b] Idem, p. 217. [c] Idem, ibid. [d] Zoſ. p 655.

Palmyra beſieged.

He immediately inveſted the place, hoping to carry it by repeated aſſaults; but all his efforts proving unſucceſsful, he began to batter it with an incredible number of warlike machines. The beſieged, animated by the example of their queen, not only repulſed the aggreſſors with ſhowers of arrows, darts, and ſtones, but rallied them from the walls, without ſparing the emperor himſelf. Aurelian owned in one of his letters, that he had never engaged a more brave and reſolute enemy; and mentioning Zenobia, ſays, that ſhe did not behave like a timorous woman, but fought with all the boldneſs of a man in deſpair. "It is incredible, adds he, what thick ſhowers "of arrows, darts, and ſtones ſhe diſcharges upon us; ſhe "harraſſes us night and day with fire from her engines, &c. "However, I hope the gods, who have never yet failed to "ſecond our endeavours, will not on this occaſion abandon "the cauſe of the Roman people." The emperor, at length quite tired out with the toils and fatigues of ſo long a ſiege, wrote a letter to Zenobia, exhorting her to ſurrender, and promiſing her her life. To this letter Zenobia returned the following anſwer: "No man ever before you made "ſuch a demand. It is not by letters, but valour, that you "muſt induce me to ſubmit. You cannot but know, that "Cleopatra choſe rather to die, than to live under Auguſtus, "notwithſtanding the mighty promiſes he made her. I expect "daily the Perſians, Saracens, and Armenians, who are all "haſtening to my relief; and what will then become of you "and your army, whom the robbers of Syria have put to "flight? You will then lay aſide that pride and preſumption "with which you command me to ſurrender, as if you were "the conqueror of the univerſe[c]." Aurelian, piqued with this anſwer, immediately ordered a general aſſault; but was repulſed with great loſs, and obliged to give over the attempt. However, he defeated a few days after, the Perſians, who came to the relief of the place; and what by menaces, what by mighty promiſes, prevailed upon the Armenians and Saracens to join him againſt the queen, whom they were come to aſſiſt. Zenobia, finding her ſelf diſappointed as to the ſuccours, which ſhe had long expected, and deſpairing of being able to hold out much longer with her own forces, reſolved to withdraw privately from the city into Perſia, Zenobia's anſwer to Aurelian, requiring her to ſubmit.

and

[c] Aur. vit. p. 218.

and there ſollicit in perſon more powerful ſupplies. Accordingly ſhe ſet out in the dead of the night with a ſmall retinue on fleet camels, carrying with her part of her jewels and treaſures. But Aurelian, who was very watchful, having had timely notice of her flight, detached a party of horſe after the fugitive queen; who coming up with her as ſhe was ready to croſs the Euphrates in a boat, ſeized her, and carried her back to Aurelian, who from that moment began to look upon himſelf as the conqueror and ſole lord of the eaſt. When ſhe was brought into his preſence, he aſked her, What had prompted her to take up arms againſt, and inſult over, the emperors of Rome? To this queſtion the queen replied, with no leſs intrepidity than addreſs, That ſhe looked upon him indeed, who knew how to conquer, as emperor; but as for Gallienus, Aureolus, and ſuch as reſembled them, ſhe had never thought them worthy of that name [f].

Zenobia taken and brought to Aurelian.

The city of Palmyra ſtill held out, and ſome were againſt ſubmitting upon any terms whatſoever; but others ſued for mercy, and, upon the emperor's promiſing to grant them their lives, opened their gates to the conqueror, who ſpared the inhabitants, but ſtripped the city of all its wealth, and appointed one Sandarion governor of the place, with five hundred archers and other troops under his command [g]. After this, the emperor returned to Emeſa, carrying with him the captive queen, whoſe death the ſoldiers demanded with loud clamours; but the emperor thought it beneath him to ſpill the blood of a woman, the more, becauſe ſhe had with great care defended the eaſtern provinces againſt the Perſians and other neighbouring nations, ready to ſeize them during the domeſtic diſturbances that prevailed in every part of the empire [h]. The emperor likewiſe ſpared Vhaballat, the queen's youngeſt ſon [i]. As for the other two, Herennianus and Timolaus, Pollio tells us in one place, that it is uncertain whether they died a natural or violent death [k]; and elſewhere, that they were led in triumph with the queen their mother [l]. All writers agree, that Aurelian cauſed many perſons of diſtinction to be executed at Emeſa for ſiding with Zenobia, and ordered others to be thrown over-board when he croſſed over from Chalcedon to Thrace. Among the former was the celebrated philoſopher Longinus, of whom hereafter. The fame of this victory ſoon reached the moſt diſtant nations;

The city of Palmyra ſubmits.

[f] Trigint. tyran. c. 29. p. 199. [g] Aur. vit. p. 219. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Zoſ. p. 661. Birag. p. 385. [k] Trig. tyran. c. 26. p. 198. [l] Idem, c. 23. p. 196.

All the eaſtern and ſouthern nations court the friendſhip of Aurelian.

and they all ſtrove, with ſolemn embaſſies and rich preſents, to gain the friendſhip of the conqueror of Zenobia. Among theſe are mentioned the Blemyes, the Auxumites, the inhabitants of Arabia Felix, the Bactrians, Iberians, Albanians, Saracens, Armenians, Ethiopians, Indians, Perſians, and even the Seres or Chineſe. Hormiſdas, or, as Eutychius calls him, Hormoz al Horri, who had ſucceeded his father Sapor in the kingdom of Perſia, ſent to the emperor, amongſt other preſents, a chariot, covered all over with gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones of an ineſtimable value, and a ſcarlet mantle of ſuch a lively colour, that the Romans had never ſeen any but what came infinitely ſhort of it. Aurelian, and after him Probus and Diocleſian, taken with its extraordinary brightneſs and beauty, ſent, but to no effect, perſons into the eaſt, on purpoſe to diſcover the art of dying to ſuch an extraordinary perfection [m]. Aurelian, having thus recovered and ſettled in peace the eaſtern provinces, returned by Chalcedon and Byzantium into Europe, carrying with him his illuſtrious captive. He defeated, on his march through Thrace, the Carpi, who had broken into that province; but at the ſame time he was informed, that the inhabitants of Palmyra had revolted, put the Roman governor and garriſon to the ſword, and proclaimed a kinſman of Zenobia, named Achilleus, or, as Zoſimus calls him, Antiochus, their ſovereign. Upon this intelligence, the emperor, with great expedition, haſtened back into Syria, and arriving at Palmyra before the inhabitants had any notice of his march, he took the city without oppoſition, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition [n]. He had not yet quitted the eaſt, when news was brought him, that Egypt had revolted, and ſet up for emperor one Firmus, or rather Firmius, as he is ſtyled on ſuch of his medals as have reached our times [o]. He was a native of Seleucia in Syria; but poſſeſſed an immenſe eſtate in Egypt, and carried on an advantageous trade with the Saracens, the Blemyes, a people of Ethiopia, and the inhabitants of India; for he uſed to brag, that with his gains only upon paper and glue, he could maintain a whole army. Vopiſcus relates wonderful things of his ſtrength and appetite. He was greatly attached to Zenobia, and, to keep up her party and intereſt, aſſumed the title of Auguſtus, made himſelf maſter of Egypt, and ſtopped the corn which it uſed to ſend yearly to Rome. Aurelian marched

Palmyra revolts; but is retaken, and all the inhabitants put to the ſword

The revolt of Firmius.

[m] Aur. vit. p. 218. [n] Aur. vit p. 219. [o] Goltz. p. 119. Spanh. l. vii. p. 599.

marched againſt him with that expedition which was peculiar to him, and, being attended with his uſual ſucceſs, overcame the uſurper, ſtormed a ſtrong hold to which he fled, and having taken him priſoner, cauſed him to be publicly executed [p]. Having thus ſuppreſſed all troubles in the eaſt, he returned the ſecond time to Europe, with a deſign to recover and reunite to the empire the provinces of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, which were ſtill held by Tetricus. This he eaſily compaſſed, Tetricus himſelf, no longer able to bear the continual diſorders and mutinies of his troops, inviting him privately into Gaul [q]. However, a battle was fought near Chalon on the Marne; during which, Tetricus voluntarily yielding to Aurelian, his troops, deſtitute of a leader, were cut in pieces. Thus was Gaul, after it had been held for the ſpace of thirteen years by different tyrants, united a-new to the empire. Towards the end of this year, when Tacitus, afterwards emperor, and Placidianus were conſuls, Aurelian returned to Rome, where he was received with the moſt magnificent triumph the city had ever beheld. There were four royal and ſtately chariots: the firſt, which had belonged to Odenatus, was entirely covered with ſilver, gold, and jewels; another, equally rich and magnificent, was a preſent to Aurelian from the king of Perſia; the third was Zenobia's own chariot; and the fourth, which was drawn by four ſtags, had been taken by Aurelian from a Gothic prince. In the latter the emperor himſelf made his entry. Theſe chariots were preceded by twenty elephants, and great variety of wild beaſts from different countries. Next came eight hundred couple of gladiators, followed by an incredible number of captives of different nations, with their hands tied behind their backs, viz. Goths, Alans, Roxalans, Sarmatians, Franks, Suevians, Vandals, Alemans, Blemyes, Auxumites, Arabians, Eudæmonians, Indians, Bactrians, Iberians, Saracens, Armenians, Perſians, ſuch of the Palmyrenians as had outlived the late ſlaughter, ſome Egyptians taken in the late rebellion of Firmius, and ten Gothic women, whom Aurelian had taken fighting in the habit of men. Theſe were followed by Tetricus, in a ſcarlet robe, and his ſon, whom he had taken for his partner in the empire. Next to them marched Zenobia, whoſe uncommon beauty, noble ſtature, and majeſtic mien attracted the eyes of the ſpectators, and ſeemed to eclipſe the grandeur and luſtre of the emperor himſelf. She was bound with chains of gold, which other perſons bore up, apparelled with the richeſt tiſſues and robes, and ſo loaded with pearls and precious ſtones, that ſhe was often obliged to halt, being ready to ſink under ſo great a burden. Zenobia was followed by the emperor's triumphal chariot, the ſenate in a body, the people of Rome with their various ſtandards, and the victorious legions, horſe and foot, in rich and ſplendid armour, with crowns of laurel on their heads, and branches of palm-trees, the ſymbol of victory, in their hands. The ſenate, however, in the midſt of the public rejoicings, betrayed no ſmall concern to ſee Tetricus, one of their own body, who had even been conſul, led in triumph. In the capitol Aurelian ſacrificed to Jupiter the four ſtags that had drawn his chariot, in compliance with a vow he had made, when he took them. From the capitol, he went to the palace, attended by the ſenate and ſuch crouds of people, that the day was far ſpent before he could reach it. The next and ſeveral following days, he diverted the people with plays, races in the circus, ſhews of gladiators, combats of wild beaſts, ſea-fights in the naumachia, and all ſorts of entertainments [r]. He treated his illuſtrious captives with great humanity and kindneſs. To

Gaul reduced.

Aurelian's triumph.

[p] Aur. vit. p. 220. Zoſ. p. 66. [q] Trig. tyran. c. 23. p. 119.

His humanity towards Zenobia and her children;

Zenobia he gave lands and poſſeſſions in the neighbourhood of Tibur, now Tivoli, ſufficient to maintain her according to her rank. On that eſtate ſhe lived, ſays Trebellius Pollio, like a Roman matron, with her children, that is, according to Zonaras, with her daughters, whom Aurelian took under his protection, and married to perſons of the firſt quality in Rome [s]. The ſame writer adds, that Aurelian himſelf married one of them; which may perhaps be as true as what Syncellus had written before him, viz. that the emperor gave Zenobia herſelf in marriage to an illuſtrious ſenator [t]. Be that as it will, it is certain that her deſcendents lived ſtill at Rome in great ſplendor about the latter end of the fourth century [u]. Baronius takes the holy biſhop of Florence, Zenobius, who was contemporary with St. Ambroſe, to have been of her family [w]. As for her ſon Vhaballat, he retired into Armenia, where Aurelian gave him, it ſeems, a ſmall principality; for he coined money, and is ſtyled on ſome of his coins, which are ſtill to be ſeen, Vhaballat of Armenia, and on others, Vhaballat king of the Verimi, probably an obſcure people of Armenia [x]. The emperor ſhewed no leſs kindneſs kindneſs to Tetricus, than to Zenobia. To make ſome amends for the injury he had done him, by leading him like a captive in triumph, he heaped many honours upon him, ſtyling him his collegue, his fellow-ſoldier, and even honouring him ſometimes with the title of emperor. He appointed him governor of Lucania, telling him pleaſantly, that it was more to his reputation to govern a province of Italy, than to reign beyond the Alps [y]. He treated with the ſame humanity and good-nature young Tetricus, whom he had led in triumph with his father, ſuffering him to continue in the ſenate, and leaving his eſtate untouched, which he tranſmitted to his poſterity, who lived at Rome, under the ſucceeding princes, in great ſplendor, eſteemed and revered by perſons of all ranks. In the houſe of the Tetrici, on mount Cœlius, was ſtill to be ſeen, in the time of Conſtantine the Great, a moſt beautiful piece, repreſenting in moſaic work the father and ſon delivering up a ſceptre and crown to Aurelian, and Aurelian reſtoring to them the ſenatorial robes, and inveſting them in their former dignity [z].

[r] Aur. vit. p. 220. [s] Trig. tyrann. c. 29. p. 198. Zon. p. 240. [t] Syncell. p. 385. [u] Hier. chron. [w] Baron. ad ann. 274. [x] Birag. p. 407. Goltz. p. 116.

And towards Tetricus and his ſon.

THE next conſuls were Aurelian, the ſecond time, and C. Julius Capitolinus. This year, the emperor continued at Rome; and, being now diverted by no foreign or domeſtic wars, he applied himſelf wholly to the ſuppreſſing of ſeveral abuſes, which had prevailed in the time of Gallienus, and which Claudius had not been able to obviate, during his ſhort reign. He made ſeveral regulations, which gained him the affections of the people, whom he had eſtranged from him, in the beginning of his reign, with his cruelty, to which he had naturally a great bias. To the bounties of the emperors his predeceſſors, who had eſtabliſhed funds for diſtributing bread and oil among the people, he added a certain portion of hogs-fleſh to be given with the bread and oil; and encreaſed the latter largeſs by the addition of an ounce to each pound. He even deſigned to eſtabliſh a fund for diſtributing a certain quantity of wine among them; but was either prevented by death from putting his deſign in execution, or, as others write, diverted from it by the captain of the guards, who told him, that if he allowed the populace wine, they would next expect geeſe and chickens [a]. When he left Rome to make war upon Zenobia, he promiſed to give to each man among the people a crown weighing two pounds, if he returned conqueror. The people thought he meant crowns of gold;

Several regulations made by Aurelian.

[y] Eutrop. Aur. Vict. epit. [z] Trig. tyr. c. 23, 24 p. 196, 197. [a] Aurel. vit. p. 225.

gold; but when they challenged his promiſe, the emperor cauſed loaves to be made of the fineſt flour in the form of crowns, each weighing two pounds, and diſtributed them daily among the people ſo long as he lived, as he frequently did money and cloaths. He appointed, that Egypt ſhould ſupply the city of Rome yearly with a certain quantity of glaſs, paper, linen, and ſeveral other things, that were either the natural growth of, or manufactured in, that country [b]. He cauſed wharfs to be built along the banks of the Tiber, and the chanel of that river to be cleanſed and dug deeper. But nothing more obliged perſons of all ranks, than his generouſly remitting whatever was owing this year by private perſons to the exchequer, and his publicly burning in the forum of Trajan all the papers, bonds, and regiſters, relating to ſuch debts. At the ſame time, he publiſhed an act of oblivion with reſpect to all crimes committed againſt the ſtate to that day. From that time forward he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity ſuch as accuſed others, without being able to make good their charge [c]. He enacted many wholeſome laws, by which he is ſaid to have purged Rome of all profeſſed lewdneſs, irreligion, and wicked arts. Finding that eunuchs began to be ſold at a very great rate, he fixed the number which each perſon might keep of ſuch ſlaves, according to their different ranks. He enacted moſt ſevere laws againſt adultery, and puniſhed with death one of his own domeſtics guilty of that crime. He would ſuffer none to keep women free-born for concubines. His domeſtics, freed-men, and ſlaves, he kept in great awe, cauſing them, as he was naturally inclined to cruelty, to be inhumanly beaten in his preſence for the ſmalleſt faults, and delivering them up, when guilty of tranſgreſſing the laws, to the civil magiſtrates [d]. He deſigned to forbid all tiſſue of gold and gilding, pretending, that in nature there was as great a ſtock of gold, as of ſilver; and, that the former metal, if ſuch a prohibition ſhould take place, would become as common as the latter. This prohibition, however, was not publiſhed by him, but by his ſucceſſor Tacitus, who is ſuppoſed to have ſuggeſted it to him [e]. About this time, he built and conſecrated a moſt magnificent temple to the ſun, of which frequent mention is made in hiſtory, and embelliſhed it with moſt rich and coſtly ornaments, and with an infinite quantity of gold, pearls, and precious ſtones. It was one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent ſtructures

His generoſity.

He builds a magnificent temple to the ſun.

[b] Idem, p. 224. [c] Idem, p. 222. [d] Idem, p. 224.
[e] Idem ibid. & Tacit. vit. p. 230.

ſtructures in Rome. The gold veſſels belonging to it weighed fifteen hundred pounds. He likewiſe enriched the capitol, and moſt of the temples in the city, with preſents of great value ſent him by foreign princes [f]. He extended the juriſdiction of the pontiffs, encreaſed their revenues, and eſtabliſhed funds for the repairs of the temples, and the ſalaries of the inferior miniſters. Towards the end of the year, a dangerous ſedition was raiſed in Rome by the perſons employed in the mint, who having, by a notorious breach of truſt, coined a great quantity of falſe money, to avoid the puniſhment due to their crime, joined in a body, and, under the conduct of one Feliciſſimus, formerly a ſlave, but appointed by Aurelian one of the receivers of the exchequer, raiſed ſuch diſturbances, that the emperor was obliged to order his troops to march againſt them, whom they received drawn up in battle-array on mount Cœlius, killed ſeven thouſand of them; but were in the end, though they fought with all the boldneſs of men in deſpair, overcome, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, not to ſay, cruelty. After this the emperor called in all the falſe coin, and gave true money in its room [g]. Soon after this ſedition, he put ſeveral ſenators to death, and likewiſe the ſon, or, as others will have it, the daughter, of his own ſiſter, for faults not ſpecified in hiſtory, but only ſaid not to have deſerved ſuch a ſevere puniſhment [h]. Towards the cloſe of this, or the very beginning of the following, year, when Aurelian was conſul the third time, with Marcellinus, ſome diſturbances happened in Gaul, which obliged the emperor to quit Rome, and haſten thither. All we know of this expedition is, that Gaul was reſtored to its former tranquillity, and that the emperor, marching from that province into Vindelicia, obliged the barbarians, who had made an irruption on that ſide, to repaſs the Danube [i]. A modern writer [k] is of opinion, that the emperor, before he left Gaul, rebuilt the city of Orleans, which at leaſt ever ſince the fifth century has been called by the Latin writers Aureliani urbs and urbs Aurelianorum: its antient name was Genabum or Cenabum. Gregory of Tours tells us, that he likewiſe either built or fortified the city of Dijon, at preſent the capital of Burgundy [l]. From Vindelicia the emperor marched into Illyricum; and there finding the province of Dacia in the hands

A great ſedition in Rome.

Aurelian marches into Gaul, to appeaſe ſome diſturbances there.

[f] Aur. vit. p. 217. 222. Zoſ. p. 661. [g] Aur. vit. p. 222. Zoſ. p. 665. [h] Aur. vit. ibid. Aur. Vict. epit. [i] Aur. vit. p. 221. Zon. p. 240. [k] Le Maire, antiq. d'Orleans, c. 3. p. 9. [l] Greg. p. 172.

He abandons to the barbarians the province of Dacia.

hands of the barbarians, who had ſeized it in the reign of Gallienus, he did not think it worth his while to recover a country, which he was well appriſed he could not maintain in the midſt of ſo many barbarous nations. He therefore withdrew the Roman troops from the few forts they ſtill held beyond the Danube, and gave to the inhabitants, who had been driven out by the barbarians, part of Mæſia and Dardania to ſettle in. Thus out of theſe two countries he formed a new province, called by ſome the Aurelian Dacia, by others New Dacia, to diſtinguiſh it from Trajan's Dacia, which lay beyond the Danube. The metropolis of this new province, which, according to Sanſon, comprehended the moſt diſtant parts of Bulgaria and Servia, was Sardica, now known to us by the name of Sofia, but called by the inhabitants Triadizza [m]. The Goths, it ſeems, poſſeſſed themſelves of the country, which the emperor had abandoned. From Illyricum, the emperor marched into Thrace, with a deſign to paſs the winter there; and early in the ſpring to croſs over into Aſia, and lead his army againſt the Perſians, upon what provocation hiſtory does not inform us. But while he was wholly bent upon this war, death overtook him, and put a period to this, and his other vaſt deſigns. Hiſtorians give us the following account of his unhappy end. He ſuſpected Mneſtheus, one of his freedmen and ſecretaries, of ſome extortion, and had threatened to puniſh him. Hereupon Mneſtheus, probably conſcious to himſelf of the crime laid to his charge, and well acquainted with the emperor's cruel and inflexible temper, reſolved to be beforehand with him. Accordingly, counterfeiting his maſter's hand, he wrote a roll of the names of the chief officers in the army, and among the reſt his own; and ſhewing it to thoſe whoſe names he had ſet down, he told them, that he had found it in the emperor's cloſet; that they were all doomed to deſtruction; and that only by ſome deſperate attempt they could avert their impending ruin. They all believed him, and, prompted partly by fear, partly by indignation, to ſee their ſervices thus rewarded, took, without heſitation, the reſolution ſuggeſted to them by Mneſtheus; and a few days after, as the army was marching to a place named Cænophrurium, that is, the new-caſtle, half way between Byzantium and Heraclea, they fell upon the emperor ſword in hand, while he was attended only by a ſmall guard, and

A conſpiracy formed againſt him.

[m] Aur. vit. p. 222. Lactan. perſec. c. 9. p. 8. Syncell. p. 385.

and diſpatched him with many wounds. Vopiſcus writes, that he fell by the hand of Mucapor, who, it ſeems, was a man of rank, ſince he is ſtyled general; and a letter is ſtill extant written to him by Aurelian, wherein the emperor gives him an account of the vigorous oppoſition he met with from Zenobia at the ſiege of Palmyra [n]. The emperor muſt have been killed about the latter end of January; for his death was known at Rome on the third of February of this year 275, ſo that he had reigned five full years; and lived, according to the moſt probable opinion, ſixty-three [o]. His death did not remain unpuniſhed; for the officers, who had killed him, finding, ſoon after his death, that they had been impoſed upon by Mneſtheus, threw him to the wild beaſts, and built a magnificent temple and tomb to the honour of the deceaſed emperor in the place where he had been killed, the whole army ſolemnizing his obſequies with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence. All thoſe who had had any hand in his death were either cut in pieces on the ſpot by the enraged ſoldiery, or afterwards executed under his ſucceſſors Tacitus and Probus. His death was much lamented by the ſenate, who, at the requeſt of the army, ranked him among the gods; but more by the people, whom he had obliged with more bounties and largeſſes, than any of his predeceſſors had done. Aurelian is commonly ſtyled the reſtorer of the empire, which, after the evils it had ſuffered by the captivity of Valerian and indolence of Gallienus, began to revive under Claudius, and was by Aurelian reſtored to its former ſtrength and luſtre. He delivered Italy from the incurſions of the Alemanni, reſcued the eaſt from the ſhameful yoke of a woman, humbled the Perſians, ſtill elated with the captivity of Valerian, re-united Gaul to the empire, and reſtored to Rome Thrace and Illyricum, over-run and oppreſſed by the barbarians. His arms were dreaded, and his friendſhip courted, by the moſt diſtant nations. He was a prince of great bravery, prudence, and generoſity; but as his exceſſive cruelty over-balanced all his other good qualities, he is by Vopiſcus and moſt other writers ranked, not among the good, but the uſeful, princes. In the beginning of his reign, he ſeems to have countenanced the true religion [p]; but being afterwards ſeduced by wicked counſellors, he reſolved utterly to extirpate the chriſtian name, and had already taken up the pen to ſign the bloody letters and edicts drawn up againſt them, when a ſudden flaſh of lightning lightning ſtruck the pen out of his hand, and filled both him and all about him with terror and diſmay. However, as the effects of fear which ſtops the hand without changing the heart, are but ſhort-lived, he returned to his former reſolution, and publiſhed againſt us, ſays Lactantius, edicts of blood and ſlaughter, which ſerved only to draw vengeance from heaven upon his own head [q]; for before his edicts reached the more diſtant provinces, he was aſſaſſinated in the manner we have related above. Hence this is not by the eccleſiaſtic writers reckoned one of the ten general perſecutions, though ſeveral champions of the faith ſuffered martyrdom in the provinces, where his edicts were publiſhed. Of Aurelian, Victor the younger obſerves, that he appeared in public with a diadem on his head, which no emperor had dared to do before him. Jornandes writes, that Diocleſian was the firſt Roman emperor who preſumed to wear that royal ornament [r]. But that he, and not Victor, was miſtaken, appears from one of the duke of Arſchot's medals, on which Aurelian is repreſented with a crown on his head reſembling our ducal crown [s]. The ſucceeding princes followed his example; but the diadem was not commonly worn till the time of Conſtantine. Of the writers, who flouriſhed under this prince, we ſhall ſpeak in our note (Z).

He is murdered.

His character.

[n] Aur. vit. p. 218. [o] Idem p. 221. Aur. Vict. epit. Zoſ. p. 661. [p] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 30. p. 282, 283.

As

[q] Lact. perſec. c. 6. p. 6. Euſeb. ibid. [r] Jorn. reg. c. 23. p. 445. [s] Arſchotana numiſm. Croii ducis, tab. 63. Antwerp. ann. 1604. Spanhem. l. viii. p. 682, 683.

(Z) Under Aurelian flouriſhed two celebrated philoſopers, Longinus and Amelius. The former, named Caſſius Longinus, and likewiſe Dionyſius, which name is prefixed to his treatiſe on the ſublime, is by moſt writers thought to have been a native of Athens (74). From Vopiſcus it appears, that he could not write in the Syriac tongue (75); and conſequently that he was not by birth a Syrian, as ſome have aſſerted. His family, it ſeems, came originally from that country (76); for his mother Frontonides was ſiſter to Fronto of Emeſa in Phœnicia, who taught rhetoric at Athens in the reign of Severus, publiſhed many works, and dying in that city, bequeathed his eſtate to his nephew (77) Longinus, when he was yet very young, travelled with his father into ſeveral countries, which gave him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with all the great philoſophers of thoſe times. In on

(74) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 14. p. 284. (75) Aur. vit. p. 219
(76) Suid. 1088. (77) Idem ibid.

one of his works, which Porphyrius, his epitomizer, has conveyed to us, he names ſeveral philoſophers of different ſects, among whom the moſt famous are Plotinus, his diſciple Amelius, Ammonius, a chriſtian philoſopher, and one Origenes. Longinus was a long time the diſciple of the two latter (78). He profeſſed and taught the philoſophy of Plato, and had the celebrated philoſopher Porphyrius for his diſciple, who tells us, that he and ſome other philoſophers were feaſted at Athens by Longinus on Plato's birth-day (79). Longinus was not only a great philoſopher, but the beſt critic and orator of his age, and ſo well verſed in the various branches of literature, that he was commonly ſtyled a treaſure of knowledge, and a living library (80). He was a man, ſays Eunapius, of an extraordinary diſcernment in diſcovering beauties and faults in the writings of others, and therein ſurpaſſed all men (81.) He was charged, ſays that writer, without telling us by whom, to write critical diſſertations on the works of the antients, and his judgment was preferred to what others had written on the ſame ſubject before him (82). He taught Zenobia the Greek tongue, eſpouſed her cauſe with great warmth againſt Aurelian, and was ſuppoſed to have dictated the letter which that princeſs wrote to the emperor during the ſiege of Palmyra. That letter ſo provoked Aurelian, that, upon the reduction of the place, he cauſed the ſuppoſed author to be put to death; which he ſuffered with great firmneſs and intrepidity, comforting thoſe who were affected with his misfortune. This baſe revenge reflected no ſmall diſhonour on Aurelian (83); for the loſs of ſo great a man was looked upon as a public calamity (84). He left many works behind him very uſeful, ſays Zoſimus (85), to ſuch as deſire to be inſtructed in the ſciences, and which were admired by all the world. He muſt have begun to write very early, if what Porphyrius aſſerted be true, viz. that Origen, who died in 253, read with application his works (86). Euſebius quotes a paſſage out of one of his works, ſhewing the abſurdity of the opinion of the Stoics concerning the ſoul (87). Porphyrius mentions a work of his upon vehemence, inſcribed to Porphyrius himſelf, and to one Cleodamus (88); and the preface of another upon the Supreme Being, addreſſed to one Marcellus, wherein he confuted the opinions of Plotinus and Amelius (89), quoting a work, which he had written againſt Porphyrius himſelf for his having preferred the the opinion of Plotinus to what he had learnt of him concerning ideas: in the ſame preface he made mention of a long letter, which he had written to Amelius againſt ſome particular ſentiments of Plotinus, and upon Plato's opinion touching juſtice (90). Porphyrius gives us the abſtract of a letter, which Longinus wrote to him about the year 270, deſiring him to ſend him the works of Plotinus, and to leave Sicily, where Porphyrius then was, and come to him in Phœnicia. Porphyrius adds, that if his affairs had allowed him to go thither, Longinus would have better underſtood the ſentiments of Plotinus, and ſaved himſelf the trouble of confuting them (91). The ſame writer quotes three other works of Longinus, viz. on principles, or firſt cauſes, on the love of antiquity, and on men of letters (92). Suidas mentions ſeveral philological pieces publiſhed by Longinus (93); but takes no notice of his treatiſe on the ſublime, the only entire work of Longinus which has reached our times, and fully anſwers the great idea which the antients raiſe in us of its author. Cæcilius, who flouriſhed in the time of Auguſtus, wrote a treatiſe on the ſublime; but contented himſelf only with ſhewing in what true ſublimeneſs conſiſted, without preſcribing any rules leading us to the attainment of it, which is the chief ſubject of Longinus's treatiſe, handled in a manner worthy of ſo great a writer. Among the inſtances he alledges of thoſe who have written in a ſtyle truly ſublime, and ſuitable to the greatneſs of their ſubject, he ſpeaks of Moſes thus: The Jewiſh legiſlator, who was no common man, having filled his mind with ſublime notions of the grandeur and power of God, expreſſed them at the beginning of his laws in a ſtile anſwering the mighty ſubject; God ſaid, Let there be light, and there was light; let the earth appear, and it was ſo (94). Longinus inſcribed this work to one Poſthumius Terentianus, his intimate friend, and a man of letters, whom ſome writers take to be the ſame perſon with Terentianus Maurus, who publiſhed ſeveral works, ſome of which have reached our times. But of him we have ſpoken in the reign of Domitian (95); for he flouriſhed, according to Voſſius, under that prince.

(78) Plot. vit. p. 13. (79) Euſeb. præpar. evang. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. Plot. vit. p. 14. (80) Eunap. c. 2. p. 17. Plot. vit. p. 13. (81) Eunap. c. 2. p. 16, 17. (82) Idem ibid. (83) Aur. vit. p. 219. Zoſ. l. i. p. 652. (84) Eunap. c. 2. p. 17. (85) Zoſ. l. i. p. 659. (86) Euſeb. l. vi. c. 19. (87) Idem præp. evang. l. xv. c. 20. p. 822. (88) Plot. vit. p. 10. (89) Idem, p. 13, 14.

Amelius, againſt whom Longinus wrote, was a philoſopher of great note among the Platonics (96). Suidas ſays he was of Apamea, but Porphyrius aſſures us, that he was born in Hetruria: perhaps his family came originally from Apamea in Syria, and ſettled in Hetruria. Cyrillus of Alexandria ſuppoſes Amelius and and Gentilianus to have been two diſtinct perſons; and quotes for that Porphyrius, who tells us in expreſs terms, that Amelius was likewiſe called Gentilianus (97). He was diſciple to Plotinus, and greatly attached to him; for he lived twenty-four years with him at Rome, from the third year of Philip to the firſt of Claudius, that is, from the year 246, to the beginning of 269 (98). He had ſtudied before under Lyſimachus, a ſtoic philoſopher (99). He was at Apamea in Syria at the beginning of the year 270, when Plotinus died. He was a very laborious man, and is ſaid to have compoſed an hundred volumes, containing only what he had heard of Plotinus in the frequent conferences that philoſopher had held with him and others of the ſame ſect (100). In the year 263, he had not yet publiſhed any thing of his own; but before the death of Plotinus, he wrote forty books againſt magic, and the heretics called Gnoſtics (1). He compoſed one in three days time, ſhewing in what chiefly the doctrine of Plotinus differed from that of Numenes. This piece he inſcribed to Porphyrius by a letter, which is ſtill extant (2). To him he likewiſe addreſſed ſome other works, to clear up the difficulties he met with in the doctrine of Plotinus. Amelius and Plotinus were, in the opinion of Longinus, the only philoſophers who, in his time, publiſhed works worth peruſing (3). The tenets of theſe two philoſophers were the ſame, but Amelius explained them more, perhaps too much, at length; and hence probably it was that his works were greatly neglected and undervalued by the Platonics themſelves, about the latter end of the following century (4). Euſebius (5), Theodoret (6), and Cyrillus of Alexandria (7) produce a paſſage out of his works, wherein he quotes the beginning of St. John's goſpel. Theodoret calls him the chief of the ſchool of Porphyrius, that is, of Plotinus, whoſe tenets were held by Porphyrius (8). Suidas writes, that Porphyrius was inſtructed by him in the principles of the Platonic philoſophy (9). About the ſame time flouriſhed one Androclides, author of a piece upon the ſophiſts, who made extemporary ſpeeches: in that work he mentions Porphyrius; whence Suidas concludes him to have flouriſhed at the ſame time. He was the ſon of one Syneſius of Philadelphia in Lydia (10).

(90) Idem ibid. (91) Plot. vit. p. 15. (92) Idem, p. 9. Jonſ. l. 3. c. 14. p. 284. (93) Suid. λ. p. 50. (94) Long. c. 8. p. 20. (95) Vide Hiſt. Univerſ. Vol. XIV. note F. chap. 19. near the end. (96) Euſeb. præpar. l. xi. c. 18. p. 540.

Some hiſtorians too flouriſhed under Aurelian, viz. Callicrates of Tyre, whom Vopiſcus ſtyles the moſt learned of all the Greek hiſtorians of his time (11); and Theoclius, or Theon of Chios, as as ſome critics conjecture (12). Both theſe hiſtorians wrote the life of Aurelian; but dwelt, it ſeems, too much on moſt trifling incidents (13). Nicomachus, another Greek hiſtorian, wrote at the ſame time; for Vopiſcus tells us, that he copied from him the letter which Zenobia wrote to Aurelian; that Zenobia dictated it in the Syriac language; and that Nicomachus tranſlated it into Greek, in which language it was ſent to Aurelian, who had written to her in the ſame dialect (14). Voſſius takes this to be the Nicomachus who tranſcribed, as we read in Sidonius (15), and corrected the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, in confronting it with the original of Philoſtratus (16). Aurelianus Feſtivus, a freedman of the emperor Aurelian, wrote the hiſtory of his reign, or at leaſt part of it, with the life of Firmus, who uſurped the title of emperor in Egypt (17). Voſſius ranks him, Cornelius Capitolinus, who wrote the hiſtory of Zenobia and Gellius Fuſcus, who wrote the life of Tetricus, tyrant of Gaul, among the Latin writers, no doubt, an account of their names; for Vopiſcus, who quotes the two former, and wrote in the reign of Conſtantius Chlorus tells us, that ſome Greek, but no Latin, author had undertaken before him to write the hiſtory of Aurelian's reign (18). Erennius Dexippus, by birth an Athenian, by profeſſion an orator, the ſon of another Dexippus, flouriſhed under Aurelian, and was reckoned one of the greateſt orators Greece had ever produced (19). His ſtyle, ſays Photius, was grave and majeſtic; his words expreſſive; his phraſes proper, and well-ſuited to the ſubject; ſo that he may be called a ſecond Thucydides; but in clearneſs he far excels the firſt (20). Though he was a man of letters, yet he fought with ſucceſs at the head of his countrymen againſt the Goths, or Heruli, in the year 267 (21). He wrote the hiſtory of the Roman emperors from Alexander to Claudius, with no leſs conciſeneſs, ſays Capitolinus (22), than ſincerity; whence he is often quoted by him and Trebellius Pollio, who ſtyle his hiſtory the hiſtory of the times. He wrote a ſeparate hiſtory of the wars of the Romans with the Scythians, which he entitled Scythica. This Photius preferred, for the elegance of ſtyle, to all his other works (23). He likewiſe wrote in four books the hiſtory of the ſucceſſors of Alexander the Great (24). Voſſius aſcribes to him the book on Ariſtotle's categories which has reached our times 25. But others maintain, that Dexippus, the author

(97) Cyrill. in Jul. l. viii. c. 6. p. 283. Plot. vit. p. 5. (98) Plot. vit. p. 3, 6. (99) Idem, p. 13. (100) Idem, p. 3. (1) Idem, p. 10. (2) Idem, p. 11. (3) Idem, p. 14. (4) Euſeb. præp. l. xi. c. 19. p. 540. (5) Idem ibid. (6) Theod. de curand. Græcor. affect. p. 500. (7) Cyr. in Jul. l. viii. p. 283. (8) Theod. ibid. (9) Suid. α. p. 198. (10) Idem, α. p. 2614. (11) Vit. Aurel. p. 209.

(12) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 17. p. 485. (13) Aur. vit. p. 210. (14) Idem, p. 218 (15) Sidon. l. viii. epiſt. 3. p. 214. (16) Voſſ. ibid. l. ii. c. 16. p. 214. (17) Firm. vit p. 244. (18) Aur. vit. p. 209. (19) Suid. & p 659 Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. (20) Phot. c. 82. p 200. (21) Gallien. vit. p. 181. (22) Capit. p. 150. (23) Phot. c 82. p. 200. (24) Idem ibid. p. 201. (25) Voſſ. p. 243.

As all the chief officers in the army had been concerned in the death of Aurelian, the ſoldiers, by whom he was greatly beloved, not able to prevail upon themſelves to name any of them in his room, wrote to the ſenate, acquainting them with the death of the emperor, and referring to them the choice of a new prince. When their letter was read, Tacitus, who was at that time prince of the ſenate, and voted the firſt, declared, that he was for referring the choice of a new emperor to the army, as the army had done to the ſenate: For what diſputes, ſaid he, and diſturbances will inevitably enſue, ſhould not the army approve of the perſon whom we name? The ſenate acquieſced to his propoſal; but the ſoldiers referred the choice a ſecond and a third time to the ſenate, as the ſenate did to the ſoldiers; ſo that the empire, by this reciprocal exchange of compliments and commendable diſpute between the ſenate and army, remained near eight months without an head, and nevertheleſs no uſurper ſtarted up during that time; no diſturbances happened, either at Rome or in the provinces. But the barbarians in the mean time, taking advantage of the inter-regnum, began to put themſelves in motion. The Germans, that is, the Lyges, the Franks, the Burgundiones, and the Vandals, broke into Gaul; the Goths threatened Illyricum; and every one expected, that the Perſians, againſt whom Aurelian had declared war, would not continue long quiet. Theſe things Velius Cornificius Gordianus, then conſul, laid before the ſenate on the twenty-fifth of September, and earneſtly preſſed them to proceed, without further delay, to the election of a new prince. He concluded his ſpeech by telling them, That the empire could no longer ſubſiſt without an head, and that the army would either accept the prince whom they choſe, or, rejecting him, chuſe another. There had been ſome talk before of raiſing Tacitus to the empire, who thereupon had withdrawn into Campania, and lived there two months in retirement; but being recalled by the ſenate, he was preſent at this meeting held on the twenty-fifth of September; and after the conſul Gordianus had ended his ſpeech, he roſe up to thor of that work, was diſciple to Iamblichus, who flouriſhed in the reign of Julian the apoſtate (26). We ought perhaps to diſtinguiſh likewiſe Dexippus, the author of ſome comedies (27), from the hiſtorian, though Voſſius confounds them (28).

The army refer the election of a new prince to the ſenate, and the ſenate to the army.

(26) Johnſ. l. iii. p. 299. (27) Suid. p. 1516. (28) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 16. p. 243.

deliver his opinion firſt, as prince of the ſenate; but before he had uttered a ſingle word, the whole aſſembly cried out with one voice, We ſalute you, Tacitus, emperor: to you we commit the care of the ſtate and the world. Take the empire given you by the authority of the ſenate: your rank, your character, your paſt conduct, deſerve it. He attempted to excuſe himſelf in regard of his great age (for he was then ſeventy-five); but they all cried out, That other emperors, ſtricken in years, had governed with great applauſe; that they wanted not a ſoldier, but an emperor; not a ſtrong body, but a vigorous mind; and that he had a brother, who would bear with him part of the burden. After this was taken the ſuffrage of each ſenator in particular, when Metius Falconius Nicomachus, the eldeſt conſular, after having in an elegant ſpeech beſtowed the higheſt encomiums upon Tacitus, enlarged in a very affecting manner on the many evils attending the adminiſtration of young and unexperienced princes, and conjured Tacitus, by the love he bore his country, not to leave the empire to his ſons, who were yet children, but to name for his ſucceſſor a perſon, whom he judged equal to ſo great a truſt, if the ſtate were, by the immutable decrees of the fates, deprived of him before his children attained to maturity of age. He added, that to diſpoſe of the ſenate, the people of Rome, and the whole empire, in the ſame manner as he diſpoſed of his houſes, lands, and ſlaves, was repugnant to the laws of juſtice and equity; and that nothing would ſo much commend his name to all future ages, as to ſhew at his death, that he loved the republic above his family and iſſue [t]. When Metius had ended his ſpeech, the ſenators all to a man cried out, Tacitus is emperor. The decree was accordingly drawn up, inveſting him with the ſovereign power, and ſigned by all the ſenators, even by Tacitus himſelf. From the ſenate they all went to the field of Mars, where Ælius Ceſetianus, then governor of Rome, declared to the ſoldiers and people aſſembled there, the election of Tacitus, which was received with the uſual acclamations [u].

Tacitus unanimouſly choſen by the ſenate.

THE preſent emperor, named on his coins M. Claudius Tacitus, but, by Vopiſcus, Aurelianus, or Aurelius, Tacitus, acknowledged Cornelius Tacitus, the celebrated hiſtorian, for his kinſman; and therefore, to ſecure his inimitable performance againſt the injuries of time, he ordered ten copies of it to be tranſcribed every year, and to be lodged in the public libraries and in the cabinets of the learned; but notwith-notwithſtanding his care, only a ſmall part of what that excellent hiſtorian wrote, has reached our times. The emperor, as we have hinted above, was ſtricken in years, but had ſeveral children, who were very young. Florianus, named on the antient coins M. Annius Florianus, was only his uterine brother. All we know of his preferments is, that he had been conſul, and was, at the time of his election, prince of the ſenate. He was a man of learning, of a mild temper, an enemy to all pomp, and a great admirer of the manners of the primitive Romans. When he was created emperor, he gave his immenſe eſtate to the public, allotting part of it for the repairing and beautifying of the temples. What ready money he had by him, he diſtributed among the ſoldiers. He ſet at liberty all the ſlaves he had at Rome, and cauſed his houſe to be pulled down, in order to build public baths in the place where it ſtood. His temperance and regularity, his œconomy and care of the public money, his impartiality in the adminiſtration of juſtice, are much commended by the authors of his life. In the firſt ſpeech he made to the ſenate he declared, that he would tranſact nothing without their conſent and authority; and then propoſed the two following laws, which were received with great applauſe, and confirmed by a decree; viz. that whoever ſhould mix metals with a baſer ſort ſhould forfeit his eſtate and life; that ſlaves ſhould not be admitted as witneſſes againſt their maſters, even in caſes of treaſon. In the ſame ſpeech he deſired the conſulſhip for his brother Florianus; but the ſenate did not think fit to grant him his requeſt; which he was ſo far from reſenting, that, on the contrary, he ſeemed highly pleaſed with the liberty they had taken, ſaying, I am glad they know him. From the very beginning of his reign he applied himſelf tothe ſuppreſſing of ſeveral abuſes which ſtill prevailed in Rome. By one edict he put down all the brothel-houſes; by another he ordered all the public baths to be ſhut up at ſun-ſet; and by a third prohibited all ſorts of gold tiſſue and gilding. He reſpected the memory of the good emperors, and cauſed a temple to be built to their honour, and ſacrifices to be offered to them on their ſeveral anniverſaries. He paid a particular regard to Aurelian, and prevailed upon the ſenate to decree him a ſtatue of gold, to be ſet up in the capitol, and others of ſilver, to be placed in the ſenate, in the temple of the ſun, and in the ſquare of Trajan [b]. The ſenate, overjoyed for the recovery of their antient rights of creating emperors, ordered public

[t] Tacit. vit. p. 227—231. [u] Idem ibid.

His preferments.

Two of his laws.

[b] Idem, p. 232.

proceſſions, vowed hecatombs, appeared in white garments, feaſted their friends, and wrote letters to all the ſtates and cities in alliance with Rome, acquainting them, that they were at length reſtored to their former authority; that the kings and princes of the barbarians were to apply to them; and that all appeals from the proconſuls were to be made, not to the emperor, or the captain of the guards, but to the governor of Rome, from whom they might appeal to the ſenate [c]. The new prince was ſcarce well ſettled in the empire, when news was brought him, that incredible multitudes of barbarians were advancing from the Palus Mæotis through Colchis, pretending to have been invited by Aurelian to aſſiſt him in his intended expedition againſt the Perſians. Tacitus immediately left Rome, and arriving in Thrace, where he was received by the army with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, paſſed from thence over into Aſia, defeated the barbarians, and obliged them to return into their own country [d]. The following year, the emperor entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having Æmilianus for his collegue; and having paſſed the winter in Cilicia, was preparing to return to Italy, when he was, according to ſome writers, ſeized with a violent diſtemper, which, in a few days, put an end to his life; but, according to others, killed by his own ſoldiers [e]. He died at Tarſus in Cilicia, or, as others write, at Tiana in Cappadocia, after a ſhort reign of about ſix months. Upon his death, his brother Florianus, whom he had appointed captain of the guards, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, and was acknowledged in all the provinces of Europe and Africa; but the legions quartered in Syria, Phœnicia, Paleſtine, and Egypt, declared for Probus, whom Tacitus had appointed commander of all the forces in the eaſt. Hereupon a civil war was kindled in the bowels of the empire, while the barbarians were ready to invade it on all ſides. Florianus gained at firſt ſome advantages over his competitor; but as the troops under his command were more addicted to Probus than to him, they began to mutiny, and, at the approach of Probus, who was reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, fell upon their own leader, cut him in pieces, after he had reigned about two months, and joined Probus. This happened in the neighbourhood of Tarſus in Cilicia. The death of Florianus was no ſooner known in Europe and Africa, than the armies every-where proclaimed Probus

Tacitus marches againſt the barbarians, and defeats them.

His death.

Florianus aſſumes the empire; but is murdered by his own men.

[c] Idem, p. 231, 232.
[d] Zonar. p. 240. Zoſ. p. 662.
[e] Tacit. vit. p. 230.

Probus emperor, and the ſenate readily confirmed their election, honouring the new emperor with the titles of Auguſtus, father of his country, high pontiff, &c. and inveſting him with the tribunitial and proconſular power; for they all entertained a great opinion of his juſtice, equity, moderation, &c. and looked upon him as a perſon in every reſpect qualified for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt: and truly, if Vopiſcus is to be credited, he was one of the beſt and greateſt princes that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. That writer prefers him to Trajan, Adrian, Antoninus, Alexander, Claudius, nay, and to Auguſtus himſelf. He was, ſays he, an excellent commander, an amiable ſtateſman, a friend to virtue, an enemy to vice, generous, affable, good-natured, and, in ſhort, endowed with every good quality commendable in a prince [m]. He was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father, by name Maximus, was, in his youth, by profeſſion a gardener; but afterwards lifting himſelf among the troops, he was raiſed to the poſt of tribune; and married a woman of rank, by whom he had one ſon, the preſent emperor, and a daughter, of whom we find no farther mention in hiſtory. Probus entered into the army when very young, and having diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions under Valerian, Gallienus, Claudius, and Aurelian, he was by theſe princes raiſed to the higheſt poſts of the army, and employed, always with ſucceſs, in the many wars which they waged with the barbarians. He was about forty-four years old, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, when preferred to the empire. His election was no ſooner confirmed by the ſenate, than he left Cilicia, and returned to Europe. He paſſed the winter in Pannonia, and having there taken upon him his firſt conſulſhip, and named M. Aurelius Paulinus for his collegue, he ſet out in the ſpring for Gaul, where the Franks and other German nations had committed dreadful ravages. He is ſaid to have fought in that province many ſucceſsful battles, to have killed near four hundred thouſand of the barbarians, and to have obliged the reſt to quit the booty they had taken, and ſave themſelves by flight beyond the Rhine. Having thus reſtored Gaul to its former tranquillity, he paſſed the Rhine at the head of his victorious army, and made war upon the enemy in their own country, with greater ſucceſs than any of his predeceſſors had ever done, as appears from the account which he himſelf tranſmitted to the ſenate in the following letter: "I re"turn thanks to the immortal gods, conſcript fathers, who "have

Probus proclaimed emperor.

His character.

Extraction and preferments.

He delivers Gaul from the barbarians, and reduces great part of Germany.

[m] Prob. vit. p. 233, 234, 241. [n] Idem p. 235—237.

" have given manifeſt tokens of their approving your choice " in raiſing me to the empire. Germany, that wide and ex- " tenſive country, is entirely ſubdued. Nine kings of dif- " ferent nations have thrown themſelves proſtrate at my feet, " or rather at yours. All the barbarians now plow and ſow " for you, nay, and fight for you. Return therefore thanks " to the gods for ſo ſignal a conqueſt. Four hundred thou- " ſand of the enemy have been cut in pieces; ſixteen thou- " ſand have been incorporated in our troops. We have re- " covered ſixty great cities which they had taken, and deli- " vered Gaul from the yoke under which it groaned. The " crowns of gold, with which the cities of Gaul have preſented " me, I have tranſmitted to you, to be conſecrated, and, by " your hands, offered to the great Jupiter, and to the other " gods and goddeſſes. We have not only recovered the " booty which they had taken, but enriched ourſelves with " their ſpoils. The fields of Gaul are ploughed with the " cattle of the barbarians; their ſheep are encloſed in our " folds, and our magazines are filled with their corn: in " ſhort, we have left them nothing but the bare ſoil. I have " had ſome thoughts of reducing Germany to a Roman pro- " vince; but the republic, exhauſted with ſo many wars, is " not perhaps at preſent in a condition to maintain the addi- " tional troops which muſt be raiſed for that purpoſe [o]." Vopiſcus adds, that he drove the enemy beyond the Elb and the Necker, and built a great many forts in the country lying between thoſe rivers and the Rhine, which he might have eaſily reduced to a Roman province; but did not think it adviſeable to burden the republic with new troops, which he muſt have raiſed, and left there, to keep thoſe warlike nations in awe. Zoſimus tells us, that one of the battles, which he fought with the Logi, a German nation, probably the ſame people whom Tacitus calls Lyges, laſted two days, the armies being parted only by night; that the victory inclined ſometimes to the Romans, and ſometimes to the Germans, who fought with incredible bravery; but that the former at length prevailed, by the bravery of Probus, and not only gave the enemy a total overthrow, but took their king, by name Semnon, priſoner, with his ſons and the flower of their nobility; whom, however, the emperor afterwards ſet at liberty, upon their reſtoring to him all the booty and priſoners they had taken [p]. The ſame writer adds, that in another engagement with the Burgundians and Vandals on the banks of the

He overcomes the Logi, the Burgundians, and the Vandals.

[o] Idem, p. 239. [p] Zoſ. l. 1. p. 864.

the Rhine, he took their king Igillus priſoner, with many others of thoſe two nations, whom he tranſplanted into Britain, where they proved very ſerviceable to the Romans upon all ſeditions and inſurrections [q]. They ſettled perhaps in Cambridgeſhire; for Gervaſius Tilburienſis mentions an old vallum in that county, which he calls Vandelſburg, and ſays, it was the work of the Vandals [r].

THE following year, the emperor entered upon his ſecond conſulſhip, having Lupus for his collegue, and early in the ſpring ſet out from Gaul; and bending his march through Rhœtia, he arrived in Illyricum, whence the Sarmatians, who had made an irruption into that province, withdrew, upon the news of his approach, leaving their booty behind them. From Illyricum he purſued his march into Thrace, where he was met by deputies from all the Gothic nations, ſent by their reſpective ſtates and princes to ſue for peace, and court his friendſhip [s]. Having thus ſettled peace and tranquillity in all the provinces of Europe, he paſſed over into Aſia, and entering Iſauria, which had revolted from Rome, as we have related above, after many dangerous conflicts with the Iſaurian robbers and Palfurius their leader, whom he took and put to death, he entirely reduced that country, tranſplanted the inhabitants into diſtant provinces, and divided Iſauria among his veterans, upon condition that they ſhould ſend their ſons, as ſoon as they attained the age of eighteen, to ſerve in the army, leſt truſting to their rocks and mountains, they ſhould follow the example of the antient inhabitants, and turn robbers [t]. From Iſauria the emperor marched into Syria, where he entered upon his third conſulſhip, having Paternus for his collegue, and early in the ſpring led his army againſt the Blemyes, a barbarous nation, dwelling between Egypt and Ethiopia, who had made themſelves maſters of Coptos and Ptolemais in Thebais, and ſtruck terror into the neighbouring countries. Probus defeated them with great ſlaughter, recovered the above-mentioned cities, took a great number of the barbarians priſoners, and ſent them to Rome, where their extraordinary figure, ſays Vopiſcus, raiſed great admiration in the Roman people [u]. Pliny had deſcribed them many years before, as a people without heads, and having their mouths and eyes in their breaſts [w]. Some writers think, that

The Goths ſue for peace.

Iſauria reduced.

The Blemyes defeated.

[q] Idem ibid. p. 865. [r] Vide Cambd. Britain. p. 156. & Buch. Belg. l. vii. p. 218. [s] Prob. vit. p. 239. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Plin. l. v. c. 8.

that the ſhortneſs of their necks gave riſe to this fable. The king of Perſia, Varranes II. alarmed at the fame of the victories gained by Probus over ſo fierce and warlike a nation, ſent embaſſadors to him, with rich preſents to ſue for peace; but the emperor, not ſatisfied with their propoſals, refuſed the preſents and ſent back the deputies; which ſo terrified the king, that he concluded a peace with Probus upon his own terms [x]. The eaſtern provinces being thus ſettled in peace, the emperor returned to Thrace, where he allotted lands to one hundred thouſand Baſtarnæ, a Scythian nation, of whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to ſpeak hereafter. They all remained faithful to him; but the Gepidæ, Juthungi, and Vandals, to whom he allotted lands in the ſame province, revolted while the emperor was engaged in domeſtic wars, which broke out the following year. From Thrace the emperor returned to Rome, and there triumphed over the Germans and Blemyes [y], and diverted the people for ſeveral days together, with all ſorts of ſhews, combats and entertainments. And now no foreign nation daring to attempt an invaſion, peace reigned throughout the whole empire; but this general tranquillity was ſoon diſturbed by domeſtic broils, which firſt broke out in the eaſt, where Sext. Julius Saturninus, as he is ſtyled on the antient coins, was proclaimed emperor. He was, according to ſome, a native of Mauritania, according to others, of Gaul, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in many wars; for he is ſaid to have reſtored tranquillity to Gaul, to have recovered Africa from the Moors, and appeaſed the diſturbances that had long prevailed in Spain [z]. The emperor Aurelian had appointed him commander of the troops quartered on the frontiers of the eaſtern provinces, and at the ſame time ordered him never to ſet foot in Egypt, fearing, ſays Vopiſcus, as he was well acquainted with the ambitious temper of the Gauls, and the ſtrange inclination of the Egyptians to novelty, leſt he might be prompted by them to aſſume the ſovereignty. Notwithſtanding this prohibition, Saturninus being led by his curioſity to viſit Egypt, he no ſooner appeared at Alexandria, than he was by that turbulent and reſtleſs people proclaimed emperor. He declined at firſt that dignity, and, quitting Alexandria, returned in great haſte to Paleſtine: but afterwards apprehending, that what had already happened might give Probus no ſmall umbrage, and occaſion his ruin, he ſuffered himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, ſhedding many tears

The Perſians ſue for peace.

Probus triumphs.

Saturninus revolts.

[x] Prob. vit. p. 239. [y] Idem, p. 240. [z] Saturn. vit. p. 244. Zoſ. p. 663. Goltz. p. 116. Birag. p. 309.

tears amidſt the acclamations of the ſoldiery and populace [q]. Zonaras writes, that Probus, who had a great kindneſs for him, not believing he had revolted, cauſed the perſon to be puniſhed who brought him the firſt news of his rebellion. He afterwards wrote ſeveral kind letters to him; but his ſoldiers threatening him with death, if he hearkened to, or complied with, the emperor's offers, he was forced to reject them. Hereupon Probus diſpatched ſome troops againſt them, which being joined by others in the eaſt, engaged Saturninus, put him to flight, and obliged him to ſhelter himſelf in the citadel of Apamea, which they took by ſtorm, and put the whole garriſon, together with Saturninus, to the ſword. The emperor, who deſigned to pardon him, ſhewed no ſmall concern for his death [r]. The following year, Meſſala and Gratus being conſuls, two uſurpers ſtarted up in Gaul, Proculus and Bonoſus. The former was a native of Albingaunum, now Albenga, ſubject to the republic of Genoa. His anceſtors had been famous robbers, and had, by their robberies, acquired immenſe wealth; for Proculus is ſaid to have armed two thouſand ſlaves of his own when he revolted. In his youth he had been himſelf a robber; but entering afterwards into the army, he had ſignalized himſelf by many noble exploits. He was tribune, and had the command of ſeveral legions, when he took upon him the title of emperor, prompted thereunto chiefly by his wife, called firſt Viturgia, and afterwards Sampſo, a woman of great ambition and a manly courage, and by the inhabitants of Lions, who had been treated with great ſeverity by Aurelian, and apprehended the like treatment from Probus. He was proclaimed emperor at Cologn, and acknowledged, according to Vopiſcus, in Narbonne Gaul, Britain, and Spain. The ſame writer tells us, that he defeated the Alemanni in ſeveral battles; but was himſelf at laſt overcome by Probus, and forced to take refuge among the Franks, from whom he pretended to derive his origin. The Franks promiſed him their aſſiſtance; but, inſtead of performing their promiſe, they betrayed him to the emperor, by whom he was puniſhed according to his deſerts [s]. Bonoſus, or, as he is ſtyled on the antient coins, Q. Bonoſius, was deſcended of a Spaniſh family, but born in Britain. His father kept a public ſchool, and taught children the firſt rudiments of the Latin tongue. The ſon entered early into the army, and raiſed himſelf by degrees from the low rank of a common ſoldier to the poſt of general, and was employed

He is overcome and killed.

Proculus revolts.

Is betrayed by the Franks, and put to death.

as

[q] Sat. vit. p. 249. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Idem, p. 245, —247.

as ſuch to guard the frontiers of Rhœtia; but having ſuffered the Germans to ſurpriſe and burn the Roman fleet on the Rhine, his dread of being puniſhed for this neglect prompted him to aſſume the ſovereignty, and cauſe himſelf to be proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command. He maintained himſelf in that dignity longer than was expected, and fought ſeveral battles with Probus; but being at length reduced to great ſtreights, he choſe rather to ſtrangle himſelf, than to fall into the hands of the conqueror. Authors obſerve of him, that he could drink as much as ten men, without being in the leaſt diſordered; and that by drinking with the embaſſadors of the barbarians, he often diſcovered the ſecrets with which they were intruſted. Vopiſcus tells us, that the emperor Aurelian married to him a princeſs of the royal blood of the Goths, by name Hunila, whom he had taken priſoner, that Bonoſus might, by her means, become acquainted with the great men among the Goths, and diſcover, in drinking with them their ſecret views and deſigns [t]. Hunila was a woman of great wit, beauty, and virtue; and therefore Probus, upon the death of her huſband, not only ſpared her, and the two ſons ſhe had by Bonoſus, but ſettled an annual penſion upon the mother, and ſuffered the children to enjoy their paternal eſtate [u]. Zoſimus [w] and Zonaras [x] ſpeak of the revolt of the governor of Britain, whom they do not name; and tell us, that the emperor complaining of him to a Moor, named Victorinus, upon whoſe recommendation he had preferred him to that government, the Moor begged and obtained leave to go into Britain, and try whether he could bring back his friend to a ſenſe of his duty. Upon his arrival, he was received by the uſurper with great demonſtrations of kindneſs; which he requited by murdering his old friend in the night-time. His death put an end to the revolt in Britain. We are not told whether or no Probus approved of this treachery.

Bonoſus proclaimed emperor.

Is overcome, and lays violent hands on himſelf.

The governor of Britain revolts, and is murdered.

THE following year, the emperor entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having Tiberianus for his collegue. The whole empire now enjoyed a profound tranquillity; all domeſtic troubles were happily appeaſed, and foreign enemies awed by the fame of Probus's mighty atchievements. However, that the troops might not abandon themſelves to idleneſs, he took care to employ them in many uſeful works, ſaying, That ſince

How Probus employed his ſoldiers in time of peace.

[t] Bonoſ. vit. p. 247. [u] Idem ibid. [w] Zoſ. l. i. p. 663.
[x] Zonar. p. 246.

ſince they were maintained by the public, they ought either to fight or labour for the public. As Hannibal therefore, to find ſome employment for his ſoldiers, had formerly filled Africa with olive-trees planted by them, ſo Probus, for his valour ſtyled by many a ſecond Hannibal, employed his troops in planting vines on the hills of Gaul, Pannonia, and Mœſia, allowing, ſays Vopiſcus, the Gauls, Pannonians, Spaniards, and Britons full liberty to cultivate as many vineyards as they pleaſed; which had been denied them ever ſince the time of Domitian [y]. The emperor Julian writes, that Probus, during his ſhort reign, either rebuilt or repaired ſeventy cities [z]. As the city of Sirmium, the place of his nativity, ſtood in a low marſhy ground, he employed great numbers of his ſoldiers in digging a canal to convey the waters into the ſea. This incenſed them againſt him, and their rage was heightened by the apprehenſion they were under of being ſoon diſbanded; for the emperor had ſaid, That he hoped in a ſhort time there would be no occaſion for ſoldiers or armies. This they could not bear, and therefore the following year, when Probus was conſul the fifth time with Victorinus, they attacked him with great fury, as he was marching from one town in Illyricum to another. The emperor had time to retire into an iron tower of an extraordinary height, which he himſelf had built, to obſerve from thence the ſoldiers while they were at work. But thither the incenſed multitude purſued him, and having eaſily ſtormed the place, as it was defended by the prince alone, diſpatched him with many wounds, after he had lived fifty, and reigned ſix years and four months. His death is aſcribed by many to Carus, who ſucceeded him in the empire, and was then captain of the guards; but Vopiſcus endeavours to clear him from that imputation. The whole army raiſed a ſtately monument to the honour of the deceaſed prince, with the following epitaph: Here lies the emperor Probus, whoſe life and manners anſwered his name. He ſubdued all the barbarous nations, and conquered the tyrants who ſtarted up in his time. The loſs of ſo good a prince was greatly lamented, not only by the ſenate and people of Rome, but by the barbarians themſelves, who dreaded his valour, and revered his probity, clemency, and juſtice. His ſucceſſors honoured his memory with all poſſible marks of reſpect and eſteem, ranking him among the gods, conſecrating temples to his name, celebrating with great pomp his anniverſary, &c. He was, without all doubt, one of the beſt, as well as of

He is murdered by the mutinous ſoldiery,

[y] Prob. vit. p. 240. [z] Jul. Cæſ. p. 17.

of the greateſt, princes, that ever reigned at Rome [a]. After his death, his family withdrew from Rome, probably not to give umbrage to his ſucceſſors, and ſettled in the neighbourhood of Verona [b]. As for the few writers who flouriſhed in his reign, we refer the reader to our note (A).

Carus proclaimed emperor.

UPON the death of Probus, Carus, then captain of the prætorian guards, was, by the unanimous conſent of the army, raiſed to the empire, as a perſon in every reſpect well qualified to ſucceed ſo good a prince, ſo great a warrior. The ſenate were well pleaſed with the election of Carus; but dreading the vicious and cruel temper of his ſon Carinus, were unwilling to confirm the choice of the ſoldiery. However, apprehending the power of the army, and deſirous to maintain the peace and tranquillity eſtabliſhed by Probus, they at laſt acknowledged Carus, and conferred upon him the uſual titles and honours *. Of his family and anceſtors we know but very little. Some ſay, that he was by birth a Roman, but by deſcent an Illyrican; others, that he was born in Illyricum, but of Carthaginian parents. In a journal quoted by Vopiſcus,

[a] Prob. vit. p. 241. [b] Idem ibid. * Car. vit. p. 243.

(A) Under Probus flouriſhed Turdulus Gallicanus, who wrote a kind of journal, often quoted by Vopiſcus in his life of Probus, who ſtyles the author of it a man of honour and ſincerity (29). He likewiſe cites M. Salvidienus, from whom he copied the ſpeech made by Saturninus, when he put on the purple, and aſſumed the title of emperor (30); which prompts us to believe, that Salvidienus wrote the hiſtory of that uſurper. Oneſimus publiſhed the life of Probus, done, according to Vopiſcus, with great exactneſs (31), and likewiſe that of the emperor Carus (32). Voſſius ranks them all three among the Latin hiſtorians (33), and mentions a Greek hiſtorian, by name Onaſimus, a native of Sparta or Cyprus, who lived, according to Suidas, under Conſtantine, and was both a ſophiſt and hiſtorian. Perhaps Oneſimus and Onaſimus were one and the ſame perſon, there having paſſed but twenty four years between Probus and Conſtantine. Suidas aſcribes to Onaſimus ſeveral philological and other works (34). About the ſame time flouriſhed another ſophiſt, named likewiſe Onaſimus, but who was a native of Athens (35).

(29) Prob. vit p. 233. (30) Saturn. vit. p. 245. (31) Bonoſ. vit. p. 246. & Car. vit. p. 250. (32) Idem ibid. (33) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. ii. c. 4. p. 184. (34) Suid. p. 523. (35) Idem ibid.

Vopiſcus, he is ſtyled a native of Milan [c]. The two Victors, Eutropius, and ſeveral others, will have him to have been born in Narbonne. The emperor himſelf pretended, that his anceſtors were originally Romans [d]. He raiſed himſelf by degrees to the chief employments in the ſtate, both civil and military. He had been conſul; for the conſulſhip, which he took after his acceſſion to the empire, is called his ſecond conſulſhip. Probus, after having employed him in moſt of his expeditions, appointed him captain of the guards, in which office he gained the affections of the ſoldiers to ſuch a degree, that, upon the death of Probus, they all agreed to raiſe him to the empire in his room. That prince entertained a mighty opinion of the prudence, juſtice, and integrity of Carus, as appears from a letter quoted by Vopiſcus, which he wrote to the ſenate in his behalf, deſiring them to reward his eminent ſervices, by erecting to him an equeſtrian ſtatue, and building him a houſe at the public charge, for which the emperor himſelf promiſed to ſupply the neceſſary marble [e]. His extraction and preferments.

Carus was no ſooner ſettled in the empire, than he gave the title of Cæſar to his two ſons, Carinus and Numerianus, of whom the former was a youth entirely abandoned to all manner of wickedneſs, and the latter endowed with every good quality requiſite in a prince. Some writers pretend, that at the ſame time he declared them his partners in the empire, giving them equal power and authority with himſelf; but on the medals of this year 282, the firſt of Carus's reign, his two ſons are only ſtyled Cæſars [f]. The Sarmatians no ſooner heard of the death of Probus, than they broke into Illyricum and Thrace, over-ran thoſe countries, and threatened Italy itſelf. Hereupon Carus, drawing together his forces, marched againſt the barbarians, and coming, after ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, to a general engagement with them, cut ſixteen thouſand of them in pieces, took twenty thouſand priſoners, and obliged the reſt to abandon the Roman dominions, and retire into their own country, whither he would have purſued them, had he not been informed, that the Perſians were ready to invade the eaſtern provinces with a mighty army, under the conduct of their king Varranes II. a warlike prince, who had lately ſignalized himſelf againſt the Segetani, and entirely reduced that brave and powerful people. Upon this intelligence, Carus, committing the care of the weſtern provinces to his eldeſt ſon Carinus, and taking with him Numerianus, left Thrace,

He creates his two ſons Cæſars.

Defeats the Sarmatians.

[c] Idem ibid. [d] Idem, p. 249. [e] Idem. p. 242.
[f] Birag p. 426.

Thrace, and, croſſing over into Aſia, marched ſtrait to Antioch, and thence into Meſopotamia; which the Perſians, who, it ſeems, had already ſeized that province, abandoned at his approach. From Meſopotamia he advanced into Perſia, laid waſte the country far and wide; and meeting with no oppoſition, as the Perſians were then engaged in a civil war, he beſieged and took the famous cities of Seleucia and Cteſiphon, with Coche, which was a place of great ſtrength on the other ſide of the Tigris, and, as it were, the citadel of Cteſiphon [g]. For theſe conqueſts he took the ſurname of Perſicus, which we read on moſt of his coins [h]. He was bent upon utterly ruining the Perſian monarchy, and would, in all likelihood, have ſucceeded in that great deſign, the Perſians being then divided among themſelves, had he not been prevented by death, which overtook him in the neighbourhood of Cteſiphon, while he was preparing to purſue his conqueſts beyond that city, which the Romans, as was pretended, were by an antient oracle forbidden to do. Junius Calpurnius, one of the emperor's ſecretaries, gave the following account of his death, in a letter which he wrote to the governor of Rome: "While Carus, our truly dear prince, lay ſick in his tent, "a violent ſtorm broke out, attended with dreadful flaſhes of "lightning and claps of thunder. Day was all on a ſudden turned into night, and the air darkened to ſuch a degree, that we "could not diſcern one another. While we were under the "utmoſt conſternation, frightened and diſmayed, after a clap "of thunder more loud and terrible than all the reſt, we "heard one cry out, The emperor is dead. Soon after, his "chamberlains, diſtracted with grief, ſet fire to his tent; which "gave riſe to the report, that he was killed with lightning; "but it is certain, that he died of his illneſs." Thus one of his ſecretaries, whoſe letter Vopiſcus produces, to confute thoſe who aſcribed the emperor's death to divine vengeance, for his attempting to extend his conqueſts beyond Cteſiphon [i]. However the two Victors, Eutropius, Rufus, Feſtus, Apollinaris, Sidonius, St. Jerom, Euſebius, Georgius Syncellus, and Zonaras, write, that he was killed, and his tent burnt, with lightning. He had begun the ſecond year of his reign, and his death happened between the eighth of December of this year 283, and the twelfth of January of the year enſuing; for his name is prefixed to all the laws that were publiſhed till the eighth of December, and thoſe of Carinus and Numerianus Gains great advantages over the Perſians, and takes Seleucia and Cteſiphon.

His death.

[g] Car. vit. p. 250. Greg. Naz. orat. iv. p. 115. [h] Birag. p. 419. Spanh. l. v. p. 419. [i] Car. vit. p. 256.

Numerianus to a law dated the twelfth of January of the year 284 [k]. He reigned, according to the moſt probable opinion, a year and four months. He was conſul when he died, and had his ſon Carinus for his collegue in that dignity. Upon the death of Carus, his ſon Numerianus was immediately ſaluted by the whole army with the title of emperor. As to his other ſon, Carinus, he was then in Gaul, and had been raiſed by his father to the ſovereignty before he ſet out for the Perſian war. Numerianus, grieved beyond expreſſion for the death of his father, broke up his camp, and began to retire. As his eyes, weakened with the great quantity of tears he had ſhed, could not bear the light, he cauſed himſelf to be carried in a cloſe litter. Arrius Aper, his father-in-law and captain of the guards, who had free acceſs to him, laid hold of that opportunity to murder him privately, with a deſign to raiſe himſelf to the empire. The body of the deceaſed prince he left in the litter, telling the ſoldiers who wanted to ſee their emperor, that he could not endure the air, and ſtriving in the mean time to gain them over to his own intereſt. The dead body was thus carried three days; but as it began in the end to be offenſive to the ſmell, the crime was diſcovered ſooner than Aper expected, and he immediately ſeized, no one doubting, but he had been the author of the murder. Upon the death of Numerianus, the army with one voice proclaimed Diocleſian emperor. Such was the unhappy end of Numerianus, after he had reigned about eight months. He was killed near Heraclea in Thrace, as he was leading his army back into Italy. All the antients ſpeak of him as a prince endowed with every good quality becoming a perſon of his rank. He was an excellent orator, and is ſaid to have once ſent ſuch an eloquent ſpeech to the ſenate, that a ſtatue was decreed him, to be ſet up in the Ulpian library, with this inſcription, To Numerianus Cæſar, the moſt eloquent orator of his age. In poetry he far ſurpaſſed all the writers of his time, and left ſeveral pieces behind him, both in verſe and proſe, which were mightily cried up by the learned [l]. He had often declared in public, and it was probably of him that Calphurnius, a celebrated poet of thoſe times, ſaid, That he diverted himſelf with pleading, while he was ſtill in his mother's arms [m]; that is, when Numerianus proclaimed emperor.

He is murdered.

Diocleſian raiſed to the empire.

[k] Cypr. an. p. 45. Cod. Juſt. l. v. tit. 71. leg. 7. p. 509. l. viii. tit. 56. leg. 3. p. 804. Noris de Diocleſ. c. 1. p. 9.
[l] Num. vit. p. 251. [m] Calph. eclog. i. ver. 45.

when he was very young. Both he and his father Carus were ranked among the gods, had temples and divine honours decreed them, &c. It appears from ſome medals, that the latter had impiouſly aſſumed the title of god before his death [n]. Some writers flouriſhed in his time, of whom in note (B).

His extraction, preferments, &c.

DIOCLESIAN was deſcended of a mean and obſcure family in Dalmatia, being, according to ſome, the ſon of a notary, and of a ſlave, according to others; nay, Victor the younger tells us, that he was himſelf in his youth ſlave to a ſenator, named Anulinus, who afterwards gave him his liberty [o]. The name both of his mother and the place of his birth was Dioclea; whence he was called Diocles till his acceſſion to the empire, [n] Spanh. l. v. p. 419. [o] Vict. epit. p. 542.

(B) Vopiſcus tells us, that the life of Carus and his children was written before the year 300, by Fabius Cerilianus, whoſe diligence and exactneſs he commends (36); and that of Carinus in particular by Fulvius Aſprianus, whoſe ſcrupulous exactneſs, and too great care to omit nothing, rendered his work extremely tedious (37). Aurelius Apollinaris likewiſe wrote the life of Carus, probably in Iambics; for he was a poet, and is ſaid to have taken delight in that kind of verſe (38). Voſſius ranks theſe three among the Latin writers (39). A few eclogues, and part of a poem on the chace, by M. Olympius Nemeſianus, has reached our times. He likewiſe wrote ſome pieces on fiſhing and navigation, and was highly eſteemed in thoſe days (40). He is ſuppoſed to have been a native of Carthage, where his works, in the time of Hincmar, were publicly read in the ſchools (41). He inſcribed his poem on the chace to Carinus and Numerianus, after the death of their father; that is, after the year 284. He had not yet, at that time, been at court, nor ſeen Rome (42). Four other eclogues have reached our times, ſuppoſed to have been written by T. Calphurnius, or Calpurnius, a native of Sicily, and to have been inſcribed to Nemeſianus. In the firſt mention is made of declamations made by a prince, ſuppoſed to be Numerianus, almoſt in his infancy (43). Scaliger takes the ſports that were exhibited by Carinus and Numerian to be the ſubject of the laſt eclogue (44). Perhaps Junius Calphurnius, ſecretary to Carus, and the abovementioned poet were one and the ſame perſon.

(36) Car. vit. p. 249, 250. (37) Idem, p. 254. (38) Idem, p. 251. (39) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 4. p. 184. (40) Nemeſ. p. 508, 511. Car. vit. p. 251. (41) Voſſ. poet. Lat. p. 53. (42) Nemeſ. cyn. ver. 64. p. 509, & ver. 77, 81. (43) Calphur. p. 501. (44) Scalig. in Euſeb. chron. p. 253.

empire, when he gave his name a Latin ſound and termination, calling himſelf Dioclesianus [p]. He entered early into the army, and by degrees raiſed himſelf to the firſt military employments. We are told, that while he yet ſerved in an inferior poſt, a woman, by profeſſion a Druid, in whoſe houſe he lodged, upbraiding him with covetouſneſs, he anſwered her in jeſt, I ſhall be more generous when I am emperor. You are joking, Diocles, replied the Druid; but I tell you in good earneſt, that you will attain the empire after you have killed a boar. This is ſuppoſed to have happened in the city of Tongres, in the preſent biſhopric of Liege [q]. Dioclesian ſerved with great credit under Probus, who gave him the command of the troops quartered in Mœſia [r]. He attended Carus in his expedition againſt the Perſians, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that war. Syncellus tells us, that he was raiſed by that prince to the conſulſhip [s]. He had, at the time of Numerianus's death, the command of the guards that attended the emperor's perſon, and were ſuperior in rank to the prætorian guards, as we have obſerved above [t]. He was a great maſter of civil affairs, prompt at foreſeeing events, dextrous at concerting ſchemes, naturally inclined to violent meaſures, but at the ſame time maſter of his temper; an enemy to all uſeleſs expences, and a great encourager of learning, though from his youth he had been brought up in the camp, and had never applied himſelf to any ſtudy but that of the military art, in the knowledge of which he was equal to the famous commanders of antient times [u]. Lactantius charges him with cowardice, and ſays, that he avoided, as much as he well could, expoſing his perſon to dangers [w]. He was, according to Eutropius, naturally covetous, and bent upon amaſſing riches by any means whatever [x]. By his wife Priſca he had a daughter, named Galeria Valeria, who was married to Maximinus Galerius; but proved barren [y]. Both the mother and daughter favoured, and, according to Lactantius, once profeſſed, the chriſtian religion; for that writer reckons them among the firſt, who, terrified with the menaces of Dioclesian, defiled themſelves with impure ſacrifices [z]. Dioclesian being, by the unanimous conſent of the army, proclaimed emperor, in the manner we have related above, aſcended the tribunal; and after having harangued the ſoldiers, and ſolemnly declared upon his oath, that he had been no-ways acceſſory or privy to the death of Numerianus, he cauſed Aper to be brought before him, reproached him in bitter terms with the murder of his prince and ſon-in-law, and then deſcending from the tribunal, drew his ſword, and buried it in his breaſt, ſaying, You ſhall have the honour, O Aper, to fall by an illuſtrious hand. The new emperor would not have begun his reign with an action that ſavoured of cruelty, had it not been to fulfil the above-mentioned prophecy of the Druid, the word aper ſignifying in the Latin tongue a boar; whence, in ſeeing Aper fall, he cried out, I have at length killed the fatal boar. Vopiſcus tells us, that, mindful of the prediction, he ſtrove always in hunting to kill the boars with his own hand; and adds, that when he ſaw Aurelian, Tacitus, Probus, Carus and his two ſons, raiſed to the empire before him, he uſed pleaſantly to ſay before Maximian and our hiſtorian's grandfather, (for to theſe two alone he imparted the prophecy) That he killed, but others enjoyed, the boar [a]. Diocleſian was proclaimed emperor at Chalcedon, on the ſeventeenth of September of the year 284, which epoch is the more remarkable, as it is the beginning of a new æra, called, The æra of Diocleſian, and ſometimes, The æra of martyrs, which for many ages obtained in the church, and is ſtill in uſe among the Cophts in Egypt, the Abiſſines, and ſome other African nations. The firſt year of this æra begins with the Egyptian year on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt of 284 [b]. Diocleſian made his public entry into Nicomedia on the twenty-ſeventh of September of this year, and ſpent the remaining months in making the neceſſary preparations to oppoſe Carinus, who, hearing of his brother's death and the aſſumption of Diocleſian had left Gaul, and was haſtening at the head of a powerful army, into Illyricum. The following year, Carinus took upon him his third conſulſhip, having Ariſtobulus his captain of the guards, for his collegue; and arriving in Venetia, overcame there and ſlew one Julianus, governor of that province who had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor [c]. Elated with this victory, he advanced into Illyricum, where he fought ſeveral battles with Diocleſian, whom he entirely defeated in a general engagement near Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Mœſia; but while he was purſuing the enemy, he was kill

[p] Idem ibid. [q] Car. vit. p. 252. [r] Zonar. tom. 2. p. 243. [s] Syncel. p. 387. [t] Vide p. 96. [u] Prob. vit. p. 241. Macrin. vit. p. 96. Carin. vit. p. 251. [w] Lactant. perſecut. c. 7. & 9. [x] Eutrop. p. 586. [y] Lact. ibid. p. 447. Birag. p 444. [z] Lact. ibid. c. 15. p. 12, 13.

He puts Aper to death.

The æra of Diocleſian.

[a] Car. vit. p. 252. [b] Eutych. p. 585. Aur. Vict. p. 52
[c] Aur. Vict. epit. p. 524.

killed by ſome of his own men, ſtirred up againſt him by a tribune, whoſe wife he had debauched. Thus Aurelian Victor [d]. But Eutropius writes, that he was betrayed by his own army, and killed by Diocleſian [e]. Be that as it will, Diocleſian, ſeeing himſelf, by the death of his rival, become ſole maſter of the empire, marched to Rome; and having eſtabliſhed his authority there, ſet out ſoon after for Germany, where he gained ſeveral advantages over the Alemanni, who had made an irruption into Gaul. The ſame year, his generals fought with ſucceſs againſt the inhabitants of Britain, who, it ſeems, had attempted to ſhake off the yoke. For theſe victories he aſſumed the ſurnames of Germanicus and Britannicus, as appears from an inſcription dated the ſecond year of his reign [f]. From Germany he returned through Illyricum into the eaſt; for he was at Sirmium on the firſt day of the following year [g], and at Nicomedia on the twenty-firſt of January [h]. The next conſuls were Junius Maximus, the ſecond time, and Vettius Aquilinus. This year, Diocleſian took Maximian, ſtyled on the antient coins M. Aurelius Valerius Maximianus, for his collegue and partner in the empire. Maximian was born of obſcure parents, in a village near Sirmium in Pannonia; but entering early into the army, had ſignalized himſelf by many noble exploits, and was reckoned one of the beſt commanders of his time. All the antients paint him as a man of a moſt cruel and ſavage temper, and addicted to all manner of wickedneſs; but at the ſame time extol his courage, his experience in military affairs, and his inviolable attachment to Diocleſian, with whom he had lived many years in great friendſhip. The emperor therefore, who had no iſſue male, and repoſed an entire confidence in Maximian, choſe him for his partner in the empire, inveſted him with the tribunitial and proconſular power, and honoured him with the title of Auguſtus. Some authors write, that Diocleſian not only took him for his collegue in the ſovereignty, but divided the empire with him, reſerving to himſelf the eaſtern provinces, and leaving to Maximian Italy, Africa, Spain, and the reſt of the weſtern countries [i]. Maximian had by his wife, Galeria Valeria Eutropia, by birth a Syrian, Maxentius, who uſurped the empire at Rome, and Fauſta, the wife of Conſtantine the Great. Maxentius was by ſome thought

d. The death of Carinus.

Diocleſian takes Maximian for his partner in the empire.

[d] Idem ibid. [e] Eutrop. p. 585. [f] Noris de Diocleſ. num. c. 4. p. 19, 20. [g] Cod. Juſtin. l. vi. tit. 21. leg. 6. p. 331. [h] Idem, tit. 9. leg. 3. p. 530. [i] Noris de Diocleſ. num. Lactan. perſec. c. 8. p. 8. Pagi, p. 157.

thought to have been a ſuppoſititious child [k]. Eutropia had by a former huſband a daughter, ſtyled on the antient coins Flavia Maximiana Theodora, whom Maximian married to Conſtantine Chlorus, of whom hereafter. Aurelius Victor tells us, that Dioclefian was induced to take Maximian for his partner in the empire, chiefly by the diſturbances which happened this year in Gaul, where two commanders, Aulus Pomponius Ælianus and Cn. Salvius Amandus, having aſſembled a great number of vagabonds, robbers, and peaſants, cauſed themſelves to be proclaimed emperors. Maximian, leaving Dioclefian in Nicomedia, haſtened into Gaul, and there, with the troops quartered in that province, defeated the rebels, and reſtored the province to its former tranquillity [m]. The revolted peaſants were called Bacaudæ, or Bagaudæ, the etymology of which appellation has puzzled the beſt antiquaries. S. Maure de Foſſes, about three ſhort miles from Paris, was formerly called the caſtle of the Bagaudæ, being built, according to a tradition which obtained in the ſeventh century, by Julius Cæſar, in the peninſula formed by the Marne, and fortified with a rampart and ditches, which defended the entry left open by the river. The Bagaudæ are ſaid to have held out there a long time againſt Maximian, who at length made himſelf maſter of the caſtle, levelled it with the ground, and filled up the ditches; which, however, gave to the place its preſent name [n]. While Maximian was employed againſt the rebels in Gaul, Dioclefian was making great preparations in the eaſt, in order to recover Meſopotamia from the Perſians, who, after the death of Carinus, had ſeized that province. But Varranes II. at that time king of Perſia, choſe rather to reſtore what he had taken from the Romans, than to engage in a war, which, he apprehended, would prove long and dangerous [o]. Mention is made of ſome advantages gained this year by Dioclefian over the Saracens [p]. He was the laſt day of this year at Tiberias in Paleſtine, as appears from the date of ſome laws in the code [q]. The following year, 287, Dioclefian entered upon his third conſulſhip, and Maximian upon his firſt. The former from Paleſtine paſſed into Pannonia, as appears from the date of ſeveral laws enacted this year [r]; but what called him him into that province, or what he performed there, we are no-where told. As for Maximian, he was attacked in Gaul by the Alemanni, the Burgundians, the Heruli, whom Bucherius places on the coaſts of the Baltic ſea, and by ſeveral other barbarous nations, who were all overcome by Maximian, and deſtroyed either by the ſword, or by famine. Mamertinus, in his panegyric upon this prince, tells us, perhaps not without ſome exaggeration, that, of ſuch an immenſe multitude, not one was left alive to carry back the news of their overthrow [s]. The ſame year, Carauſius, a native of Gaul, having by Maximian's orders built a fleet at Boulogne, gained great advantages over the Franks and Saxons, who began to infeſt the ſeas with piracies, and, in ſeveral engagements by land, made a dreadful havock of the German nations that had broke into Celtic Gaul. However, as he kept and applied to his own uſe the booty which he had taken from the barbarians, inſtead of returning it to the proprietors, Maximian reſolved to put him to death; but Carauſius, having timely notice of his deſign, paſſed over into Britain with the fleet under his command, and there taking upon him the title of emperor, was acknowledged by all the troops quartered in that iſland [t]. He afterwards cauſed a great number of veſſels to be built, levied new forces, called the barbarians from the continent to his aſſiſtance, and, by inſtructing them how to work their ſhips and fight by ſea, maintained himſelf a long time in poſſeſſion of the iſland, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of Maximian.

A rebellion in Gaul ſuppreſſed by Maximian.

[k] Vict. epit. p. 542. Julian. orat. i. p. 9. [l] Eutrop p 585. [m] Aur. Vict. p. 524. [n] Vide du Cange gloſſar. med. & infim. Latinitat. p. 661, 662. [o] Panegyr. orat. x. p. 125—132. [p] Panegyr. p. 132. [q] Cod. Juſt. l. iv. tit. 40. leg. 3. p. 311. [r] Cod. juſt. l. v. tit. 42. leg. 3. p. 487.

He utterly defeats ſeveral German nations.

Carauſius revolts, and ſeizes Britain.

THE following year, Maximian was conſul, the ſecond time, with Januarius. Mamertinus, his panegyriſt, tells us, that on the firſt day of his conſulſhip, news being brought to Treves, where he then was, that the barbarians had made an irruption into Gaul, and were but at a ſmall diſtance from that city, he immediately quitted his conſular robes, put on his armour, and, mounting his horſe, marched againſt the enemy, cut moſt of them to pieces, and the ſame day re-entered Treves in triumph [u]. Soon after, he croſſed the Rhine; and entering Germany, laid waſte the enemy's country, took a great number of captives, and returned to Gaul loaded with booty [w]. The fame of his name ſtruck ſuch terror into the Franks, that two of their kings, Atec and Genobaud, ſubmitted to him, deſiring him to confirm them in their reſpective kingdoms [x]. From an antient inſcription it appears, that both Diocleſian and Maximian took the ſurnames of Francicus, Alemannicus, and Germanicus [y]. Mamertinus ſpeaks of ſome victories gained by Maximian's generals over a fickle and deceitful nation, meaning, no doubt, the Franks; for ſuch was, at leaſt in thoſe times, the character of that people [z]. Diocleſian likewiſe entered Germany this year on the ſide of Rhœtia, and is ſaid to have extended the bounds of the empire to the ſprings of the Danube [a]. The next year, Baſſus being conſul, the ſecond time, with Quintianus, Claudius Mamertinus pronounced his famous panegyric on the emperor Maximinian in the city of Treves, as is commonly believed, the emperor himſelf being preſent. As he was then aſſembling on the coaſt of Gaul the ſhips, which he had cauſed to be built in ſeveral parts, with a deſign to attack Carauſius in Britain, his panegyriſt promiſes him certain victory over that rebel [b]. But it happened quite otherwiſe; for Carauſius's men, who had been trained to ſea-ſervice, eaſily put to flight thoſe who were ſent againſt them, diſperſed the emperor's fleet, and drove them on the coaſt of Gaul, where moſt of them were daſhed to pieces. Maximian, to cover the diſgrace of this defeat, gave out that the ſea had not proved favourable to him, and that he only put off the war to a more convenient ſeaſon. But, in the mean time, he began a treaty with Carauſius, wherein it was concluded, that he ſhould enjoy the government of Britain, as the more proper perſon, on account of his ſkill in ſea-affairs, to defend the iſland againſt the invaſions of the barbarians [c]. This agreement is marked on all Carauſius's coins, which repreſent two emperors ſhaking hands, with this legend, Concordia Aug [d]. Thus was Britain, by treaty, given up to Carauſius, who governed it, with the title of emperor, for the ſpace of ſix or ſeven years, reckoning from the treaty, or, what to us ſeems moſt probable, from the time he firſt ſeized it. Our authors tell us, that he repaired and fortified the wall of Severus, and gained ſome advantages over the barbarians [e].

Maximian defeats the barbarians a ſecond time.

Gains great advantages over the Franks.

[s] Panegyr. 10. p. 125. [t] Eutrop. p. 585. Aur. Vict. p. 524. Panegyr. 8. p. 108. [u] Panegyr. p. 125. [w] Idem ibid. p. 126.

Britain given up to Carauſius.

Diocleſian defeats the Sarmatians.

The ſame year, Diocleſian gained a complete victory over the Sarmatians, the Vithungæ, or rather Jugunthæ, and the Quadi [f]. Eumenes writes, that the whole nation of the Sarmatians was cut cut off; and the province of Dacia, which they had ſeized, re-united to the empire [g]. For theſe victories, Dioclefian aſſumed the ſurname of Sarmaticus, as appears from ſeveral antient coins and inſcriptions [h]. The next conſuls were Dioclefian, the fourth time, and Maximian, the third. The former gained this year ſome conſiderable advantages over the Saracens [i]; and then, leaving the eaſtern provinces, returned to Illyricum, and from Illyricum entered Italy by the Alpes Juliæ in the depth of winter. Maximian at the ſame time left Gaul; and, paſſing the Alpes Cottiæ, met Dioclefian at Milan, where the two emperors held ſeveral private conferences, the ſubject whereof is not mentioned by hiſtorians, and then returned to their reſpective armies; for they came attended only by a ſmall guard, but were received in all the cities through which they paſſed, with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable. The following year, Tiberianus and Dion, the ſon, or rather grandſon, as is conjectured, of the celebrated hiſtorian, being conſuls, a bloody war broke out among the barbarians, both in the north and in Africa. The Goths, having overcome the Burgundians dwelling on the banks of the Danube, were intent upon utterly extirpating that rival nation; but the Burgundians were powerfully ſupported by the Alani and the Tervingæ. Another Gothic nation, entering into a confederacy with the Taifalæ, made war upon the Vandals and the Gepidæ. In Africa, the Blemyes were at war with the Ethiopians, and the Moors were engaged in a civil war. Neither was Perſia exempt from civil diſturbances, raiſed by Hormiſda, who, revolting from his brother Varranes II, endeavoured to drive him from the throne, and ſeize it for himſelf, being ſupported in his unjuſt pretenſions by ſeveral Perſian lords, and ſome foreign nations [k]. The barbarians being thus diverted from making inroads into the empire, all the provinces ſubject to Rome enjoyed this year a profound tranquillity, which, however, was but ſhort-lived; for the following year, 292, when Annibalianus and Aſclepiodotus were conſuls, the empire was in great danger of being torn in pieces by foreign, as well as domeſtic, enemies. Not to mention Carauſius, who ſtill held Britain, the Perſians, delivered from their inteſtine broils, broke into Meſopotamia, and threatened Syria. The Quinquegentiani, perhaps ſo called becauſe they were quinque gentes,

[x] Valeſ. rer. Francic. l. i. p. 11, 12. [y] Idem ibid. [z] Paneg. 10. p. 127. [a] Idem, p. 126. [b] Idem, p. 128. [c] Eutrop. p. 586. Aur. Vict. p. 525. [d] Noris de Diocleſ. num. c. 4. p. 22, 23. [e] Uſſer. rer. Brit. p. 586. Alford. annal. Brit. p. 285. [f] Paneg 11. p, 132, 133.

The two emperors meet at Milan.

The empire threatened on all ſides.

[g] Paneg. 8. p. 105, 107. [h] Noris ibid. c 4. p. 23. Birag. p. 426. [i] Paneg. 11. p. 132. [k] Paneg. 11. p. 131—137.

tes, that is, five nations, joined in confederacy againſt the Romans, over-ran Africa; M. Aurelius Julianus revolted in Italy, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor; the ſame title was aſſumed at Alexandria in Egypt by Achilleus, ſtyled on his coins L. Epidius Achilleus [l]. The two emperors, alarmed at the danger which threatened the empire, and not thinking themſelves alone able to oppoſe ſo many enemies at once, reſolved to ſtrengthen their intereſt with the aſſiſtance of others, and to name each of them a Cæſar, who ſhould ſucceed them in the empire, and jointly with them defend the Roman dominions, both againſt foreign invaders, and domeſtic uſurpers. Purſuant to this reſolution and agreement, Diocleſian choſe Maximinus Galerius, and Maximian Conſtantius, ſurnamed Chlorus, who were each of them inveſted with the tribunitial and proconſular power, and honoured with the titles of emperor, father of their country, high pontiff, &c. which had hitherto been peculiar to the ſovereign [m]. The two emperors, the better to cement the union between them and their Cæſars, obliged them to put away their wives, and marry others; upon which Conſtantius married Theodora, daughter-in-law to Maximian, and Galerius Valeria the daughter of Diocleſian [n]. Some authors write, that both the Cæſars were named by Diocleſian, and by him inveſted in that dignity with great ſolemnity the firſt day of March of this year 292, on a riſing ground, about three miles from Nicomedia, where a pillar was afterwards erected, with a ſtatue conſecrated to Jupiter [o]. But moſt writers ſuppoſe Galerius to have been choſen by Diocleſian, and Conſtantius by Maximian; and all agree, that Galerius was adopted by the former, and Conſtantius by the latter. After the nomination of the two Cæſars, the empire was divided into four parts: Diocleſian choſe for himſelf the countries beyond the Ægean ſea; Thrace and Illyricum were allotted to Galerius; Italy and Africa, with the adjacent iſlands, to Maximian; and Gaul, Britain, and Spain, with Mauritania Tingitana, to Conſtantius. Each of theſe princes governed the provinces that fell to their ſhare, with an abſolute ſway; but the other three paid great deference to Diocleſian, acknowledging themſelves indebted to him for the power they enjoyed, and looking ing upon him as their common father. An entire union and concord reigned among them, each of them carefully avoiding to aſſume any ſuperiority over the reſt, or to give the leaſt motive of jealouſy or umbrage to his collegues *. From this time forward, the empire continued almoſt conſtantly divided; but at the ſame time each emperor was looked upon as maſter of the whole. Hence to the laws, which any of them enacted, were always prefixed the names of his collegues; and likewiſe to all the requeſts and petitions that were preſented to them. This multiplicity of princes was attended with great inconveniencies, and is therefore much exclaimed againſt by Lactantius, who aſcribes it to the cowardice of Dioclefian, unwilling to expoſe his own perſon to danger [p]. As each of the four ſovereigns would have as many officers, both civil and military, and the ſame number of forces as had been maintained by the ſtate when governed only by one emperor, there were more ſoldiers to pay, than people to ſupply the neceſſary ſums. Hence the taxes and impoſts were encreaſed beyond meaſure, the inhabitants of the ſeveral provinces reduced to beggary, the lands left untilled for want of hands, &c. In proportion as the people grew leſs able to pay the heavy taxes laid upon them, the number of the officers was encreaſed to exact them by force. Thus was the empire greatly weakened, and almoſt quite ruined [q]. Italy itſelf, which had hitherto only ſupplied with proviſions the court, and the troops attending it, was obliged to pay the ſame tribute as the provinces; which reduced it in proceſs of time to a deplorable condition [r].

The two emperors chuſe two Cæſars.

The empire divided into four parts.

[l] Aur. Vict. epit. p. 524. Eutrop p. 585. Birag. p. 430. Goltz. p. 122. [m] Eutrop. p. 585. Aur. Vict. p. 524. Cruc. p. 166. Euſeb. l. viii. c 17. p. 315. [n] Vict. p. 524. Eutrop. p. 586. [o] Lact. perſ. c. 19. p. 18. Chron. Alex. p. 640.

The evils attending this diviſion.

Galerius, whom Dioclefian named to the dignity of Cæſar, is ſtyled on moſt of his coins, Caius Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born in a village near Sardica, the metropolis of New Dacia; his mother, by name Romula, having retired thither from Old Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube, while that country was over-run by the Carpi. Galerius, in honour of his mother, gave afterwards the name of Romulianum to the place of his nativity [s]. As Romula was a profeſſed enemy to the chriſtians, ſhe inſpired her ſon with the ſame hatred to them; which chiefly gave riſe to the bloody proſecution which broke out in the latter end of Dioclefian's reign. Galerius was deſcended of an obſcure family; for both he and his ſiſter's ſon Maximinus, whom he afterwards created Cæſar, are Birth, education, preferments, &c. of Galerius Cæſar.

* Euſeb. Vict. ibid. [p] Lact. perſ. c. 7. p. 6. [q] Idem, p. 6, 8. [r] Aur. Vict. p. 524. [s] Idem ibid. Eutrop. p. 581.

are ſaid to have been in their youth cowherds; whence Galerius was nick-named Armentarius, from the Latin word armentum, ſignifying a drove of cattle. He was a perſon altogether illiterate; but nevertheleſs raiſed himſelf from the mean condition of a common ſoldier to the chief poſts in the army, having given ſignal proofs of his valour and conduct under the emperors Aurelian and Probus [t]. Lactantius reckons him amongſt the worſt emperors, and ſpeaks of him as one abandoned to all manner of wickedneſs, naturally inclined to cruelty, and a declared enemy to learning and men of letters [u]. The ſame writer adds, that in his words, in his actions, and even in his countenance, there was ſomething ſhocking and offenſive, apt to inſpire thoſe who approached him, rather with terror and averſion, than with eſteem or affection. Aurelius Victor, who ſeems to have been no-ways prejudiced againſt him, owns, that he was naturally of a fierce and ſavage temper, and that his ruſtic, haughty, and diſobliging behaviour drowned all his good qualities; for, according to that writer, he had excellent natural parts, and would have made a good figure on the throne, had the gifts of nature been improved by a polite and liberal education [w]. He had no children by Valeria, the daughter of Diocleſian; but a ſon, named Candidianus, by a concubine, and a daughter by his former wife, who was married to Maxentius, the ſon of Maximian [x]. Of Conſtantius, the other Cæſar, we ſhall ſpeak in a more proper place. Galerius was no ſooner created Cæſar, than he marched, with all the troops he could aſſemble, againſt the barbarians in the neighbourhood of the Danube and Illyricum; but performed nothing, either in this or the three following years, againſt the enemies of Rome, which hiſtorians have judged worth tranſmitting to poſterity. He cauſed ſeveral large foreſts to be grubbed up in Lower Pannonia, and a lake to be diſcharged into the Danube; by which means he gained a new province, which, from his wife's name, he ſtyled Valeria, lying between the Danube and the Draw, and known in future ages by the name of Pannonia Secunda. The chief cities of this new province were, Murſa, Aquincum, and Valeria [y]. Maximian paſſed this year over into Africa, where he gained a complete victory over the Quinquegentiani, and reduced Julianus (who had taken upon him the title of emperor in Italy, as we have hinted above, and afterwards croſſed croſſed over into Africa) to ſuch ſtreights, that he ſtabbed himſelf with his own ſword [z]. Conſtantius was no ſooner inveſted with his new dignity, than he haſtened into Gaul; and arriving at Geſſoriacum, now Boulogne, which was held by the troops of Carauſius, inveſted the place, and blocked up the haven with huge beams driven into the ground at the entrance, and heaps of large ſtones like a rampart. The garriſon being by this means prevented from returning into Britain, and deprived of all hopes of relief, ſubmitted to Conſtantius, and were incorporated among his troops. The mole, which had continued firm for ſeveral days, was quite disjointed by the firſt tide after the ſurrender of the city, and broken to pieces. Conſtantius, notwithſtanding the reduction of that important place, did not yet attempt the recovery of Britain, not thinking himſelf furniſhed with a ſufficient number of ſhips for ſo great an undertaking. Where Diocleſian was this year, or what he performed, we are nowhere told. The following year, Diocleſian being conſul the fifth time, and Maximian the fourth, Carauſius was treacherouſly murdered by Allectus, his boſom friend and prime miniſter, who thereupon uſurped the government, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor [b]. Conſtantius, while his fleet was preparing in the ports on the ocean for the Britiſh expedition, cleared Batavia of the Franks, who had ſeized on that country, and tranſplanted them, with their wives and children, into other parts of the empire, deſtitute of inhabitants, obliging them to till the ground, to pay tribute, and to ſupply, when required, a certain number of troops [c]. The emperor Julian tells us, that Maximian and Conſtantius, not only drove the barbarians out of the Roman territories, but built many forts on the frontiers, to prevent their making new irruptions; by which means the inhabitants long enjoyed a profound tranquillity [d]. It was probably on account of his victories over the Franks, that Conſtantius aſſumed the title of Germanicus, which is given him in an inſcription of the following year, 194, quoted by Lactantius [e]. Eumenius, the panegyriſt, tells us, that Conſtantius performed many remarkable exploits before he attempted the reduction of Britain; that he utterly exterminated ſeveral barbarous nations, extended the limits of the empire, reſtored many provinces, pillaged Conſtantius takes Geſſoriacum.

Pannonia Secunda, a new province.

[t] Vict. epit. p. 543. [u] Lact. perſ. c. 9. p. 8. [w] Aur. Vict. p. 526. [x] Lact. perſ. p 401. 44. 19. 16, [y] Aur. Vict. p. 525, 526. Baudran. p, 303.

Carauſius murdered by Allectus, who aſſumes the government of Britain.

Conſtantius drives the Franks out of Batavia.

[z] Aur. Vict. ibid. [a] Panygyr. 7, 8. p. 93, 105. [b] Aur. Vict. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586. Panegyr. 8. p. 108. [c] Panegyr. 1, 3. 7, 8. p. 3, 47, 93, 104, 106, 107. [d] Julian. p. 12. [e] Lact. perſ. p. 366.

pillaged and laid waſte Germany from the Rhine to the Danube, and took the king of a very fierce and warlike nation priſoner [f]. He reſtored to its antient ſplendor the city of Auguſtodunum, now Autun, which had been almoſt utterly ruined in the year 269, by Tetricus, for having revolted from him, and invited the emperor Claudius into Gaul. The temples, baths, and other public edifices, nay, and moſt of the houſes belonging to private perſons, were, at an immenſe charge, rebuilt by Conſtantius, who moreover embelliſhed the city, in regard of its attachment to Claudius, his great uncle, with magnificent aqueducts, ſupplied it with plenty of water, tranſplanted thither the moſt conſpicuous families in the other provinces, prevailed upon the famous orator Eumenius, who was himſelf a native of the place, to take upon him the charge of educating and inſtructing their youth, and, in ſhort, did all that lay in his power to raiſe Autun above all the other cities of Gaul [g].

He reſtores the city of Autun.

THE following year, when Conſtantius and Galerius were conſuls, two ſtrong caſtles were built by the latter on the Danube, in the country of the Sarmatians; the one over-againſt Acincum, or Aquincum, now Strigonium, or Gran, in Lower Hungary; the other oppoſite to Bononia, which ſtood between the Draw and Save, and is at preſent known by the name of Bonmöſter. From the date of ſeveral laws, publiſhed this and the preceding year, it appears that Diocleſian ſpent them both in Illyricum and Thrace; which provinces belonged to Galerius, whom perhaps he was come to aſſiſt againſt the barbarians on the other ſide of the Danube: in the ſame manner we ſhall ſee Maximian enter Gaul to defend that province againſt the incurſions of the barbarians, while Conſtantius was employed in Britain. The next conſuls were Tyſcus and Annulinus. This year, the Carpi, after having long maintained themſelves in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the Roman emperors, were at length entirely reduced by Galerius, and by Diocleſian tranſplanted into the territories of the empire, chiefly into Pannonia [h]. From an inſcription of this year, we learn, that the emperors cauſed the walls of Vitodurum, now Wintherthur, in the canton of Zurich, between Zurich and Conſtance, to be rebuilt. Aurelius Proculus, who commanded in the country of the Sequani,

The Carpi entirely ſubdued.

[f] Paneg. 8. p. 103, 107. [g] Paneg. 6, 8, 9. p. 85, 112, 114. [h] Paneg. 8. p. 105, 107. Jorn. rer. Goth. c. 16. p. 634. Aur. Vict. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586. Ammian. l. xxviii, p. 357.

quani, had the ſuperintendency of the work. In that inſcription, Dioclefian is ſtyled imperator the tenth time, and Maximian the eighth [i]. The following year, 296, Dioclefian being conſul the ſixth time, and Conſtantius the ſecond, the latter, after three years preparations, undertook at length the reduction of Britain. Eumenius the panegyriſt pretends, that the Romans were every-where victorious; that they had recovered whatever they had formerly poſſeſſed (he ought at leaſt to have excepted antient Dacia); and that, having overcome the reſt of their enemies, they deemed it a great diſgrace, that ſuch a wealthy province as Britain, which ſupplied them with many valuable commodities, ſhould ſtill be held by an aſſaſſin and uſurper [k]. Conſtantius therefore, without further delay, reſolved to paſs over into Britain; and Maximian to whom he imparted his reſolution, haſtened into Gaul, to prevent the barbarians beyond the Rhine from breaking into the empire, while he was employed againſt the rebels in Britain. Conſtantius had equipped ſeveral fleets, and in different ports, that the enemy, not knowing where to expect him, might be obliged to divide their powerful navy. One of his fleets commanded by Aſclepiodotus, his captain of the guards, to whom hiſtorians aſcribe the whole glory of the victory, ſet ſail from Boulogne; and eſcaping by the help of a fog, the Britiſh navy, which lay off the iſle of Wight, and was ready to engage them, landed their men without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. Aſclepiodotus had no ſooner put his army aſhore, than he ſet fire to his fleet, that there might be no hopes of ſafety, but in victory. Conſtantius, who had ſailed with another ſquadron from the mouth of the Seine, landed at another place, not mentioned by hiſtorians, and was received by the inhabitants with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. Allectus was encamped at a ſmall diſtance from the place where Conſtantius landed; but either not daring to engage him in perſon, or hoping to overcome Aſclepiodotus before the two armies joined, he quitted his poſt, and marched with great ſpeed againſt the latter. Conſtantius followed him, but did not arrive, notwithſtanding all the expedition he could uſe, till after the battle, in which Allectus, who had engaged, hurried on by fear and deſpair, before the arrival of the Roman troops who obeyed him, was killed; and his army, conſiſting only of foreign auxiliaries, either diſperſed or cut in pieces. Before the battle, he quitted the imperial Conſtantius invades Britain.

His army lands in the iſland.

Allectus overcome and ſlain.

[i] Gruter. p. 166. Valeſ. not Gall. p. 615. Ferrar. de ant. Italic. p. 332. [k] Paneg. 3. p. 107.

perial robes, that they might not diſcover him; ſo that the conquerors, with much ado, diſcovered his body among the heaps of the barbarians who lay ſlain in the field [l]. Part of Conſtantius's fleet, ſeparating from the reſt during the fog, entered the Thames; and ſailing up that river, arrived at London. This accident, which might have been attended with bad conſequences, occaſioned a new victory. For ſuch of the auxiliaries of Allectus as had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, fled to London, with a deſign to plunder that wealthy city, and return to their reſpective countries with the booty. But Conſtantius's men landing luckily in the port of London at the ſame time, fell upon the barbarians, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of them in all parts of the city; which was by that means, to the great joy of the inhabitants, happily preſerved. Conſtantius granted a general pardon to the partizans of Carauſius and Allectus, and cauſed his own men to reſtore whatever they had taken from the natives upon their firſt landing, ſaying, that he was not come to oppreſs, but to deliver the people from oppreſſion [m]. Thus was Britain re-united to the empire, after it had been held ſeven years by Carauſius, and three by Allectus. Of this victory, Eumenius the panegyriſt ſpeaks thus: "O important victory! worthy of many "triumphs! By this Britain is reſtored; by this the Franks "areutterlydefeated; and other nations in that rebellious con- "federacy reduced to obedience. To conclude, the ſea it- "ſelf is ſcoured, to eſtabliſh a laſting tranquillity in thoſe "provinces. You, great Cæſar, for your part, may with "juſtice triumph in this conqueſt of a new world; and, by "reſtoring the naval glory of Rome, may boaſt, that you "have added to the empire a larger element than all its for- "mer dominions.—— Britain is now ſo perfectly reduced, "that all the neighbouring nations are under abſolute ſubjec- "tion [n]." Thus Eumenius, a greater friend to Conſtantius, as will appear in the ſequel of the hiſtory, than to truth; for the brave Caledonians were not by him brought under the yoke, but ſtill maintained their antient liberties. The ſame writer obſerves, that from Britain Conſtantius ſent ſeveral workmen to be employed in rebuilding and embelliſhing the city of Autun [o]. Conſtantius, having thus ſettled affairs in Britain, returned to Gaul; and tranſplanting great numbers of Franks

London ſaved by Conſtantius's men from being plundered.

Britain re-united to the empire.

[l] Idem paneg. 7. p. 99. & 8. p. 109—111. Aur. Vic. p. 525 Eutrop. p. 586. Euſeb. chron. [m] Paneg. 8. p. 110, 111. Eutrop. p. 586. [n] Paneg. 8. p. 111, 112. [o] Idem ibid.

Franks into that province, peopled with them the countries of Amiens, Beauvois, Troies, and Langres, almoſt quite deſtitute of inhabitants, obliging the new comers to cultivate the lands, to pay the uſual tributes, and ſupply the Roman armies with a certain number of troops [p]. The ſame year, Diocleſian recovered Egypt from Achilleus, who had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, and held that province, according to his coins, for the ſpace of near ſix years [q]. Diocleſian marched againſt him this year in perſon, overcame him without much trouble, and puniſhed him according to his deſerts. Thus Aurelius Victor [r]. But Eutropius writes, that he ſuſtained an eight months ſiege in Alexandria [s]; and Euſebius, that great numbers were killed on both ſides, during the ſiege [t]. Diocleſian not only puniſhed with death the ring-leaders of the revolt, but filled Egypt with murders and proſcriptions [u]; and even gave up, according to Oroſius [w], the city of Alexandria to be plundered by his greedy and enraged ſoldiery. If what theſe authors write be true, we leave our readers to judge of the ſincerity of Eumenius, who tells us, that Diocleſian, by his extraordinary clemency, reſtored tranquillity to Egypt [x]. Some writers obſerve, that he made a ſtrict ſearch after all the books of chymiſtry, written formerly by the Egyptians, and cauſed them all to be publicly burnt, leſt the Egyptians, enriched by that art, ſhould be tempted to ſhake off the yoke anew [y]. Conſtantine, the ſon of Conſtantius, attended Diocleſian in this war; for Euſebius tells us, that he ſaw him as he paſſed with the emperor through Paleſtine [z]. The city of Coptis and Buſiris in Thebais, having ſided in this war with Achilleus, were by Diocleſian utterly ruined [a]. Zonaras ſuppoſes theſe cities to have been deſtroyed by Diocleſian, ſome time before the revolt of Achilleus, for having attempted to ſhake off the Roman yoke [b]. Eumenius tells us, that the victories gained by Diocleſian in Egypt, ſtruck terror into the Indians and Ethiopians [c]. However, the emperor was ſo far from taking any advantage of that conſternation, and extending the limits limits of the empire on that ſide, that, on the contrary, he entered into a treaty with the Nubians, who uſed to make frequent inroads into the adjoining territory of Oaſis, yielding to them a large country, as much, ſays Procopius, as a traveller could go through in ſeven days, on condition, that they prevented the Blemyes, and other barbarians, from breaking into Egypt on the ſide of Ethiopia. The ſame writer adds, that Diocleſian cauſed a caſtle to be built in an iſland formed by the Nile in the neighbourhood of Elephantis, and a temple, in which ſacrifices were offered, both by the Roman and Nubian prieſts, for the proſperity of both nations. By this means, the emperor hoped to eſtabliſh a good underſtanding between the Romans and thoſe barbarians; and therefore called the caſtle Philas, that is, friendſhip. But neither the country he yielded to them, nor the penſion which he engaged to pay yearly both to them and the Blemyes, and which was ſtill paid in the time of Juſtinian, was ſufficient to reſtrain them from making inroads into the empire, when not awed by the Roman troops [d].

Part of Gaul peopled by the Franks.

Achilleus overcome, and Egypt reduced by Diocleſian.

[p] Valeſ. rer. Franc. l. i. p. 15. Buch. Belg. p. 227. Panegyr, 7. p. 93. [q] Goltz. p. 121. Birag. p. 430. [r] Aur. Vict. p. 525. [s] Eutrop. p. 586, [t] Euſeb. chron. [u] Eutrop. p. 586. Johann. Antioch. p. 834. [w] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 25. p. 215. [x] Panegyr. 9. p. 121. [y] Suid. p. 741. Johan. Antioch. ibid. [z] Euſeb. vit. Conſtant. l. i. c. 19. p. 417. [a] Theoph. chronograph. p. 4, 6. [b] Zonar. p. 243. [c] Panegyr. 8. p. 105.

Diocleſian yields part of Egypt to the Nubians.

THE next conſuls were Maximianus, the fifth time, and Galerius, the ſecond. The former, quitting Gaul upon the return of Conſtantius from Britain, croſſed over into Africa, cut in pieces the armies of the rebellious Moors, beſieged their caſtles and ſtrong holds, drove them from their mountains and rocks, which they had hitherto deemed impregnable; and having obliged them to deliver up their arms, and ſurrender at diſcretion, tranſplanted them into other countries [e]. The ſame year, Narſes, king of Perſia, emulating the glory of Sapor, who had defeated the Roman armies and taken the emperor himſelf priſoner, entered Armenia at the head of a mighty army; and, having, without much trouble, reduced that kingdom, advanced into Meſopotamia. Diocleſian, mindful of the misfortune that had befallen the unhappy Valerian, inſtead of marching againſt him, in perſon, withdrew into Egypt, committing the whole management of that dangerous war to Galerius, whom he enjoined to leave Illyricum forthwith, and haſten into Meſopotamia, to oppoſe there the attempts of the Perſian monarch. Galerius obeyed, flew to Meſopotamia, and meeting the Perſians between Callinicum and Carrhæ, engaged their numerous army with the few troops he had then with him. The battle laſted ſome hours; but in the end the Romans, overpowered with

The Moors ſubdued by Maximian.

Galerius defeated by Narſes, king of Perſia.

[d] Procop. bell Perſ. c. 19. p. 59. Olympiodor. p. 13. [e] Panegyr. 8. p. 105—108.

with numbers, were forced to give ground, and ſave themſelves by flight. Galerius haſtened to Diocleſian, to give him, by word of mouth, an account of the diſaſter, and adviſe with him about the moſt proper meaſures to prevent the evil conſequences that might attend it. The emperor, who, at his arrival, was taking the air in the fields, received him with the greateſt contempt imaginable, and ſuffered him, attired as he was with the purple, to walk one, or, as others write, ſeveral, miles by his chariot [f]. This affront, inſtead of diſheartening him, inſpired him with an eager deſire of wiping off the diſgrace of his late overthrow. Having therefore, with much ado, obtained leave of Diocleſian to raiſe a new army, he aſſembled all the troops in Illyricum and Mœſia, made new levies, and in a ſhort time returned with a conſiderable army, and entered Armenia. All authors agree, that Galerius in this war performed whatever could be expected from a brave ſoldier and experienced commander: he even went in perſon, attended only by two horſemen, to reconnoitre the enemy, paſſing himſelf upon thoſe who ſtopped him for a deputy ſent by the Roman emperor to the Perſian monarch. Having thus viewed the enemy's camp and works, he attacked them ſo ſeaſonably, and conducted the whole action with ſuch prudence and addreſs, that only with twenty-five thouſand men he forced their entrenchments, tho' defended by an innumerable multitude, cut above twenty thouſand of them in pieces, took an immenſe booty and an incredible number of priſoners, among whom were the king's wives, ſiſters, and children, both ſons and daughters, and a great many perſons of the firſt rank [g]. Galerius treated the princeſſes with great reſpect, and would not ſuffer the leaſt affront to be offered to them; which ſeemed ſo ſurpriſing to the Perſians, that they owned themſelves as much inferior to the Romans in chaſtity as in valour [h]. Eutropius tells us, that Licinius, afterwards emperor, ſignalized himſelf on this occaſion [i]. Narſes, who was preſent at this battle, and, according to Zonaras, wounded in the beginning of the engagement, fled with the reſt, and took ſhelter in the moſt remote deſerts of his kingdom; whence he ſent Apharban, one of his chief favourites, to conclude a peace with the Romans upon any terms. Apharban, in the moſt humble Narſes utterly defeated in a ſecond battle by Galerius.

[f] Aur. Vict. p. 525. Juli. orat. 1. p. 31. Ammian. l. xiv. p. 27. [g] Eutrop. p. 586. Feſtus, p. 553. Lact. perſec. c. 9. p. 8. Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 245. Zonar. p. 244. [h] Petr. Patric. in excerpt. de legat. p. 26. & 30. [i] Eutrop. ibid.

The Perſians ſue for peace.

humble and ſubmiſſive manner, entreated the conqueror not to deſtroy the Perſian empire, but to uſe his victory with moderation; which, he ſaid, would gain him greater reputation and fame, than the victory itſelf. As for the conditions of the peace, he left them entirely to him; and only begged in his maſter's name, that, mindful of the generoſity which in all ages had been peculiar to the Romans, he would add to the obligations which he already owed him for treating his wives and children with ſuch humanity, that of reſtoring them to their former condition. Galerius anſwered him, that it ill became the Perſians to expect moderation in others, after they had in ſuch an enormous manner, as was known to the whole world, abuſed their victory in treating their illuſtrious captive Valerian like the meaneſt of ſlaves, nay, worſe than their beaſts of burden. However, as it is beneath a Roman, added he, to retaliate ſuch indignities, and we are taught to ſpare thoſe who ſubmit, and humble ſuch as oppoſe us, let your maſter know, that he may perhaps ſoon have the pleaſure of ſeeing the perſons who are ſo dear to him [k]. Galerius, having diſmiſſed the Perſian embaſſador, haſtened to Diocleſian, who received him at Niſibis in Meſopotamia with all poſſible marks of honour and eſteem. They held ſeveral conferences, the ſubject of which was, whether or no they ſhould conclude a peace with the Perſians, and upon what terms. We are told, that they might have eaſily reduced Perſia to a Roman province; but that Diocleſian did not approve of it, for reaſons, ſays Aurelius Victor, unknown to us [l]. Sicorius Probus, one of Galerius's ſecretaries, was therefore diſpatched to Narſes, who received him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem, and ſoon after admitted him to an audience on the banks of the Aſprudis in Media, in the preſence only of Apharban and two others. The terms propoſed by Probus were, that Narſes ſhould yield to the Romans the five following provinces, Intelene, Sophene, Arzacene, Cardene, and Zabdicene; that the Tigris ſhould be the boundary between the two empires; that Niſibis ſhould be a common empory to both nations; that the limits of Armenia ſhould be extended to the caſtle of Zintha on the confines of Media; and laſtly, that the king of Iberia ſhould receive the crown at the hands of the Roman emperor. Narſes excepted againſt the article relating to Niſibis, but complied with the reſt. Whereupon a peace was concluded, and the Perſian

Which is granted them upon their yielding five provinces to the Romans.

[k] Eutrop. ibid. Petr. Patric. legat 26. [l] Aur. Vict p. 525.

ſian king's wives and children ſent back to him [m]. This peace proved very advantageous to the Romans, and laſted forty years, till the Perſians, deſirous to recover the provinces they had yielded, broke it in the latter end of Conſtantine's reign. The above-mentioned provinces lay towards the ſprings of the Tigris, and on the Roman ſide of that river; but were by the Romans commonly called the provinces beyond the Tigris, becauſe they had been ſo called by the Perſians. Inſtead of Intelene and Sophene, we read in Ammianus Marcellinus, Moxoene and Rehimene: as to the names of the other three, there is no diſagreement among authors. For theſe conqueſts, Galerius aſſumed the pompous titles of Perſicus, Armeniacus, Medicus, and Adiabenicus, as if he had ſubdued all theſe nations; and became ſo elated with his victory, that Diocleſian began to take umbrage at his haughty behaviour, imagining that he would not be much longer ſatisfied with the bare title of Cæſar [n]. The following year, Anicius Fauſtus being conſul, the ſecond time, with Severus Gallus, Diocleſian built ſeveral forts and caſtles on the frontiers of the empire towards Perſia, and ſurrounded with high walls and ſtrong towers the caſtle of Cercuſium in Meſopotamia, at the confluence of the Aboras and the Euphrates [o]. The next conſuls were Diocleſian, the ſeventh time, and Maximian, the ſixth. This year, the Marcomanni and Baſtarnæ received a great overthrow, and great numbers of their captives were tranſplanted into the Roman territories. From ſeveral laws it appears, that Diocleſian was this year in the months of January, February, April, and November, at Sirmium, and on the fifth of June at Philippopolis in Thrace [q]. The following year, when Conſtantius and Galerius were conſuls the third time, is quite barren of events. The next conſuls were Titianus, the ſecond time, and Nepotianus, whom Onuphrius takes to be the father of Flavius Popilius Nepotianus, who uſurped the empire fifty years after [r]. This year Conſtantius gained a remarkable victory over the Alemanni, who coming upon him unexpectedly, while he had but a ſmall body of troops with him, obliged him to retire, and ſhelter himſelf within the walls of Langres. But his army arriving a few hours after he had entered the city, he Galerius is puffed up with his victory.

Conſtantius gains a ſignal victory over the Alemanni.

[m] Petr. Patric. legat. p. 29. [n] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 17. Lact. perſ. c. 9. p. 9. Aur. Vict. p. 525. [o] Panegyr. 9. p. 121. Grut. p. 166, 167. Ammian. l. xxix. p. 359. [p] Aur. Vict. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586. [q] Cod. Juſt. l. ii. tit. 13. leg. 17. p. 201, &c. [r] Onuph. p. 261.

he marched out at the head of the detachment he had with him, joined his other forces, and falling upon the enemy, cut ſixty thouſand of them in pieces [s]. Eumenius mentions another victory gained this year by Conſtantius in the plains of Vindoniſſa, now Vindiſch, in the canton of Bern, near the confluence of the Aar and the Ruſs [t]. The ſame writer tells us, that a numerous army, conſiſting of different German nations, having rendezvouſed in an iſland in the Rhine, while that river was frozen over, were by a ſudden thaw ſhut up there, and obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion to the Romans, who kept them blocked up with their fleet [u]. Diocleſian was, as appears from the code [w], on the fourth of July at Antioch in Syria. The following year when Conſtantius and Galerius were conſuls the fourth time, a great dearth prevailed in moſt provinces of the empire, occaſioned, ſays Lactantius [x], by the avariciouſneſs of Diocleſian, who, to obviate that evil, fixed the prices of all ſorts of neceſſary proviſions; but the rates being too low, the traders inſtead of expoſing to ſale, concealed their commodities, by which means the dearth was changed into a famine, which raged till the merchants were allowed to ſell their commodities at their own prices. The ſame thing happened in the reign of Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate. We read in the chronicle of Alexandria, that Diocleſian gave this year to that city the military bread [o]; what is meant thereby, we are not told. Procopius writes, that Diocleſian ordered two millions of buſhels of corn to be yearly diſtributed among the inhabitants of that populous metropolis [p]. Before the reign of Diocleſian, corn was given monthly to old and diſabled perſons; and in the reign of Conſtantine to the eccleſiaſtics [q]. Diocleſian ſeems to have paſſed this year partly in Syria, and partly at Nicomedia in Bithynia, with Galerius [r]. The next year, Diocleſian entered upon his eighth, and Maximian upon his ſeventh, conſulſhip. Diocleſian and Galerian paſſed the winter at Nicomedia in Bithynia, in conſultations, not about the means of extending the empire, and ſecuring it againſt the incurſions of the barbarians, but concerning the moſt effectual methods of utterly extir-

A great dearth in moſt provinces of the empire.

[s] Zonar. p. 244. Theophan. chronog. p. 5. Panegyr. 7. p. 93. [t] Panegyr. 7. p. 92. Baudr. p. 31. [u] Panegyr. 7. p. 92. [w] Cod. Juſt. l. ii. tit. 28. leg. 25. p. 268. [x] Lact. perſ. c. 7. p. 362. [o] Chron. Alex. p. 644. [p] Procop. arcan. hiſt. c. 26. p. 77. [q] Euſeb. l. vii. c. 21. p. 267. Evagr. p. 68. Atharapol. p. 737. [r] Cod p. 240, 243.

extirpating the chriſtian religion, to which Galerian had imbibed from his infancy an irreconcileable hatred. He found means to inſpire Diocleſian with the ſame fury, and, as we may call it madneſs; the effect of which was the moſt bloody and dreadful perſecution the church had yet ſuffered. This perſecution, which was the tenth and laſt general one, broke out on the twenty-third of February of this year, 303, the nineteenth of Diocleſian's reign, and raged ten whole years with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, the chriſtians being every-where, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition, dragged to execution, and tortured with the moſt exquiſite torments, rage, cruelty, and hatred could invent. Such numbers of chriſtians ſuffered death in all the provinces of the empire, that the tyrants imagining they had compaſſed their wicked intent, and entirely aboliſhed chriſtianity, told the world in a pompous, but lying, inſcription, that they had extinguiſhed the chriſtian name and ſuperſtition, and every-where reſtored the worſhip of the gods to its former purity and luſtre. But the church triumphed over all the powers and artifices of men, and, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of tyranny, prevailed a few years after in the very metropolis of idolatry and ſuperſtition. During this perſecution, Albanus Verolamienſis, Julius, Aaron, a citizen of Iſca legionum, now Exeter, and other champions of the faith, almoſt without number, ſuffered martyrdom in Britain. But to give an account of their ſufferings, of their truly heroic firmneſs, and unſhaken conſtancy, would be intrenching on the province of the eccleſiaſtic writers. Happy and glorious had hitherto been the reign of Diocleſian; but he no ſooner began to imbrue his hands in the blood of the righteous, ſays Euſebius, than he felt the effects of divine vengeance in the many calamities which ſoon overtook him [s]. A few days after the iſſuing of the firſt edicts againſt the chriſtians, a fire broke out in the palace at Nicomedia, where Diocleſian and Galerius were lodged, and reduced part of it to aſhes [t]. Euſebius writes, that he could never know how that accident happened [u]. Conſtantine, who was on the ſpot, aſcribes it to lightning [w]; and Lactantius aſſures us, that Galerius cauſed fire to be privately ſet to the palace, that he might lay the blame of it upon the chriſtians, and by that means incenſe

The tenth general perſecution.

A fire breaks out in the palace at Nicomedia.

[s] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 13. p. 308. Euſeb. l. viii. c 6. p. 297. orat. ad ſanct. cœtum.

[t] Lact. perſ. c. 14. p. 12.

[u] Idem ibid.

[w] Conſt.

Diocleſian ſtill more againſt them, which he did accordingly [x], Conſtantine tells us [y], that Diocleſian was ſo diſturbed with this accident, that thenceforth he conſtantly imagined to ſee lightning falling from heaven, which was in effect the beginning of that phrenzy, which by Lactantius and Euſebius is aſcribed to the malady, of which we ſhall ſpeak anon. Diocleſian's terror and diſmay were greatly encreaſed by a ſecond fire, which broke out in the palace fifteen days after the firſt, but was ſtopt before it had done any great miſchief. However, it had the effect which was intended by the author of it, Galerius; for Diocleſian, aſcribing it to the chriſtians, reſolved to keep no meaſures with them; and Galerius, the more to exaſperate him againſt them, withdrew from Nicomedia the ſame day, ſaying, that he was afraid of being burnt alive by the chriſtians [z]. About this time, one Eugenius aſſumed the title of emperor in Syria. He commanded five hundred men in Seleucia, who being employed in the day-time in cleanſing the harbour of that city, and in the night in baking their own bread, to deliver themſelves from that inſupportable drudgery, agreed to revolt, and proclaim their leader emperor. Eugenius, who expected nothing leſs, refuſed at firſt the dignity offered him; but was at length prevailed upon, through fear, to accept it; for they threatened him with preſent death; if he refuſed to ſecond their deſigns. Being therefore arrayed with a purple robe taken from the ſtatue of one of the gods, he led his men ſtrait to Antioch, which city he reached the ſame day in the cloſe of the evening, and entered it without oppoſition, as there was no garriſon in the place, and the inhabitants were quite unappriſed of his revolt; but when he began to act as emperor, the whole city roſe, and falling upon the rebels, for the moſt part intoxicated with wine, with ſuch arms as chance preſented, killed them all to a man before midnight. Thus the empire of Eugenius began and ended the ſame day [a]. Diocleſian ought rather to have rewarded than puniſhed the Antiochians; but on this occaſion he betrayed that cruelty which was natural to him; for, without any trial, without paying any regard to the uſual forms of law, he commanded the chief magiſtrates of Antioch and Seleucia to be publicly executed, as if they had been all privy to the conſpiracy; which rendered him ſo odious to the Syrians, that they could not, without horror, hear his name mentioned

Eugenius proclaimed emperor by a few ſoldiers.

Who are all cut in pieces.

The cruelty of Diocleſian to the Antiochians.

[x] Lact. perſ. c. 14. p. 12. [y] Conſtant. ibid. [z] Lact. ibid. Euſeb de martyr. Palæſ. c. 2. p. 320. [a] Liban. orat. xiv. p. 399. & orat. xv. p. 410, 411.

mentioned ninety years after [b]. Among the many perſons who loſt their lives on this occaſion, Libanius names his paternal grandfather and his grandfather's brother, whoſe eſtates were likewiſe confiſcated [c]. Towards the cloſe of the year, Diocleſian and Maximian, with their two Cæſars, Conſtantius and Galerius, repaired to Rome, and there enjoyed the honour of a triumph, which the ſenate had long ſince decreed them, and their many victories and conqueſts well deſerved. As Diocleſian, both in his triumph and the ſports that followed it, ſhewed greater œconomy than was pleaſing to the populace, they took thence occaſion to rally him with great liberty; which he not being able to bear, left the city ſoon after his triumph, and ſet out for Ravenna on the nineteenth of December. As the ſeaſon was then both rainy and cold, he contracted a lingering diſtemper, which in a ſhort time weakened him to ſuch a degree, that he could neither walk nor ſtand [d]. He entered upon his ninth conſulſhip at Ravenna, having Maximian, the eighth time conſul, for his collegue. In the beginning of the ſpring, he ſet out from Ravenna, and paſſing through Venetia and Illyricum, carried always, contrary to his cuſtom, in a litter, arrived at Nicomedia in the beginning of the autumn. As his diſtemper encreaſed daily, on the thirteenth of December ſo deep a ſwoon ſeized him, that he was believed to have paid the laſt debt of mortality, and a report of his death was ſpread all over the city. However, he recovered his ſight and voice; but his head remained ſo affected, that thenceforth he frequently fell into fits, which quite deprived him of the uſe of his reaſon. As he was not in a condition to appear abroad till the firſt of March of the following year, many perſons believed he was dead; but that his death was kept concealed till the arrival of Galerius, leaſt the ſoldiers ſhould, in the mean time, according to their cuſtom, proclaim a new emperor [e]. To diſſipate this report, he ſhewed himſelf to the people of Nicomedia on the firſt of March; but there appeared ſuch a change in his countenance, that many doubted whether it was the ſame perſon. Soon after, Galerius arrived, who had already threatened Maximian with a civil war, if he did not reſign the empire; and was come into Nicomedia with a deſign to oblige Diocleſian likewiſe to reſign the ſovereignty, ſince he was no longer able to diſcharge the functions of the imperial dignity. As Diocleſian Diocleſian triumphs, and leaves Rome.

His illneſs.

[b] Idem ibid. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Lact. perſec. c. 17. p. 15. Ammian. l. xvi. p. 131. [e] Lact. perſec. c. 17. p. 15. Euſeb. l. viii. c. 13.

cleſian did not yield to the reaſons he alledged, but only offered to take both him and Conſtantius for his partners in the empire, Galerius told him plainly, that if he did not reſign of his own accord, he would force him to it. Diocleſian, frightened with theſe menaces, and well appriſed, that Galerius, who had, for ſome time, been encreaſing his army with new levies, was in a condition to make good his word, yielded at length, and it was agreed, that Diocleſian and Maximian ſhould reſign the ſovereignty; that Conſtantius and Galerius ſhould, at the ſame time, be inveſted with it; and that, to preſerve the form of government introduced by Diocleſian, two new Cæſars ſhould be named. Diocleſian immediately diſpatched an expreſs to Maximian, who was then at Milan, acquainting him with what had paſſed at Nicomedia. He was no leſs unwilling, than his collegue, to part with the ſovereignty; but nevertheleſs, to avoid a civil war, in which he was well appriſed, Galerius would prevail, he came into the ſame meaſures [f]. Such is the account which Lactantius gives us of the reſignation of Maximian and Diocleſian, in a piece not long ſince recovered from darkneſs. Conſtantine, who was then at Nicomedia, and lodged in the ſame palace with Diocleſian, aſſures us, in a ſpeech which he pronounced in public, that the emperor, thinking himſelf no longer able to govern, on account of the fits to which he was ſubject, reſigned of his own accord [g]; and the panegyriſts, who wrote at that time, mention his reſignation as a ſhining inſtance of greatneſs, generoſity, and an utter contempt of all human grandeur; nay, they tell us, that both he and Maximian had agreed long before, and even bound themſelves by a ſolemn oath in the capitol, to reſign the ſovereignty. Aurelius Victor writes, that Diocleſian quitted the government, and betook himſelf to a private life, that he might not be overwhelmed with the misfortunes that threatened the empire [h]. As two new Cæſars were to be choſen, Diocleſian propoſed Maxentius, the ſon of Maximian and ſon-in-law of Galerius, and Conſtantine, the ſon of Conſtantius; but Galerius, rejecting them, prevailed upon Diocleſian to name two others in their room, viz. Severus, whom he had already ſent to receive the purple at the hands of Maximian, and Daia or Daza, his ſiſter's ſon, to whom he had a little before given the name of Maximin. They were both greatly attached to Galerius, but neither of them any-ways qualified for ſuch an high ſtation. However,

Galerius obliges him to renounce the empire.

Maximin and Severus declared Cæſars.

[f] Lact. perſec. c. 17. p. 15. & c. 18. p. 16. [g] Conſtant. orat. c. 25. [h] Aur. Vict. p. 525.

However, Dioclesian consented to their election; and a few days after, on the first of May of the present year 305, the twenty-first of his reign, he resigned the empire in the presence of his court and the army, devesting himself of the purple, and delivering it to Maximin, whom at the same time he declared Cæsar, together with Severus. This ceremony was performed in the same place where Galerius had been declared Cæsar, about three miles from Nicomedia. Dioclesian, before he devested himself of the purple, made an harangue to the soldiers, telling them, That, his infirmities obliging him to retire, he yielded the empire to Constantius and Galerius, who were more able and better qualified than he to discharge so great a trust. When the ceremony was over, Dioclesian passed through Nicomedia with a small retinue, and retiring to Dalmatia, his native country, chose the city of Salona for the place of his residence [i]. The same day, Maximian, quitting the purple at Milan, consigned it to Severus, as had been agreed on before-hand, declared Constantius and Galerius emperors, and then retired to Lucania, where we shall soon see him raising disturbances, with a design to resume the dignity which he had quitted. As for Dioclesian, he passed the remainder of his life, that is, near nine years, at a country-seat, in the neighbourhood of Salona, on the spot where the city of Spalatro was afterwards built. The ruins of the palace of Dioclesian are still to be seen there, and take up two thirds of the town. It was, according to the description which Constantius Porphyrogenitus gives us of it, a most stately and magnificent building, and contained four temples, one of which is still entire and the cathedral of Spalatro. Dioclesian diverted himself, during his retirement, with cultivating a garden, saying often, Now I live; now I see the beauty of the sun. Some time after, when Maximian and others wrote to him to join them and resume the empire, he returned them this answer; I wish you would but come to Salona, that I might shew you the colworts which I have planted with my own hands: I am sure you would never thenceforth mention the empire to me [k]. He was long honoured in his retreat by the princes who reigned after him, and looked upon him as their common father, since to him they were indebted for their dignity. In an inscription of the year 306, both he and Maximian are styled the antient emperors, and the fathers of the emperors [l]. In his time they consecrated Dioclesian and Maximian resign the empire.

Dioclesian leads a retired life.

[i] Lact. pers. c. 18. p. 16, 17. Vict. epit. p. 543. [k] Idem, 542. Eutrop. p. 587. [l] P. Pagi, p. 148.

conſecrated the thermæ, or hot baths, which he had begun at Rome, and conſulted him in all affairs of great importance, paying great deference to his counſels. Thus Galerius invited him in the year 307, to Carnus, or Carnuntum, in Pannonia, to adviſe with him about the promotion of Licinius [m]. However, ſeveral things happened afterwards, which gave him great concern and uneaſineſs: His daughter Valeria refuſing to marry Maximin, after the death of her huſband Galerius in the year 311, was by that prince treated in a barbarous manner, and baniſhed. Conſtantine and Licinius, in the beginning of the year 313, eſpouſed with great zeal the cauſe of the perſecuted chriſtians, whom he and his collegue Maximian had attempted utterly to extirpate [n]. Victor adds, that the two above-mentioned princes having been invited to the nuptials of Licinius with the ſiſter of Conſtantine, and he excuſing himſelf on account of his age, they wrote a threatening letter to him, as if he had been concerned in the diſturbances raiſed by Maxentius [o]. The ſame author adds, that the dread he was in of an ignominious death, prompted him

His death. to end his life with poiſon [p]. Theophanes writes, that the ſenate had already iſſued a decree for his execution [q]; and Lactantius, that ſeeing himſelf, after a glorious reign of twenty years, ill uſed and deſpiſed, he reſolved to put an end to his life, abſtained from all food, and died of hunger, grief, and deſpair [r]. In the chronicle of Alexandria we read, that he died of a dropſy [s]; and in Euſebius, that he was conſumed and worn out by a lingering diſtemper [t]. He died, according to Aurelius Victor [u], ſoon after the marriage of Licinius, which was celebrated in the March of the year 313, after having lived about eighty years, and reigned twenty and ſome months. He was deified with the uſual ſolemnities after his death [w], probably by Licinius or Maximin II. for Conſtantine, at the time of his death, profeſſed the chriſtian religion. Libanius writes, that Diocleſian ſhewed himſelf in

He ſhewed himſelf in many things an excellent prince. many, but not in all, things an excellent prince [x]; and the emperor Julian commends him for having done many things that proved very uſeful to the public [y]. He enacted a great many wholeſome laws, and was ſo far from countenancing informers

[m] Lact. perſ. c. 29. p. 26. [n] Idem ibid. c. 41. p. 36
[o] Vict. epit. p. 542. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Theoph. chronogr
p. 8. [r] Lact. perſ. c. 42. p. 36. [s] Chron. Alexand. p. 656 [t] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 7. p. 317. [u] Aur. Vict. p. 542. [w] Eu trop. p. 586. Euſeb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 364. [x] Liban. orat. xiv
p. 399. [y] Jul. orat. i. p. 12.

formers, that he commanded them to be executed, when they could not make good their charge. He would not receive the accuſation of one Thaumaſius againſt his benefactor Symmachus, in whoſe houſe he had been brought up, and condemned another to baniſhment, for informing againſt his brother [z]. He ſuppreſſed the officers called frumentarii, of whom Caſaubon ſpeaks much at length, without giving us any ſatisfactory reaſon why they were ſo called [a]. They were firſt eſtabliſhed to give the emperor immediate notice of the diſturbances that happened in the provinces; but abuſing their office, eſpecially in the diſtant countries, they often extorted large ſums from the inhabitants, by threatening to accuſe them, if they did not comply with their unjuſt demands. However, no great benefit was reaped from their ſuppreſſion; for thoſe who were ſtyled agentes in rebus and curioſi proved no leſs miſchievous than the frumentarii [b]. Diocleſian encouraged and preferred perſons of merit and virtue, diſcountenanced vice, managed the public money with great frugality, had much at heart the worſhip of the gods, and was, till ſeduced by Galerius, rather a friend than an enemy to the chriſtians, of whom he had, till the year 303, great numbers both in his court and army [c]. He was greatly addicted to building, and embelliſhed ſeveral cities of the empire, eſpecially Rome, Carthage, Milan, and Nicomedia, with many ſtately edifices. From the ruins of his thermæ, or public hot baths, which are ſtill viſited and admired by all travellers to Rome, we may judge of the grandeur and magnificence of that ſurpriſing fabric. Beſides the bathing places, in which three thouſand perſons could conveniently bathe at a time, there were many other rooms and apartments; for the books which were lodged in Trajan's library were conveyed thither [d]. The emperor Conſtantius II. when he came to Rome in 358, admired nothing ſo much as Diocleſian's baths, which ſeemed rather a province, ſays Ammianus Marcellinus, with no ſmall exaggeration, than a building [e]. Part of theſe baths were by pope Pius IV. changed into a church, conſecrated to the Virgin Mary, under the title of Santa Maria degli Angeli. Diocleſian embelliſhed with a great number of ſtately buildings many other cities, but above all Nicomedia, with a deſign of equalling it to Rome, for which purpoſe he ſpared no coſt or labour,

His public buildings.

[z] Cod. Juſt. l. ix. tit. i. leg. 17. p. 111. & leg. 12. p. 810.
[a] Caſaub. not. in Spart. p. 22. [b] Aur. Vict. p. 524. [c] Idem, p. 525. Lact. perſec. c. 10. p. 9. [d] Euſeb. chron. p. 214. Prob. vit. 233. Vict. epit. p. 525. [e] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 91.

labour, that might render the place either beautiful or convenient. He built there a circus, ſeveral baſilics, a mint, an arſenal, a palace for his wife, and another for his daughter. Thus Nicomedia became the ordinary reſidence of the emperors, when the affairs of the empire called them into the eaſt, till the removal of the imperial ſeat to Conſtantinople [f]. We have ſpoken above of his magnificent palace or villa at Spalatro in Dalmatia, in which province he likewiſe built the caſtle of Dioclea, in the village where he was born, the inhabitants whereof were called Diocleſians [g]. But theſe buildings proved very burdenſome to the people, who were not only obliged to abandon their antient habitations to make room for them, but moreover to furniſh workmen, beaſts of burden, and the neceſſary materials; by which means he ruined provinces, while he embelliſhed the cities. If he happened not to like a building when it was quite finiſhed, he cauſed it to be pulled down, though reared at an immenſe expence, and to be rebuilt upon a different plan, perhaps to pull it down a ſecond and third time [h]. Lactantius charges him with avarice, and with putting, under various falſe pretences, many perſons to death, in order to ſeize their eſtates [i]. Eutropius [k], Zonaras [l], and Aurelius Victor [m] tell us, that, to cover the meanneſs of his extraction, he affected extraordinary magnificence in his attire, cauſed thoſe who approached him to fall proſtrate at his feet, aſſumed the titles of Lord and God, as Caligula and Domitian had done, and claimed divine worſhip. Hence Spartian, in addreſſing his works to him, uſes this expreſſion; I lay them at the feet of your deity [n]. Other writers expreſs themſelves in the ſame ſtyle, whether they direct their ſpeech to him or his collegues, who, it ſeems, followed his example [o]. Diocleſian took the name of Jovius, and Maximian that of Herculeus, as if they had been deſcended from theſe pretended deities, and even obliged their ſucceſſors to aſſume the ſame titles. Thus Galerius and Maximian added to their other titles that of Jupiter and Jovius, and Conſtantius the ſurname of Herculeus, which he tranſmitted to Licinius, and his ſon Conſtantine; but they ſoon quitted them; for Lactantius tells us, that in the year 320, the impious names of Jupiter and Hercules were aboliſhed from off the

They prove burdenſome to the people.

Aſſumes the title of God.

[f] Lact. perſ. c. 7, 17. p. 7, 15. [g] Conſtan. Porphyr. de adminiſtr. imper. ad Rom. fil. p. 72. [h] Lact. perſ. c. 7. p. 7. [i] Idem ibid. c. 9. p. 9. [k] Eutrop. p. 586. [l] Zonar. p. 244. [m] Aur. Vict. p. 523. [n] Spart. vit. Ver. p. 13. [o] Paneg. 10. p. 123.

the face of the earth [p]. We cannot help obſerving before we cloſe this chapter, that though no reign was more remarkable, either for length, or variety of great events, than Diocleſian's, yet no prince's reign is leſs known; which ſeems the more ſurpriſing to us, when we reflect on the great number of hiſtorians who flouriſhed in his time. Many of them muſt, without all doubt, have written the hiſtory of his life, as we know they did thoſe of his predeceſſors, which moſt of them inſcribed to him: but no particular and diſtinct account of his reign has reached us; nay, a chaſm even in the hiſtory of Zoſimus, from the death of Carus to the reſignation of Diocleſian, has deprived us of what we might have learnt concerning him of that, as we may call him, ſecond-hand hiſtorian. May we not aſcribe this general loſs of memoirs concerning him to divine vengeance, for his attempting utterly to aboliſh the holy ſcriptures? This, at leaſt, ſeems more probable to us, than what we read in a modern critic, viz. that the chriſtians, out of hatred to ſo cruel an enemy, ſuppreſſed all hiſtories and memoirs relating to him [p]. Of the writers who flouriſhed under Diocleſian we ſhall ſpeak in our note (C.)

[p] Lact. ibid. c. 52. p. 46. [q] Caſaur. not. in Spart. p. 201.

(C) Claudius Euſthenius, ſecretary to Diocleſian, wrote in four books the hiſtory of the four princes Diocleſian, Maximian, Conſtantius, and Galerius (45); and this is all we know of him. Voſſius is of opinion, that Aſclepiodotus wrote the hiſtory of Diocleſian's reign, becauſe Vopiſcus quotes him in relating ſome things concerning that prince (46); but Aſclepiodotus was captain of the guards to Conſtantius, and well acquainted with the court, Vopiſcus might have quoted him, as he often quotes his father and grandfather, who never committed any thing to writing. The Auguſtine writers, viz. Spartian, Lampridius, Vulcatius, Capitolinus, Pollio, and Vopiſcus, all lived in the reign of Diocleſian, though ſome of them wrote under his ſucceſſors. Ælius Spartianus, wrote firſt the lives of all the emperors, from Julius Cæſar to Adrian, and afterwards reſolved to add to them the lives of all the other emperors and Cæſars, and to inſcribe the whole to Diocleſian, of whoſe family he ſeems to have been (47). The lives of the following princes paſs under his name, viz. of Adrian, of *Æ*lius Verus, his adopted ſon, of Julian, Niger, Severus, Caracalla, and Geta. Thoſe of *Æ*lius Cæſar, Adrian, Julian, Severus, and

(45) Car. vit. p. 254. (46) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 5. p. 185. (47) Ver. vit. p. 13, 16.

and Niger, are inſcribed to Dioclefian ; that of Caracalla has no dedication prefixed to it ; but the life of Geta is addreſſed to Conſtantine, already Auguſtus. What the author ſays in his addreſs, gives us room to believe, that he had dedicated other lives to the ſame prince ; nay, Salmaſius takes him to be the author of the lives of all the emperors to Maximin I. (48). This opinion we ſhall examine anon. Vopiſcus, in the life of Probus, names Julius Capitolinus and Ælius Lampridius among the hiſtorians who had written before him (49). To the latter are generally aſcribed the lives of Commodus, of Diadumenus the ſon of Macrinus, of Heliogabalus, and Alexander. The life of Commodus is inſcribed to Dioclefian ; thoſe of Heliogabalus and Alexander to Conſtantine, who deſired the author, as he tells us, to write the life of Heliogabalus, and to addreſs it to him, as he had done ſeveral other lives before (50). He adds, that he deſigned to write the hiſtory of Alexander Severus, and his ſucceſſors, to Conſtantine ; namely of the Gordiani, of Aurelian, Claudius, Dioclefian, Maximian, Licinius, Severus, Alexander, who revolted in Africa in 308, and of Maxentius. Theſe princes were, it ſeems, at that time all dead, and conſequently he could not write this before the year 324. He tells us elſewhere, that he had written the lives of M. Aurelius and Macrinus (51). In ſome antient manuſcripts, all the lives that paſs under the name of Lampridius, are aſcribed to Spartian ; and truly the lives ſaid to have been written by theſe two hiſtorians are in every reſpect ſo like, that ſome learned critics have taken them to have been done by one writer, named Ælius Lampridius Spartianus. Caſaubon and Voſſius are greatly inclined to this opinion (51) ; the more becauſe Vopiſcus often quotes Lampridius, and never Spartian. On the other hand, Salmaſius takes them to be two diſtinct writers (52). Julius Capitolinus likewiſe undertook to write the lives of all the emperors in ſo many diſtinct and ſeparate books, as others had done before him ; but, upon ſecond thoughts, to avoid prolixity and repetitions, he joined ſeveral lives together ; of ſuch emperors eſpecially as reigned at the ſame time (53). Under his name paſs the lives of T. Antoninus, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, Pertinax, Albinus, Macrinus, the two Maximins, the three Gordians, Maximus, and Balbinus. The hiſtory of Titus Antoninus, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and Macrinus, are dedicated to Dioclefian ; and that of the Maximins, of the Gordians, and of Albinus, to Conſtantine, for whoſe ſake he undertook the whole work (54). Perhaps Cornelius Capitolinus,

(48) Salmaſ. not. in Sprat. p. 242, 243. (49) Prob. vit. p. 234. (50) Lampr. p. 45, 101, 136, 113. (51) Commod. vit. p. 45. Diadum. vit. p. 99. (51) Caſaub. in Spart. p. 1. Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 7. p. 192, 193. (52) Salmaſ. in Spart. p. 66. (53) Gord. vit. p. 151. Maxim. vit. p. 138. (54) Capit. p. 30, 39, 96, &c.

nus, quoted by Trebellius Pollio in his account of Zenobia (55), and Julius Capitolinus are one and the ſame perſon. Some manuſcripts aſcribe to Spartian all the lives that paſs under the name of Capitolinus, except thoſe of the Maximins, of the Gordians, and of Maximus and Balbinus (56). Salmaſius yields to the authority of the manuſcripts (57); but Voſſius aſſerts, that the lives commonly aſcribed to Capitolinus were done by him, and not by Spartian (58). Vulcatius Gallicanus, a Roman ſenator, undertook, in the reign of Dioclefian, to write the lives of all thoſe who had enjoyed the ſovereignty, whether by right or uſurpation (59), but of all he wrote, or deſigned to write, nothing has reached our times, except his hiſtory of Avidius Caſſius, who revolted in the eaſt during the reign of M. Aurelius, which is dedicated to Dioclefian. This life too Salmaſius aſcribes to Spartian (60). But the name of Vulcatius, which is no common name, has not, in the opinion of Voſſius (61), been prefixed to it by chance, or mere caprice of the tranſcriber. Valeſius takes the hiſtorian to be one and the ſame perſon with Gallicanus, who was conſul with Baſſus in the year 317.

Trebellius Pollio wrote the life of Philip, and of all the other princes, whether lawful emperors or uſurpers, from his time to the reign of Claudius and his brother Quintillus (62). He had begun, it ſeems, this work before the year 291, when Tiberianus was governor of Rome (63). Great part of this work has been long ſince loſt. He likewiſe deſigned to write the life of Aurelian; which deſign if he ever put in execution, it was after Vopiſcus had written on the ſame ſubject; for that writer glories in his being the firſt among the Latins who publiſhed the life of Aurelian (64). Trebellius Pollio ſeems to have been greatly attached to Conſtantius the father of Conſtantine (65). Vopiſcus thinks he overlooked ſome things, and was too minute and diffuſe in others (66). His hiſtory of the thirty tyrants was publiſhed after the year 291, when Conſtantius was already Cæſar. He inſcribed his work to ſome particular friend, or friends, whom he does not name; but the life of Claudius he addreſſes to Conſtantine, and not to Conſtantius, as ſome have maintained (67). Voſſius thinks his language and ſtyle not unworthy of praiſe, if compared with that of his cotemporary writers (68). Some aſcribe to Capitolinus the lives that that paſs under the name of Pollio; but their opinion is rejected by the beſt critics (69). Flavius Vopiſcus was a native of Syracuſe, and ſeems to have been deſcended of a noble family; for his father and grandfather, whom he often quotes, lived in great intimacy with Dioclefian. He was induced to write the life of Aurelian, as he himſelf informs us, by Junius Tiberianus governor of Rome, (70), in 291, or 292, but he did not publiſh it before Conſtantius was created Cæſar (71). He ſeems to have made ſome additions to it long after; for he takes notice of a ſaying of Dioclefian after his reſignation, which, he ſays, he had learnt of his father (72). He wrote likewiſe the hiſtories of Tacitus and his brother Florianus, of Probus, of Firmus, and of ſome other uſurpers. He was employed in writing the lives of Carus and his children, while Galerius was waging war with the Perſians (73); that is, about the year 297, but he muſt have afterwards added ſeveral things to it; for he mentions the ſhews exhibited by Dioclefian in 309, and ſays, That Euſthenius, who had been ſecretary to that prince, had written his life, and the lives of his three collegues (74). From which expreſſion we may conclude, not only that Euſthenius was no longer his ſecretary, and conſequently that Dioclefian was no longer emperor, but likewiſe that he and his collegues were dead, ſince their lives were already written. The laſt of them died in 311. Vopiſcus inſcribed his works, not to the emperors, but to his friends. The life of Firmus is addreſſed to Baſſus, and that of Probus to one Celſus, his intimate friend, perhaps Herennius Celſus, who aſpired at the conſulſhip (75), and was, according to Caſaubon (76), governor of Egypt. Vopiſcus was a great admirer of Apollonius Tyanæus, and promiſes in one place of his work to write his life; but of ſuch a performance no mention is made by any of the antients (77). Theſe ſix writers, viz. Spartian, Lampridius, Vulcatius, Capitolinus, Pollio, and Vopiſcus, are commonly known to the learned by the name of hiſtoriæ Auguſtæ ſcriptores, though they are in effect rather biographers, than hiſtorians, and take more care to inform us of the good and bad qualities of the emperors, of their birth, education, ſtature, mein, and even their diet, and the cloaths they wore, than to deſcribe their wars, the laws they enacted, and the great revolutions that happened during their reſpective reigns. Vopiſcus, in the opinion of the learned, far excels the reſt, both as to his method and ſtyle; but nevertheleſs has many great faults, and is not to be compared with any of the antient Latin hiſtorians. As for the other five, they betray great want of judgment in their choice, and of method thod in digeſting what they had choſen. Of theſe ſix writers, Capitolinus is the moſt confuſed and injudicious; whence ſome have ſuſpected, that the author of this collection might have mixed and blended together the relations of Capitolinus, Spartian, and ſome others (78). Their ſtyle is quite coarſe and unpoliſhed, their expreſſions uncouth, and ſometimes hardly intelligible. Vopiſcus writes, that Lampridius and Capitolinus minded rather truth than elegance in their narrations (79). Pollio owns his ſtyle to have nothing of the elegance of the antients (80). But of the many hiſtorians, ſome ſay fifty and upwards, who have handled the ſame ſubject, only the above-mentioned ſix have reached us. Tatius, or Statius Cyrillus, was contemporary with theſe ſix writers, and tranſlated the lives of ſeveral emperors out of Greek into Latin. Conſtantine deſired him to abridge them, and to join ſeveral lives together in one volume (81). His work has been long ſince loſt. Sotericus, a poet and hiſtorian, flouriſhed in the reign of Dioclefian, on whom he wrote a panegyric. He was a native of Oaſis in Libya, and much eſteemed by the learned men of his age. He left behind him ſeveral works, and among the reſt the life of Apollonius Tyanæus (82); but only a ſmall fragment of what he wrote has been conveyed to us by the ſcholiaſt of Lycophron (83).

(55) Trig. tyran. c. 29. p. 198. (56) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 5. p. 186. (57) Salmaſ. in Capit. p. 58. (58) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. c. 65. p. 18. (59) Caſſii vit. p. 40, 41. (60) Salmaſ. in Spart. p. 108. (61) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. l. ii. c. 5. p. 187. (62) Aur. vit. p. 209, 242. (63) Idem ibid. (64) Idem ibid. (65) Caſaub. in not. p. 203. (66) Aur. vit. ibid. (67) Vide Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. c. 6. p. 190. (68) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. c. 6. p. 190.

(69) Vide Caſaub. in Poll. p. 203. (70) Aur. vit. p. 209. (71) Idem, p. 224. (72) Idem, p. 223. (73) Car. vit. p. 250. (74) Idem, p. 254. (75) Trig. tyran. vit. p. 195. (76) Caſaub. in Vopiſc. p. 216. (77) Aur. vit. p. 217.

But of all the writers who flouriſhed under Dioclefian, the moſt famous was the philoſopher Porphyrius, born, as he himſelf writes, in the city of Tyre, or that neighbourhood; for he ſtyles himſelf a Tyrian (84). St. Jerom gives him the ſurname of Bataneotes (85); whence ſome have believed him to have been a native of Batanea, a village in Syria, according to Stephanus, or rather in Phœnicia; for it ſtood within fifteen miles of Cæſarea in Paleſtine. Perhaps the family of Porphyrius came originally from Tyre, and thence he ſtyled himſelf a Tyrian, though born in the village of Batanea (86). It is certain, that he paſſed part of his life in the neighbourhood of Tyre (87). Baronius maintains him to have been by religion a Jew (88), probably for no other reaſon, but becauſe he ſuppoſed him to have been a native of Batanea; but in thoſe days Batanea was inhabited not only by Jews, but likewiſe by Greeks and Syrians. It is true, he always ſpoke with great reverence of the God of the Jews (89); but at the ſame time he declared himſelf an open enemy to that people, as well as to the Chriſtians (90). St. Auſtin ſtyles him Porphyrius the Sicilian (91), probably on account of his having reſided a long time in Sicily, and publiſhing there ſeveral books againſt the chriſtians. He was deſcended of a good family. His anceſtors were not Greeks, but Syrians, ſo far as we can judge from the name of his father, who was called Malchus; which name he himſelf bore in his youth: but as the name of Malchus in the Syriac language ſignified king, Longinus adviſed him to exchange it for that of Porphyrius, which has ſome relation to royalty, the word πορφύρα ſignifying in Greek, purple, which was peculiar to the emperors and Cæſars. However, he was by ſome ſtill called Malchus, and Longinus himſelf gave him that name in addreſſing a work to him (92). He was born in the year 233, for he was thirty in the tenth year of the reign of Gallienus (93). Socrates writes, that at firſt he profeſſed the chriſtian religion; but afterwards, upon his being beaten and abuſed by ſome chriſtians at Cæſarea in Paleſtine, out of revenge he not only renounced, but undertook to impugn, the religion, which he had till that time profeſſed (94). Holſtenius likewiſe ſuppoſes him to have been once a chriſtian, and for that ſuppoſition quotes St. Auſtin (95); but that father only ſays, that Porphyrius had read the ſcripture with great attention, but could not be reconciled with the humility of Jeſus (96); from which words no one can conclude, that he ever profeſſed the doctrine and humility of Jeſus. While he was yet very young, he ſaw Origen, at that time in great credit among the chriſtians (97), not at Alexandria, as Vincentius Lirinenſis writes (98), (for he had left that city in 231.) but either at Cæſarea in Paleſtine, or at Tyre. Porphyrius came to Rome about the year 252. He was diſciple to Longinus, under whom he ſtudied at Athens the philoſophy of Plato, and made ſuch progreſs in his ſtudies, that he ſoon became the honour and ornament of that ſchool (99). Though he was one of the moſt dangerous and inveterate enemies the chriſtian religion ever had, yet this has not hindred the chriſtian writers from doing him juſtice, and beſtowing upon him the praiſes he deſerved. Euſebius ranks him among the moſt illuſtrious men and eminent philoſophers, that flouriſhed at any time (100). Cyrillus of Alexandria extolls his knowledge; and St. Auſtin ſtyles him an extraordinary traordinary genius, and the moſt learned among philoſophers (1). In the year 263, being then thirty, he paſſed from Greece to Rome, where he heard Plotinus, who taught there; and no ſooner heard him, than forgetting Longinus and all the other philoſophers, he addicted himſelf entirely to him (2). Suidas ſuppoſes him to have been likewiſe diſciple to Amelius (3); but the latter ſtudied at the ſame time under Plotinus, ſo that he and Porphyrius were rather condiſciples (4). Porphyrius indeed might have learned many things of Amelius, who was eighteen years older than he, and been in that ſenſe his diſciple. He lived ſix years with Plotinus, and the fruit he reaped from his inſtructions was a profound melancholy, which in the end reduced him to ſuch miſery, that he reſolved to deſtroy himſelf. Plotinus, ſuſpecting his deſign from ſome words he dropped, prevailed upon him to divert his mind from ſuch gloomy thoughts by travelling. He therefore took his leave of Plotinus, and, in the beginning of the year 268, the fifteenth of the reign of Gallienus, ſet out from Rome, and croſſed over into Sicily. He landed near Meſſana, now Meſſina; but, without viſiting that city, went ſtrait to cape Lilybæum, to ſee one Probus, who was generally eſteemed a man of great learning. He continued ſome days with Probus, without taking any food, or converſing with any one (5): but in the end got the better of his melancholy, and ſtaid near two years at Lilybæum. While he was there, Plotinus died at Rome, about the beginning of the year 270. From Sicily Porphyrius ſeems to have paſſed into the eaſt, to have ſtaid ſome time at Tyre, and returning from thence to Sicily, to have croſſed over from Lilybæum to Africa, and there viſited the city of Carthage (6). From Africa he ſailed back to Sicily, and from Sicily returned to Rome, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of eloquence, and even made ſome public ſpeeches or declamations (7). He lived to a great age, ſays Eunapius; and Porphyrius himſelf, in his life of Plotinus, ſpeaks of a thing that happened to him when he was ſixty-eight; that is, in the year 299, or 300 (8); ſo that he not only lived to the reign of Probus, as Eunapius writes, but to that of Dioclefian, and perhaps longer; which confirms what we read in St. Auſtin, viz. that he lived in the time that the princes of the earth, and the adorers of the infernal ſpirits, conſpired to extirpate the chriſtian religion; and therefore could not perſuade himſelf, that it had been given by God for a means of ſalvation; whereas he ought, continues St. Auſtin, to have looked upon that bloody perſecution as an evident proof of the glory and invincible ſtrength of the church (8). He died, according to Eunapius (9), at Rome. St. Jerom ſeems have believed, that he was buried in Sicily (10). He had married a widow, by name Marcella, who had five children by a former huſband. Eunapius tells us, that he married her with no other view but to bring up her children with greater care, out of regard to their father, who was his particular friend (11). As the chriſtian writers upbraid him with no vices, we conclude him to have been, as to his life and manners, altogether blameleſs. Eunapius cries up his eloquence and the beauty of his ſtile and expreſſions (12). He was thoroughly verſed in every branch of literature, excelled all men of his age in the knowledge of polite learning, arithmetic, geometry, and muſic (13); but ſhone chiefly in philoſophy, his favourite ſcience and ſtudy. Authors obſerve of him, that, whereas other philoſophers ſtudied to conceal their ſentiments with an affected obſcurity, Porphyrius expreſſed himſelf in a manner adapted to the meaneſt capacities (14). He taught philoſophy at Rome both by word of mouth and in writing. Iamblichus, a celebrated philoſopher in thoſe times, and Theodorus of Aſine in Peloponneſus, a man in great repute among the pagans, were both his diſciples (15); as likewiſe were, according to ſome writers, Chryſaores, Nemercus, and Gedalus, who inſcribed ſome works to him (16). He was very communicative to thoſe who deſired to be informed and inſtructed, and kind to his diſciples, whom on all occaſions he was ready to aſſiſt to the utmoſt of his power. He applied himſelf, as moſt of the Platonic philoſophers did of thoſe days, to the execrable ſtudy of magic, which he diſguiſed with the plauſible name of theourgia, or divine operation (17). He compoſed an infinite number of books upon different ſubjects, in which the reader will find a catalogue in the latter end of the diſſertation which Holſtenius publiſhed on the life and writings of that philoſopher (18). We ſhall only take notice of ſuch of his works as are ſtill extant. A manuſcript has reached our times on the quantity and meaſure of words, under the name of Porphyrius, whom Holſtenius believes to have been the true author of it. To Homer is added in ſeveral editions a ſmall work, containing thirty-two queſtions concerning that poet, done by Porphyrius, and looked upon by Holſtenius as the (8) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. c. 32. p. 120, 121. (9) Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. (10) Hier. in Ezech. p. 377. (11) Eunap. c. 2. p. 11. (12) Idem, c. 2, 3, p. 19, 20. (13) Idem, p. 18, 19. (14) Idem ibid. (15) Phot. c. 242. p. 1057. Steph. p. 121. (16) Porphyr. vit. c. 5. p. 44. & 51, 53. (17) Aug. ibid. l. x. c. 9. p. 111. Euſeb. præp. Evang. l. iv. c. 6. p. 143. (18) Holſten. vit. Porph. c. 6.

(78) Vide Caſaub. in Spart. p. 13. (79) Prob. vit. p. 234. (80) Trig. tyran. p. 184. (81) Max. vit. p. 138. Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. c. 7. p. 193. (82) Suid. p. 784. (83) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 16. p. 246. (84) Plot. vit. p. 6. (85) Hier. in Gal. par. prim. 156. (86) Vide Jonſ. l. iii. c. 15. p. 286. (87) Plot. vit. p. 12. (88) Baron. ad ann. 302. (89) Auguſt. civit. Dei, l. xix. c. 23. p. 253.

(90) Euſeb. præp. evang. l. x. c. 9. p. 485. (91) Aug. retract. l ii. c. 11. p. 24. (92) Eunap. c. i. p. 16. Plot. vit. p. 10. (93) Idem, p. 3. (94) Socr. l. iii. c. 3. p. 100. (95) Porphyr. vit. c. 5. p. 19. (96) Aug. civ. Dei. l. x. p. 118. (97) Euſeb. l. vi. c. 19. p. 220. (98) Vinc. Lir. c. 23. p. 352. (99) Euſeb. præpar. evan. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. Eunap. c. 2. p. 16. (100) Euſeb. ibid. Porphyr. vit. c. 1. p. 10, 11.

(1) Aug. civ. Dei, c. 32. p. 120. (2) Plot. vit. p. 3. Eunap. c. ii. p. 17. (3) Suid. p. 573, 193. (4) Plot. vit. p. 3. (5) Idem, p. 4. Eunap. c. 2. p. 17, 18. (6) Porphyr. vit. p. 2—12. Plot. vit. p. 17. (7) Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. Plot. vit. p. 16. (8) Idem ibid.

the beginning of an entire comment, well known to the antients. The ſame writer publiſhed in 1630, a piece, which he aſcribes to Porphyrius, on the cave of the nymphs, deſcribed in the thirteenth book of the Odyſſey: the reader will find there many difficulties cleared up touching the theology of the pagans: at the ſame time Holſtenius publiſhed a fragment of Porphyrius on the river Styx; and ſeveral other fragments of that piece are to be found in Stobæus. Porphyrius often quotes there the heretic Bardeſanes, and his diſciples, who, he ſays, lived in the time of Heliogabalus. He wrote in five books the curious hiſtory, or, as it is ſtyled by others, curious entertainments (19). Out of the firſt book of this work, Euſebius quotes a long paſſage upon plagiaries, who copy from one another (20). Among his philoſophical works, Holſtenius takes, in the firſt place, notice of the introduction upon the univerſals, which he wrote when in Sicily, to explain to Chryſaores, his diſciple, the categories of Ariſtotle. One Ammonius wrote a comment upon this work, which is ſtill extant. Another work of Porphyrius, on Ariſtotle's categories, was firſt printed at Paris in 1543. Beſides theſe two, he wrote a third on the ſame ſubject, in ſeven books which he aſcribed to Gedalus. This was in great part copied by Iamblichus, who likewiſe publiſhed a treatiſe on the categories longer than that of Porphyrius (21). In the latter end of the laſt century was publiſhed at Baſle an introduction written by Porphyrius, on Ptolemy's work touching the influence and force of the ſtars; and ſeveral manuſcripts of a comment by Porphyrius on another work of Ptolemy, treating of harmony and muſic, are ſtill extant (22). His books, containing the lives and tenets of the philoſophers, were well known to the antients; but he brings them no lower than to Plato's time (23). The ſubject of the firſt book of this work was the life of Pythagoras, which Holſtenius has publiſhed, but imperfect. The third contained the life of Socrates, of whom he ſpeaks very contemptuouſly, having, as is ſuppoſed, compiled theſe lives with paſſages borrowed from the antients, and among the reſt from Ariſtoxenes, a declared enemy to Socrates (24). The reader will find, in the ſecond book of Stobæus, great part of a work done by Porphyrius on what it is in our power to do, and inſcribed by him to Chryſaores (25). The four books, which he wrote againſt eating of fleſh, and the Latin tranſlation of them by Bernardus Felicianus, are highly eſteemed by Holſtenius. Theſe books are addreſſed to Caſtricius Firmus, who had an eſtate at Minturnæ, in the neighbourhood of Rome, and greatly admired, or rather adored, both Plotinus and his favourite diſciple Porphyrius (26). Euſebius and Theodoret have made uſe of ſeveral paſſages in this work, in writing againſt the ſacrifices of the gentiles (27). As in this work Porphyrius condemned the ſacrifices, which the Jews were by their law commanded to offer to the true God, Diodorus, biſhop of Tarſus, undertook to confute him as to that particular. St. Auſtin often quotes a treatiſe of Porphyrius on the return of the ſoul to God (28), divided into ſeveral books. This is, without all doubt, the treatiſe on the ſoul, which is often cited by Euſebius, and was divided into five books, written by Porphyrius to confute Bœthius, a celebrated peripatetic in the time of Auguſtus (29). Porphyrius publiſhed another work on the faculties of the ſoul, out of which a long paſſage has been conveyed to us by Stobæus. Holſtenius has publiſhed ſeveral ſentences or ſayings of Porphyrius, which make up part of a treatiſe intituled, introduction to things intelligible. Euſebius and St. Auſtin make frequent mention of a letter from Porphyrius to one Anebon, an Egyptian prieſt or prophet, containing ſeveral queſtions touching the nature of demons, the oracles, and magic. This letter was anſwered by Iamblichus, under the famed name of Abammon (30). Euſebius and Stobæus quote ſeveral paſſages out of a book upon ſtatues, wherein Porphyrius is ſuppoſed to have excuſed, in the beſt manner he could, the worſhip paid by the pagans to their idols (31). Cyrillus of Alexandria has tranſcribed ſome paſſages out of another book of his, inſcribed to Nemercus, upon Divine Providence. Euſebius and St. Auſtin ſpeak frequently of a treatiſe intituled, philoſophy founded upon oracles, in all likelihood the ſame work with that which Euſebius elſewhere ſtyles a collection of oracles. This work conſiſted at leaſt of three books (32). St. Auſtin is of opinion, that moſt of the oracles related by Porphyrius in that treatiſe were feigned by himſelf (33). He publiſhed, by the advice of Plotinus, a book againſt the heretics called gnoſtics, to ſhew, that a treatiſe on magic, which they peruſed and aſcribed to Zoroaſter, was a ſuppoſititious piece, and written by ſome of them (34). He publiſhed an incredible number of other books, which are mentioned by the antients, and have been long ſince entirely loſt. But none of his works have rendered him ſo famous as that which he wrote againſt the chriſtians, to whom he bore an irreconcileable hatred, and whoſe religion he endeavoured endeavoured to diſcredit with the blackeſt calumnies. He read with great attention the ſcriptures, not to ſeek the truth, but to find arms wherewithal to impugn it, ſays Theodoret (35). He pretended to have diſcovered in the ſacred books a great many contradictions, which were, it ſeems, the ſubject of his firſt book; for the whole work was divided into fifteen (36). He found the prophecies of Daniel ſo clearly and evidently fulfilled, that he employed great part of his twelfth book in endeavouring to ſhew, that the prophecies aſcribed to Daniel had been publiſhed under his name by one who lived in the time of Antiochus, and wrote when the things ſuppoſed to have been foretold, had already happened (37). As Porphyrius was a man of great learning and highly eſteemed by the pagans, many were by his writings diverted from embracing the chriſtian religion, which, however, triumphed in the end over this, as it had done over all its other enemies. The emperor Conſtantine, after he had embraced the chriſtian religion, publiſhed ſome ſevere edicts, either againſt the perſon of Porphyrius, if he was ſtill alive, which is not at all likely, or againſt his memory and writings, which he cauſed to be publicly burnt (38). Some authors think, that this puniſhment extended to all his writings; but Conſtantine's words need not be taken in ſo general a ſenſe (39). That prince, to ſhow his averſion to the Arians, ordered them to be called Porphyrians (40). The chriſtians did not fail to anſwer the ill-grounded calumnies and ſophiſtical reaſonings of their crafty and malicious enemy. The holy biſhop Methodius confuted him in a very learned piece, which he publiſhed before the perſecution of Diocleſian, in which he was crowned with martyrdom. Some are of opinion, that he wrote it during the perſecution (41); but we can hardly perſuade ourſelves, that he was then at leiſure to compoſe ſuch a long and elaborate work, the biſhops being, in times of perſecution, wholly taken up in relieving, comforting, and encouraging the diſtreſſed chriſtians under their care. Euſebius of Cæſarea, a man of great learning and erudition, publiſhed, ſoon after Methodius, an anſwer to the calumnies of Porphyrius in thirty books; and Apollinaris wrote the ſame number of books againſt him about ſixty years after Euſebius. But all theſe works, as well as that of Porphyrius, which they confuted, have been long ſince loſt. Julian the apoſtate borrowed from Porphyrius. what he wrote againſt the chriſtian religion; but he was fully anſwered by the pious and learned Cyrillus of Alexandria. St. Jerom, St. Auſtin, Euſebius, and Theodoret, make uſe of ſeveral paſſages out of Porphyrius, in confuting the calumnies of the pagans; for that implacable enemy enemy to the chriſtian religion, notwithſtanding all his hatred and malice, could not help uttering many things which redounded greatly to the honour of thoſe whom he intended to traduce and expoſe: hence the judicious obſervation of Theodoret, with which we ſhall cloſe this note; viz. "That as God obliged Ba-" laam to bleſs his people, whom he was come with a deſign to " curſe, ſo he turned the tongue of Porphyrius againſt himſelf, " and employed him as a means to deſtroy the falſhood which he " laboured to eſtabliſh (42)".

(19) Vit. Porphr. p. 46—49. (20) Euſeb. præp. Evang. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. (21) Porphyr. vit. p. 51, 52. (22) Idem, p. 54, 55. (23) Idem, p. 56. Eunap. p. 10. (24) Porphyr. vit. c. 7. p. 60. (25) Idem, p. 64.

(26) Idem ibid. (27) Idem ibid. (28) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. p. 5, &c. (29) Porph. vit. p. 71, 72. Euſeb. præp. Evang. l. iii. c. 34. (30) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. c. 11. p. 112. &c. Euſeb. ibid. l. xiv. c. 10. p 741. (31) Eutrop. p. 75. Euſeb. ibid. l. iii.c. 9. p. 100. (32) Porphyr. vit. p. 78. Jonſ. l. iii. c. 15. p. 289. (33) Aug. civ. Dei, l. xix. c. 23. p. 253. (34) Plot. vit. p. 10.

(35) Theodoret. de Græc. affect. l. vii. p. 588. (36) Euſeb. l. vi. c. 19. p. 219. Porphyr. vit. c. 10. p. 81. (37) Hier. in Dan. p. 567. (38) Socrat. l. i. c. 9. p. 32. (39) Idem ibid. (40) Idem ibid. (41) P. Pagi, p. 302.

(42) Theodor. de curand Græcor. affect. l. iii. p. 117.

CHAP. XXV.

The Roman hiſtory, from the reſignation of Dioclesian, to the removal of the imperial ſeat to Conſtantinople, by Conſtantine the Great.

Conſtantius and Galerius acknowledged emperors.

UPON the reſignation of Dioclesian and Maximian, the two Cæſars, Conſtantius and Galerius, were univerſally acknowledged emperors. Of the latter we have ſpoken above, and ſhall here give a ſuccinct account of the birth, education, preferments, and qualities of Conſtantius, the father of the great Conſtantine, to whom the chriſtian religion is ſo highly indebted. Conſtantius, ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions, Flavius Valerius Conſtantius (D), was the ſon of Eutropius, one of the chief lords of Dardania in Upper Mœſia, by Claudia, the daughter Extraction and preferments of Conſtantius.

(D) Conſtantius is ſometimes called Julius by Aurelius Victor, to diſtinguiſh him from the other emperors of the ſame name (43). He probably aſſumed the name of Valerius, when he was adopted by Maximian, who had borrowed it of Dioclesian. As for that of Flavius, it was, according to ſome authors (44), peculiar to the family of the emperor Claudius II. whoſe great nephew he was. In ſome inſcriptions, Conſtantius is falſly ſtyled the grandſon of Claudius; and in one, Conſtantine is called the grandſon of Claudius, and the ſon of Conſtantius (45).

(43) Aur. Vict. p. 524. (44) Vide Salmaſ. in Claud. p. 331. (45) Gruter p. 283.

ter of Criſpus, brother to the emperor Claudius [r]; ſo that he was not, as ſome have ſtyled him, grandſon [s], but great nephew, to that prince. He is commonly diſtinguiſhed from other emperors of the ſame name by the ſurname of Chlorus, borrowed perhaps from the paleneſs of his countenance, for ſuch is the import of that word in the Greek tongue. He was born, according to ſome writers [t], on the thirty-firſt of March, of what year we know not, being only told, that at the time of his death, which happened in 306, he was, or at leaſt ſeemed to be, very old [u]. In his perſon he was well ſhaped; and in his aſpect there was ſomething extremely gracious and pleaſing [w]. He was not ſo well verſed in letters as in the military art, which he learnt under two great warriors, Aurelian and Probus [x]. An antient anonymous writer tells us, that he ſerved ſome time in the guards, was afterwards made tribune, and at length appointed governor of Dalmatia. He ſignalized himſelf in war, and gained a great victory over the Alemans in Campis Vindonis, that is, in the neighbourhood of Windiſch, at preſent a ſmall village in the canton of Bern, the ſame year that Conſtantine was born, that is, in 274 [z]. He was made governor of Dalmatia in the year 282, or 283, by Carus, who had even ſome thoughts of creating him Cæſar, in the room of his debauched and wicked ſon Carinus, whom he deſigned to depoſe [a]. Diocleſian, judging him well qualified for the ſovereignty, agreed with Maximian to create him Cæſar, together with Galerius, on the firſt of March of the year 292, as we have related above. He received the purple at the hands of Maximian, who by that ceremony adopted him; and hence he is ſometimes called by the name of Hercules [b], which Maximian had aſſumed. He took place of Galerius, though created Cæſar at the ſame time, on account of his more noble extraction [c]. Upon his being made Cæſar, Gaul, Spain, and Britain fell to his ſhare. We have related, in the foregoing reign, the exploits he performed in Gaul and Britain, while he was only Cæſar. When he attained to the empire, he governed the ſame provinces with ſuch juſtice, equity, equity, and moderation, as gained him the hearts of his people, and made them look upon him rather as their common father, than their ſovereign. He is extolled, not only by Euſebius and Lactantius, whoſe teſtimony might be ſuſpected, but by all the pagan writers, as the moſt equitable, pious, prudent, humane, and generous prince, that ever ſwayed a ſceptre [d]. He was not ſolicitous, ſays Eutropius [e], about enriching the exchequer, but pleaſed that his people ſhould enjoy the fruit of their labour and induſtry. He was often heard to ſay, it was better the wealth of a country ſhould circulate among the people, than be locked up in the coffers of the prince. For fear of loading his people, he was extremely ſparing in his diet, furniture, equipage, and retinue. When he entertained his friends, and the officers of his court, he was obliged to borrow plate for the uſe of his table. What Eutropius writes is confirmed by Euſebius, who relates the following remarkable ſtory, paſſing over in ſilence, ſays he, many others no leſs remarkable, but generally known: As the moderation and mildneſs with which Conſtantius governed were every-where mightily applauded, and it was generally ſaid, that he had no money by him, being unwilling to raiſe any upon his people, Diocleſian ſent perſons on purpoſe to reproach him with his neglect of the public, and the poverty to which he was reduced by his own fault. Conſtantius heard theſe reproaches with patience; and having perſuaded thoſe, who made them in Diocleſian's name, to ſtay a few days with him, he ſent word to the moſt wealthy perſons in the provinces, that he wanted money, and that they had now an opportunity of ſhewing whether or no they truly loved their prince. Upon this notice, every one ſtrove who ſhould be foremoſt in carrying to the exchequer all their gold, ſilver, and valuable effects; ſo that in a ſhort time Conſtantius, from the pooreſt, became by far the moſt wealthy, of all the four princes. He then invited the deputies of Diocleſian to viſit his treaſury, deſiring them to make a faithful report to their maſter of the ſtate in which they ſhould find it. They obeyed; and while they ſtood gazing on the mighty heaps of gold and ſilver, Conſtantius told them, that the wealth, which they beheld with aſtoniſhment, had long ſince belonged to him; but that he had left it, by way of depoſitum, in the hands of his people; adding, That the richeſt and ſureſt treaſure of the prince was the love of his ſubjects. The deputies puties were no ſooner gone, than the generous prince ſent for thoſe who had aſſiſted him in this exigency, commended their zeal, and returned to every one what they had ſo readily brought into his treaſure [f]. Suidas writes, that, for his contempt of riches and grandeur, he was ſurnamed the poor [g]. Libanius too extols his tender and paternal regard for the people, who were bleſſed with ſo good a prince; and adds, No prince ever loved money leſs; no prince was ever more loved by his ſubjects [h]. Euſebius frequently commends the piety of Conſtantius; and not only tells us, that he was inclined to the true religion, but that he acknowledged only one God, the Supreme Being; that he had honoured him all his life, and conſecrated to him his whole houſe, and condemned the many gods adored by the impious [i]. This is in a manner telling us, that he was a chriſtian; and nevertheleſs, neither Euſebius, nor any other writer, affirms that, at leaſt in expreſs terms; nay, it appears from Euſebius, that he eſteemed and countenanced, but never profeſſed, the chriſtian religion. When Diocleſian, in the year 303, at the inſtigation of Galerius, began to perſecute the church, he ſent his bloody edicts to Maximian and Conſtantius, enjoining both to ſee them put in execution in their reſpective provinces. Maximian obeyed with great readineſs and joy; and Conſtantius, that he might not ſeem to oppoſe his collegues, ſuffered ſome churches to be pulled down; but was ſo far from encouraging that, or any other violence, that, on the contrary, he preſerved the chriſtians in his provinces exempt from all the evils which they ſuffered in thoſe of the others; inſomuch, that the church enjoyed under him a profound tranquillity and entire liberty of worſhip [k]. Euſebius relates of him the following memorable action: While his collegues, ſays he, were perſecuting the chriſtians with fire and ſword, he politically pretended to perſecute them too; and declared to ſuch officers of his houſhold and governors of provinces, as were chriſtians, that he left it to their choice either to ſacrifice to the gods, and by that means maintain themſelves in their employments, or to forfeit their places and his favour, by continuing ſteady in their religion. When they had all declared, the emperor diſcovered his real ſentiments, reproached

[r] Zonar. vit. Dio. p. 243. Ammian. anonym. p. 471. Spon. p. 193. Claud. vit. not. Salmaſ. p. 331. [s] Byzantinor. familiæ, p. 43. [t] Bucher. de cycl. p. 276. [u] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 18. [w] Paneg. 5. p. 126. & 9. p. 192. [x] Aur. Vict. p. 524. Prob. vit. p. 241. [y] Anonym. Ammiano ſubjunctus, p. 471. [z] Paneg. 9. p. 192. [a] Car. vit. p. 235. [b] Paneg. 4. p. 115. [c] Lact perſ. c. 20, p. 18.

His excellent qualities.

An inſtance of the affections of the people to him.

[d] Panegyr. 5. p. 126. 6. p. 136, 137. 9. p. 192, 219. [e] Eutrop. p. 587.

His piety.

He favours the chriſtians.

in

[f] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 13, 17. p 309, 317. & vit. Conſtan. l. i. c. 13. p. 414. [g] Suid. π. p. 466. [h] Liban. orat. 3. p. 104. [i] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 13. & hiſt. l. viii. c. 13. p. 309. [k] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 13, 18. p. 309, 317. & Conſt. vit. l. i. c. 13. p. 413. Optat. mil. l. i. p. 44. Lact. c. 15. p. 13.

in moſt bitter terms thoſe who had renounced their religion, highly extolled the virtue and conſtancy of ſuch as had deſpiſed the wealth and vanities of the world, diſmiſſed with ignominy the former, ſaying, That thoſe who had betrayed their God, would not ſcruple to betray their prince; and retaining the latter, truſted them with the guard of his perſon, and the whole management of public affairs, as perſons on whoſe fidelity he could depend, and in whom he might repoſe an entire confidence [l]. Thus he filled his palace, continues Euſebius, with the pious adorers of the true God, while the other princes exerted all their power to extirpate the chriſtian name; nay, many miniſters of God daily offered up prayers and vows for the happineſs and preſervation of ſo good a prince in his very palace, which ſeemed rather a church, or oratory, than the habitation of an emperor [m]. Tho' Conſtantius thus countenanced and honoured the chriſtians, yet he never embraced himſelf, which is altogether ſurpriſing, the true religion; at leaſt we are no-where told, that he did.

His iſſue.

By his firſt wife, Helena, he had but one child, viz. Conſtantine, ſurnamed the Great, of whom, as well as of his mother, we ſhall ſpeak anon. He was obliged, in the year 292, to divorce her, and marry Flavia Maximiana Theodora, daughter to the wife of Maximian, by a former huſband. He had by her three ſons, Dalmatius or Dematius, Julius Conſtantius, and a third, named by ſome Annibalianus, and by others Conſtantine; and as many daughters, viz. Conſtantia, Anaſtatia, and Eutropia [n]. Dalmatius, who was honoured with the cenſorſhip, died before Conſtantine, and left two ſons, viz. Dalmatius the younger, who, after having been conſul in 333, with Zenophilus, was created Cæſar on the eighteenth or twenty-fourth of September in 335, and Annibalianus, king of Pontus and Armenia. Julius Conſtantius was conſul with Albinus in 335, and killed with one of his brothers ſoon after the death of Conſtantine the Great. He had by his firſt wife Galla, Gallus Cæſar, and another ſon, whoſe name is unknown; and by his ſecond wife, Baſilina, Julian, ſurnamed the apoſtate. Valeſius, who calls the third ſon Conſtantine, takes him to have been conſul in 327, with Maximus, whoſe collegue is ſtyled in the faſti Conſtantine. As to Conſtantius's three daughters; Conſtantia, ſtyled on the antient coins Fl. Valeria Conſtantia, was married married to Licinius in 313. Anaſtatia married Baſſianus, who, at the inſtigation of Licinius, betrayed Conſtantine in 314, though he had then ſome thoughts of creating him Cæſar. Eutropia was mother to Nepotianus, who uſurped the empire in 350, and is ſuppoſed to have been married to Nepotianus, who was conſul in 301.

[l] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 15. p. 415. [m] Idem ibid. c. 17. p. 416. [n] Aur. Vict. epit. p. 524. Eutrop. p. 586. Ammian. p. 2. Byzan. famil. p. 44. Goltz. p. 125.

BEFORE we proceed to the hiſtory of the reign of Conſtantius, it will be neceſſary to give the reader a ſuccinct account of the birth, education, and extraordinary qualities of his ſon Conſtantine, whoſe actions are inſeparably interwoven with thoſe of his father. Conſtantine, ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions, C. Flavius Valerius Aurelius Claudius Conſtantinus [o], was born on the twenty-ſeventh of February, about the year 274, for at his death, which happened on the twenty-ſecond of May in 337, he was about ſixty-four [p]. As for the place of his nativity, the anonymous writer of his life, publiſhed in 1636, by Henricus Valeſius, and ſubjoined to the fifteen books of Ammianus Marcellinus, Stephanus the geographer [q], Julius Firmicus [r], who according to the beſt-grounded opinion, wrote in the reign of Conſtantine, and Cedrenus [s], tell us in expreſs terms, that Conſtantine was born in the city of Naiſſus in Dardania, called alſo Naiſus and Naſſus, and now known by the name of Niſſa. It is certain, that the father and anceſtors of Conſtantine were natives of Dardania; that Conſtantine himſelf frequently reſided at Naiſſus, as appears from the many laws which he enacted there; and that he ever ſhewed himſelf partial to that city, enriching it with many privileges, and embelliſhing it with a great number of ſtately edifices; whence it is ſtyled by Stephanus, the birth-place and work of the emperor Conſtantine [t]. However, moſt modern writers of all nations, not excepting ſuch as are moſt jealous of the glory of ours, do us the honour to acknowledge this great emperor, this deliverer of the church, as Euſebius ſtyles him, a native of Britain, ſome of them ſuppoſing him to have been born in the city of Colcheſter, where Coellus the father of Helena, reigned; others in York, where the Roman governors uſually reſided. We heartily wiſh an opinion, which reflects ſo much glory on our iſland, were better grounded. But to ſpeak our ſentiments, unbiaſſed by any national prejudice or partiality, though we have had from abroad,

The birth, education, and extraordinary qualities of his ſon Conſtantine.

The birth-place of Conſtantine.

Whether born in Britain.

[o] Goltz. p. 126, 127. [p] Buch. cycl. p. 276. Byzant. fam. p. 214. Lact. p. 411, 412. Anonym. p. 471. [q] Steph. in Naiſo. [r] Jul. Fir. matheſ. l. i. c. ult. [s] Cedren. hiſt. p. 221. [t] Steph. ibid.

abroad, and peruſed with great attention, the elaborate work, publiſhed at Antwerp in 1641, by the learned jeſuit father Alford on this ſubject, under the title of Britannia Illuſtrata, yet we cannot ſay, that his arguments weigh down with us the above-mentioned authorities. The moderns have been led into this opinion by a paſſage in the panegyric pronounced before Conſtantine, wherein the orator, addreſſing the emperor, told him, that he had enobled Britain, illic oriendo, which words equally import by being born there, and by being there made emperor. In the latter ſenſe they are underſtood by Lipſius [u], and Livineius in his comments on thoſe antient panegyriſts; but by father Alford and above ſeventy other authors of different nations, whom he quotes, in the former [w]; nay, both he and Baronius [x] think the above-mentioned words can admit of no other ſenſe; for Conſtantine, ſay they, was made Cæſar at Rome, and emperor at Treves. But that he was created Cæſar in Britain; that he was there firſt ſaluted Auguſtus; and conſequently, that the words of the panegyriſt may, and perhaps ought to, be underſtood in the ſenſe of Lipſius and Livineius, will evidently appear in the ſequel of this hiſtory from Libanius, Euſebius, the emperor Julian, Lactantius, and Eumenius, whom we ſhall quote hereafter. Aldhelmus, who flouriſhed in the ſeventh century, was the firſt who wrote in expreſs terms, that Conſtantine was born in Britain [y]: thoſe who came after copied from him, and, as it generally happens, from one another; by which means that opinion univerſally prevailed. Aldhelmus probably held it upon the authority of ſome tradition, or was perſuaded by the ambiguous paſſage of the above-mentioned panegyriſt. Euſebius, who relates the moſt minute particulars of the life of Conſtantine, never once mentions, which is very ſurpriſing, the place of his nativity.

CONSTANTIUS had Conſtantine by the celebrated Helena, ſo much extolled, and not undeſervedly, by all the chriſtian, eſpecially the eccleſiaſtic, writers. Moſt modern authors, whether natives of this iſland, or foreigners, ſuppoſe her to have been the daughter of Coellus, a Britiſh king, and to have married Conſtantius, who was charmed with her beauty, when he firſt came into Britain, in the reign of Aurelian. But this opinion is no better grounded, than the former relating to Whether his mother Helena was born in Britain.

[u] Lipſ de mag. Rom. l. iv. c. ult. [w] Vide Alford. Britan. illuſtrat. p. 140—155. [x] Baron. ad. ann. 306. [y] Bucher. de Belg. l. 6. c. 15. Aldhelm. de laude virg. c. 23.

to the birth-place of Conſtantine, there being a profound ſilence among the antients, if we except Nicephorus, with reſpect to the country of this pious, as Euſebius ſtyles her, and venerable princeſs. As for Nicephorus, he gravely tells us, that Helena was the daughter of an inn-keeper at Drepanum near Nicomedia in Bithynia; that Conſtantius, being ſeized with a luſtful deſire, while he lodged in her father's houſe, as he paſſed through that place upon an embaſſy to the king of Perſia, acquainted therewith his landlord, who, to oblige the Roman embaſſador, offered him his daughter, a virgin in the flower of her age and of extraordinary beauty; that Conſtantius, terrified that night with a dream, in which he ſaw the ſun riſing out of the weſtern ocean, exhorted his landlord next morning to preſerve his daughter from any further pollution, and earneſtly recommended to him the child ſhe ſhould bring forth; that ſome time after, other Roman embaſſadors, who happened to lodge in the ſame houſe, chiding young Conſtantine, the fruit of that amour, and the child highly reſenting that freedom, the mother informed them whoſe ſon he was, and at the ſame time ſhewed them a purple robe, the gift of Conſtantius. The embaſſadors, upon their return to Italy, acquainted Conſtantius with what had paſſed, who thereupon ordered Conſtantine and his mother to repair to Rome; but afterwards, not thinking them ſafe there, on account of the jealous temper of his lawful wife Theodora, he ſent Conſtantine to Nicomedia, to be brought up in the court of Diocleſian, where he was inſtructed in the ſciences, and the truths of the chriſtian religion, which he embraced [z]. Nicephorus's account.

Such is the account Nicephorus gives us of the condition of Helena, of the birth and education of Conſtantine; an account which contains, we may ſay without exaggeration, as many notorious blunders as periods. But we ſhall for the preſent only take notice of two; the one in point of chronology, the other of hiſtory; which, with every judicious reader, will be a ſufficient apology for our rejecting, as altogether fabulous, the narration of that hiſtorian, though highly applauded by Lipſius [a], and adopted by ſome modern writers of no mean character. To begin with the enormous anachroniſm contained in that account, it is evident from all the antients, that Conſtantine, at the time of his father's pretended embaſſy to the king of Perſia, was twenty-nine, or at False and inconſiſtent with hiſtory and chronology.

[z] Niceph. l. vii. c. 17, 18.

[a] Lipſ. de magnit. Rom. l. iv. c. 11.

at leaſt twenty-ſeven, years old. For Conſtantius was ſent into Perſia, according to Nicephorus [b], after Diocleſian had begun to perſecute the chriſtians; but his firſt edicts againſt them were publiſhed, as we read in Euſebius [c], who lived at that time, on the twenty-third of February, in the nineteenth year of his reign, that is, according to all chronologers both antient and modern, in the 303d of the chriſtian æra. On the other hand, Euſebius [d], Epiphanius [e], St. Jerom [f], Victor [g], Nicephorus Conſtantinopolitanus [h], &c. agree, that Conſtantine died in 337, being then ſixty-four, or, as ſome will have it, ſixty-two; ſo that he muſt have been born in 274, or 272, and conſequently was, at the time of his father's ſuppoſed embaſſy, twenty-nine or twenty-ſeven years old. Beſides, Conſtantine himſelf, in his oration annexed to the works of Euſebius, tells us, that he was with Diocleſian in the palace at Nicomedia, when the memorable fire broke out there, of which we have ſpoken above; and that accident happened, according to Euſebius [i], a few days after the publiſhing of the firſt edicts againſt the chriſtians. 'Tis amaſing, that Lipſius ſhould, with other chronologers, ſuppoſe Conſtantine to have been born about the year 272, and yet admit, as an unqueſtionable truth, the fable of Nicephorus, which utterly deſtroys that ſuppoſition. As to the Greek hiſtorian's miſtake in point of hiſtory, he tells us, that the Perſians having made an irruption into the Roman dominions, and threatening the empire with a deſtructive war, Conſtantius was ſent with the character of embaſſador, to try whether he could, by any means, even by the offer of a penſion to be paid yearly to the Perſian king, prevail upon him to deſiſt from hoſtilities, and conclude a peace with the Roman emperors [k]. Now it is evident from Eutropius [l], Euſebius [m], Ammianus Marcellinus, [n], Zonaras [o], Aurelius Victor [p], Feſtus [q], Lactantius [r], &c. that the Perſians had, at leaſt ſix years before the time of this pretended embaſſy, been utterly overthrown by Galerius, and had purchaſed a peace of Diocleſian, by yielding up to him five provinces, as we have related above.

[b] Niceph. ibid. [c] Euſeb. vit. l. viii. c. 7. [d] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iv. c. 53. [e] Epiphan. lib. de menſ. [f] Hier. in chron. [g] Vict. in Conſt. [h] Niceph Conſt. in chronol. c. 12. [i] Euſeb. l. viii. c 7 p. 292. [k] Niceph. ibid. [l] Eutrop. p. 586. [m] Euſeb. p. 170. [n] Ammian. p 109. [o] Zonar. p. 144. [p] Aur. Vict. p. 526. [q] Feſtus, p. 954. [r] Lactan. perſ. c. 9. p. 9.

above. This peace laſted, as the ſame writers aſſure us, for the ſpace of forty years, that is, till the year 337, the laſt of Conſtantine's long reign. But after all, we muſt not imagine Nicephorus to have been the only writer who queſtioned the legitimacy of Conſtantine, and chaſtity of his mother Helena. For Zoſimus writes, that ſhe was not Conſtantius's lawful wife [s]. The chronicle of Alexandria calls her ſon Conſtantine, in plain terms, a baſtard child [t]. St. Ambroſe gives us room to think, that this was a current report or tradition in his time; and that he himſelf did not diſbelieve it [u]. The ſame thing is aſſerted in the Greek text of Euſebius's chronicle, publiſhed by Scaliger; and in that of St. Jerom, who has been followed by ſeveral eminent writers of a later date, namely, by Proſper, Caſſiodorus, Aldhelmus, biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, and the venerable Bede, who, ſpeaking of Helena, ſtyle her the concubine of Conſtantius. On the other hand, Eutropius [w] and both the Victors [x] tell us, that Conſtantius and Galerius were obliged, when created Cæſars, to divorce their former wives. Conſtantius therefore had a lawful wife before he married Theodora; and we are nowhere told, that he had any beſides her and Helena. Scaliger indeed pretends, that he was married to Minervina, the mother of Criſpus, not appriſed, that Criſpus was Conſtantine's ſon, and not his brother; a pretty conſiderable miſtake in a critic. The anonymous author of Conſtantine's life, publiſhed by Valeſius, writes in expreſs terms, that Conſtantius divorced Helena to marry Theodora [y]; and Eutropius, that Conſtantine was the fruit of an obſcure, but lawful, matrimony [z]. At Naples is ſtill extant an inſcription, in which Helena is ſtyled the wife of Conſtantius [a]. In two others, to be ſeen in Gruter, ſhe is diſtinguiſhed with the title of Auguſta, which was never given, as is well known, to a concubine. The antient panegyriſts ſupply us with preſumptions, of equal ſtrength with theſe authorities, in favour of Helena's marriage with Conſtantius. One of them [b], in an oration which he pronounced before Conſtantine on occaſion of his marriage, addreſſes him thus: "You, O Conſtantine, make it your "ſtudy to imitate the continence of your father; treading "in his footſteps, you prefer in your early youth the ties of "matrimony to an unreſtrained liberty, that you may not be Whether Helena was Conſtantius's lawful wife.

[s] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 672. [t] Chron. Al. p. 650. [u] Amb. div. 3. p. 123. [w] Eutrop. p. 586. [x] Aur. Vict. p. 524. Vict. epit. p. 542. [y] Anonym. p. 471. [z] Eutrop. p. 587. [a] Gruter. p. 1086. [b] Panegyr. 5. p. 126.

" tempted to abandon yourſelf to looſe and unlawful amours." How prepoſterous and unſeaſonable would this addreſs have ſeemed, had Conſtantine been the fruit of an unlawful amour? By ſuppoſing Helena to have been the concubine, and not the wife, of Conſtantius, we at once turn the panegyric into a ſatire. For what can it be called but a ſatire, to cry up the continence of the father before a ſon, whoſe very birth is a proof of his incontinence; and to commend the ſon thus unlawfully begotten for imitating the continence of his father? Helena is ſtyled, not only by the panegyriſts, but hiſtorians, a moſt pious, venerable, religious, and virtuous woman; which epithets they would have hardly beſtowed upon her, had ſhe been Conſtantius's concubine, and not his wife: neither would Conſtantine, we conceive, have dignified her with the title of Auguſta, had ſhe not been his lawful mother. The emperor Diocleſian ever diſtinguiſhed Conſtantine with particular marks of honour and eſteem, whereof Euſebius tells us, he himſelf was an eye-witneſs; for he ſaw young Conſtantine on the emperor's right-hand, as they paſſed together through Paleſtine, either going to, or returning from, Egypt. He cauſed him to be brought up in the court with great care, took him with him whitherſoever he went, and in the year 305, when two new Cæſars were to be created, named him in the firſt place, no one, ſays Eumenius, calling in queſtion the right which he had to that dignity, as the ſon of Conſtantius[c]. Euſebius, ſpeaking of his father Conſtantius, ſays, that at his death he left the empire to his ſon Conſtantine, whoſe birth-right it was[d]. Illegitimate children were not, as is well known, thus treated and reſpected among the Romans. Galerius is ſaid to have alledged ſeveral reaſons to divert Diocleſian from naming Conſtantine to the dignity of Cæſar[e]; but among theſe we do not find the leaſt mention made of his birth, which, had it been unlawful, would have furniſhed him with a ſtronger and far more plauſible reaſon, than any he produced. Nay, we can by no means imagine, that Diocleſian would have ever thought of preferring Conſtantine, had he only been Conſtantius's natural ſon, to that prince's lawful children by Theodora, for whom both he and his colegue Maximian had cogent motives to intereſt themſelves. Theſe arguments are of ſuch weight with us, that, notwithſtanding the above-mentioned authorities, we cannot entertain tain the leaſt doubt of Conſtantine's legitimacy, unbiaſſed as we are by any prejudice or partiality with reſpect either to him or his mother Helena. As for Helena's country and parentage, no writer before the ſeventh century mentions either: thoſe who flouriſhed after that time commonly ſuppoſe her to have been a native of this iſland, and the daughter of a king, whom they call Coelus or Coellus. This opinion, grounded, as we conjecture, upon tradition, or perhaps the authority of ſome hiſtorian, whoſe works have not reached our times, obtained pretty early here, and produced the many churches and monuments which were erected throughout Britain to her honour.

[c] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. c. 15. p. 601. [d] Panegyr. 9. p. 191, 192. [e] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. 1. c. 19. p. 417. [f] Lact. perſ. c. 18. p. 16.

Helena's country and parentage.

BUT to return to Conſtantine. When his father was created Cæſar in 292, and ſent into Gaul, Diocleſian kept him as an hoſtage, cauſed him to be brought up in the court with great care, and raiſed him, long before the year 303, to the rank of a tribune [g]. He already appeared capable of any degree of fortune, however elevated. The lovelineſs of his countenance, blended with a certain air of majeſty; the tallneſs of his perſon, extremely well ſhaped and regular; his life without blame or reproach; his generoſity, good-nature, affability, and obliging behaviour, towards perſons of all ranks, gained him the affections both of the people and ſoldiery to ſuch a degree, that no one knew him, who did not wiſh to ſee him one day emperor, and was not ready to contribute, ſo far as lay in his power, to his preferment [h]. The anonymous writer of his life ſays, that he had no great learning: and truly learning could not then be much in requeſt, ſince none of the four princes who governed were men of letters. However, both Euſebius [k] and Aurelius Victor [l] aſſure us, that Conſtantine was well verſed in moſt branches of literature; that he was a generous encourager of learning; that after he was raiſed to the empire, he ſpent much of his time in reading; that he compoſed, and pronounced in public, ſeveral orations; and that the many laws which he publiſhed, were all drawn up by himſelf. One of his orations has reached us, and is ſubjoined to the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of Euſebius [m]. But he chiefly ſignalized himſelf in war, and ſerved with great reputation under Diocleſian and Galerius, in their wars with the Germans, Goths, Sarmatians, and

Conſtantine's excellent qualities

His courage and valour.

[g] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 12. p. 415. Lact. perſ. c. 18. p. 17. [h] Euſeb. ibid. l. i. c. 19. p. 417. Panegyr. 5. p. 125. [i] Anonym. p. 471. [k] Euſeb. ibid. p. 418. [l] Aur. Vict. p. 524. [m] Orat. Conſt. ad ſanctor. cœtum. p. 567.

and Perſians [n]. He often grappled with the enemy hand to hand [o], and gave ſuch proofs of his valour as raiſed ſome jealouſy in the other princes [p]. All authors, pagans as well as chriſtians, agree in extolling, with the higheſt encomiums, his ſobriety, continence, and the abhorrence he ſhewed from his early youth to unlawful pleaſures [q]. He never violated the laws of chaſtity, ſays an antient panegyriſt; but ſubjected himſelf, when yet a youth, to the ties of matrimony, that he might not be tempted to ſully himſelf with any kind of lewdneſs or impurity. He married to his firſt wife Minervina, of whoſe parentage and condition no mention is made by the antients; and had by her Criſpus, who muſt have been born about the year 300, for, twenty years after, he ſignalized himſelf in the wars againſt the Franks and Licinius. Dioclefian, before he reſigned the empire, was for appointing Conſtantine and Maxentius, the ſon of Maximian, Cæſars. But their election was oppoſed by Galerius, who at length prevailed upon the emperor to name in their room Severus and Maximinus, who he knew would be entirely ruled by him, and blindly obey his orders. The former was a native of Illyricum, deſcended of an obſcure family, abandoned to all manner of vices, and in every reſpect unequal to ſo great a charge. The latter was born in the ſame country, and no leſs meanly than the other; for tho' he was nephew to Galerius, being his ſiſter's ſon, yet in his youth he had followed the mean calling of a ſhepherd; and he proved, after his preferment, no leſs vicious than his collegue. He was yet a youth, and half barbarian, unknown to the emperors, and quite unacquainted with ſtate affairs, when Galerius, who had taken him a little before from his flocks, named him to Dioclefian for the dignity of Cæſar [r]. The emperor, terrified with the menaces of Galerius, conſented, much againſt his will, to the promotion both of Severus and Maximinus; and on the day appointed for his reſignation, after having declared in a great aſſembly, that he yielded the empire to Conſtantius and Galerius, who were more capable than he of bearing ſo great a weight, added, not without betraying ſome concern and reluctance, I am likewiſe to name two new Cæſars, and theſe are Severus and Maximinus. The whole aſſembly was greatly ſurpriſed to hear theſe two names,

His ſingular continence.

Severus and Maximinus declared Cæſars.

[n] Euſeb. ibid. p. 589. [o] Theoph. p. 6. [p] Euſeb. ibid. p. 413. [q] Euſeb ibid. Panegyr. 7. p. 175. & 5. p. 126 [r] Panegyr 6. p. 137. [s] Lact. perſ. c. 18. p. 17. Aur. Vict. p. 525. Euſeb. l. ix. c. 9.

names, and began to aſk one another whether Conſtantine had changed his? Their ſurprize was doubled, when they heard Galerius command Conſtantine to deſcend from the throne on which he ſat with Diocleſian; and ſaw unexpectedly a young barbarian, who ſtood behind it, ſtep forth and receive the purple at the hands of the emperor. The numerous multitude was ſtruck with amazement; every one aſked, who Maximin was? whence he came? for what demerit Conſtantine had been excluded from a poſt, to which he had ſo juſt a claim? but no one dared to oppoſe his promotion [t]. This happened at Nicomedia; and on the ſame day, that is, on the firſt of May of the year 305, Maximian reſigned the empire at Milan to Conſtantius, and declared Severus Cæſar. Galerius excluded Conſtantine, with a view of becoming ſoon ſole maſter of the empire; for he was well appriſed, that Conſtantius, who was ſubject to many infirmities, and quite worn out, could not live long; and beſides, he hoped eaſily to get the aſcendant over him, on account of his mild and peaceable temper. But he dreaded Conſtantine, on account of his courage, his experience in war, his addreſs, and other extraordinary qualities; and therefore reſolved to keep him in a private condition, and allow him no ſhare in the government, that it might not be in the young prince's power to defeat his vaſt deſigns [u]. As for the two new Cæſars, he looked upon them as his own creatures, and perſons to be governed in every thing by him. Matters being thus ſettled, the empire was divided between Conſtantius and Galerius. To the ſhare of the former fell Gaul, Italy, Africa, Spain, and Britain; the latter had Illyricum, Pannonia, Thrace, Macedon, Greece, Aſia Minor, Egypt, Judæa, Syria, and all the eaſtern provinces. Conſtantius yielded to Severus, Italy and Africa, as did Galerius, Syria and Egypt, to his nephew Maximin [w]. Severus, who was created Cæſar, to govern under Conſtantius, is always named before Maximin, who governed under Galerius [x]. As Severus was indebted to Galerius alone for his promotion, that prince expected he ſhould obey him even againſt Conſtantius himſelf [y]. However, it is certain, that notwithſtanding the implacable hatred which Galerius had to the chriſtians, the perſecution ceaſed both in Italy and the other weſtern provinces, ſoon after

The empire divided between Conſtantius and Galerius.

[t] Lact. perſ. c. 19. p. 17, 18. [u] Lact. c. 18. p. 17.
[w] Eutrop. p. 587. Aur. Vict. p. 525. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 672.
[x] Vide Spon. p. 192. [y] Lact. perſ. c. 18, 20. p. 17—19.

after Conſtantius was declared emperor [z]. In the mean time, Conſtantine continued at Nicomedia, in the heart of the provinces belonging to Galerius, who would not, though earneſtly entreated by his father Conſtantius, during a dangerous malady, with which he was ſeized, ſuffer him to depart; but pretending a great affection to him, kept him by way of hoſtage [a]. Victor the younger tells us, that he kept him with him at Rome [b]; but it is certain, that Galerius never came to that city [c]. As the extraordinary qualities of that prince gave the emperor great umbrage, he only waited ſome opportunity of deſtroying him; but not daring, through fear of the ſoldiery by whom Conſtantine was greatly beloved, to make any open attempt, he had recourſe to treachery, and expoſed him, under various ſpecious pretences, to many dangers; from which he was happily delivered by the watchful providence of God, whoſe church he was to deliver from the perſecution, with which it had been cruelly oppreſſed for the ſpace of near three hundred years. Praxogoras, a pagan author, who compiled in two books the hiſtory of the firſt emperors, and wrote, according to Voſſius, in the time of Conſtantine, or his children, tells us, that Galerius often encouraged him to enter the liſts with wild beaſts, on which occaſion he once killed a lion of extraordinary fierceneſs and ſize [d]. The ſame thing is related by Zonaras, who adds, that Galerius, in the Sarmatian war, obſerving one of the chiefs of the barbarians, who ſurpaſſed all the others in ſtature and the fierceneſs of his looks, ordered Conſtantine to engage him, which he did accordingly with great reſolution and intrepidity, overcame him, and throwing him to the ground, dragged him by the hair to the emperor's preſence, and laid him at his feet [e]. On another occaſion, Galerius, who ſought his deſtruction, having ordered him to croſs a marſh at the head of ſome troops, he entered it the firſt on horſe-back; and being followed by his men, put great numbers of the enemy to the ſword, and gained a complete victory [f]. This too happened in Galerius's war with the Sarmatians, which we muſt place in this, or in the beginning of the next, year.

Galerius ſeeks the deſtruction of Conſtantine.

THE following year, Conſtantius and Galerius being both conſuls the ſixth time, the latter, finding he could no longer detain Conſtantine without openly breaking with his collegue, gave gave him at length leave to depart, and ſigned a warrant for the officers of the poſt to ſupply him with the neceſſary horſes and chariots. This warrant he delivered to him in the evening; but at the ſame time ordered him not to make uſe of it till the next morning, when he deſigned to give him his final inſtructions [g]. In the mean time, he diſpatched an expreſs to Severus, enjoining him, by all means, to ſtop Conſtantine, and prevent his arrival in the provinces governed by his father. That the expreſs might reach Italy before Conſtantine, he did not riſe that day, contrary to his cuſtom, till noon, when he ſent for Conſtantine. But he had ſet out the night before, as ſoon as Galerius had withdrawn; and travelling with all poſſible ſpeed, for ſeveral ſtages, hamſtringed or killed the horſes which he did not make uſe of, that no one might purſue or ſtop him while he croſſed the provinces of Galerius and Italy, where Severus ruled. This precaution ſaved him; for next morning, Galerius, being informed, that he had ſet out the night before, flew into a violent paſſion, and ordered ſeveral meſſengers to make what haſte they could after him; but he was told, that Conſtantine had diſabled all the poſt-horſes; which tranſported him to ſuch a degree, that, through grief and rage, he could ſcarce forbear burſting into tears [h]. Euſebius, Lactantius, and ſeveral hiſtorians, tell us, that Conſtantine, arriving in Britain, found his father at the point of death; but therein they muſt certainly be miſtaken, ſince Eumenius, in the panegyric which he pronounced before Conſtantine a few years after, writes, that he arrived while his father was weighing anchor with a deſign to paſs over into Britain [i]. With him agrees the anonymous writer, publiſhed by Valeſius, who ſays, that Conſtantine found his father at Geſſoriacum, or Boulogne [k]. He attended him into Britain, where he was going to make war, ſays Eumenius [l], upon the Caledonians and Picts. The latter people, now firſt mentioned in hiſtory, inhabited Scotland; but were thought, ſays Bede, to have come from Scythia, that is, according to the learned Uſher, from Scandinavia, or ſome other northern country [m]. Conſtantius, in the laſt days of his life, overcame the Picts, as the anonymous author quoted above informs us [n], being aſſiſted

[z] Euſeb. de martyr. Palæſtin. [a] Lact. perſ. p. 406. [b] Vict. p. 525. [c] Lact. perſ. c. 27. p. 25. [d] Phot. c. 67. p. 64. Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 17. [e] Zonar. vit. Dioclef. p. 246. [f] Ammian. Anonym. p. 471.

Conſtantine eſcapes from Galerius to his father.

Paſſes over with him into Britain where Conſtantius overcomes the Picts.

[g] Lact. c. 24. p. 22. Euſeb. Conſt. vit l. i. c. 20. [h] Euſeb. p. 418. Ammian. Anonym. p. 471. Lact. p. 21. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 672. Aur. Vict. p. 525. [i] Panegyr. 9. 194. [k] Ammian. Anonym. p. 472. [l] Panegyr. 9. p. 194. [m] Vide Uſſer Brit. eccleſ. antiquit. p. 581, 578, 579. [n] Anonym. p. 471.

aſſiſted in this war, as we read in Aurelius Victor [o], by Eroc, or, as others ſtyle him, Crocus, king of the Alemans.

The death of Conſtantius.

Not long after this victory over the Picts, he died at York on the twenty-fifth of July in 306, the fourth year of the perſecution of Dioclesian, according to St. Jerom [p]; and the ſixteenth, or rather fifteenth, of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæſar, that is, from the year 292, for he had enjoyed that dignity thirteen years and two months, and the empire one year, and near three months [q]. He died in his palace, ſurrounded by his children, and his body was with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence interred by his ſon Conſtantine. Some pretend, that he was buried at a place called Cäir Segeint, and by ſome Cäir Cuſteint, that is, the city of Conſtantius or Conſtantine [r]. In 1283, a body was found at a ſmall diſtance from that place, which Edward I. who reigned then, cauſed to be removed to a church, believing it to be the body of Conſtantius. This was not agreeable to the canons. Not long before, as ſome perſons were digging in a place at York, where Conſtantius was ſuppoſed to have been buried, they diſcovered a lamp that was ſtill burning [s]. After his death, he was ranked among the gods, as appears from ſeveral antient coins, and among the reſt from one of his brother-in-law Maxentius [t].

He bequeaths the empire to Conſtantine.

Conſtantius bequeathed the empire to his ſon Conſtantine [u], who declared he would not accept it without the conſent of the other princes, to whom he immediately wrote, acquainting them with the death and laſt will of his father. But the ſoldiers, by whom he was greatly beloved, impatient of delays, proclaimed him emperor the ſame day in which his father died, and, the firſt time he appeared in public, ſaluted him with the title of Auguſtus, and forced him to accept the purple, knowing him, ſays Zoſimus, a writer no-ways biaſſed in his favour, to be truly worthy of the empire, and promiſing themſelves great things from his generoſity *. Thus was Conſtantine firſt declared emperor in Britain, the ſame day in which his father died; that is, on the twenty-fifth of July of the year 306, which, in an antient calendar, is marked

Who is ſaluted Auguſtus by the ſoldiers.

[o] Vict. epit. p. 943. [p] Hier. chron. [q] Aur. Vict. p. 526. Euſeb. chron. Goltz. p. 124. Eutrop. p. 587. Panegyr. 9. p. 194. [r] Uſſer. eccleſ. Brit. antiq. p. 60. [s] Alford. ann. ad ann. 306. [t] Birag. p. 440. [u] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 21. p. 418. Julian. orat. 1. p. 13. Lact. perſ. c. 24. p. 21. Panegyr. 5. p. 127. & 9. p. 194. * Zoſ. l. ii. p. 671.

marked as the firſt day of his reign [w]. Lactantius tells us in expreſs terms, that, upon his father's death, he took the title of Auguſtus [x]; and Euſebius [y], that he performed his father's obſequies clad in purple; which is a plain proof, that he took in Britain, at leaſt the title of Cæſar, which, however, thoſe muſt deny, who maintain him to have been born in Britain, as we have obſerved above. He afterwards ſent his image to the other emperors, adorned, according to cuſtom, with the marks of the imperial dignity. Galerius was long in ſuſpenſe whether or no he ſhould receive it; nay, tranſported with rage, he was upon the point of condemning both the image, and the meſſenger who brought it, to the flames; but his friends remonſtrating, that ſuch an affront would give riſe to a civil war, in which the ſoldiery would in all likelihood abandon him, and ſide with Conſtantine, he was prevailed upon to receive his image, and to ſend him the purple, that he might at leaſt ſeem to hold his authority of him [z]. However, he gave him only the title of Cæſar, and created Severus emperor, whoſe provinces, viz. Italy and Africa, he governed with as abſolute a ſway as his own, oppreſſing them with endleſs taxes, and practiſing unheard-of cruelties upon ſuch as were not in a condition to comply with his unjuſt demands. This occaſioned great diſturbances in all the cities of Italy, but eſpecially in Rome; which Maxentius laying hold of, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor by the diſſatisfied ſoldiery and people. Maxentius was, or at leaſt paſſed for, the ſon of Maximian; for ſome writers tell us, that he was a ſuppoſititious child, and that his mother, before her death, owned ſhe had impoſed him upon her huſband to gain his affection. However that be, he was quite deſtitute of every commendable quality, proud, arrogant, cruel, ill-ſhaped, or rather deformed, in his perſon, abandoned to all manner of vices, and univerſally abhorred, not only by his father's friends, but by his father himſelf, and much more by Galerius, whoſe daughter he had married. He had highly complained of Galerius, for excluding him in the year 305, from the dignity of Cæſar; but when he heard that Conſtantine had been raiſed to that high ſtation, and ſaw his image publicly expoſed in Rome, tranſported with rage, he reſolved at all events to do himſelf juſtice; and accordingly, having with large promiſes

Galerius grants him only the title of Cæſar.

Maxentius cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor.

[w] Buch. cycl. p. 286. [x] Lact. perſ. c. 24, 25. p. 23. [y] Euſeb. Conſt. vit. l. i. c. 22. p. 409. [z] Lact. perſ. c. 25. p. 22. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 672.

miſes gained over the few prætorian guards that were then in Rome, and ſome of their officers, namely, Lucianus, Marcellus, and Marcellinus, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor on the twenty-eighth of October of this year 306, and was acknowledged as ſuch by the Roman people, who hoped, by his means, to deliver themſelves from the inſupportable tyranny of Galerius. The news of his revolt no ſooner reached the eaſt, where Galerius then was, than he diſpatched a meſſenger to Severus, enjoining him to haſten with all his forces to Rome, to ſurpriſe and ſuppreſs at once this new uſurper. On the other hand, Maxentius had recourſe to his father Maximian, who, either with a view to reſume the empire, which he had quitted much againſt his will, or to ſupport his ſon, haſtened to Rome, and thence wrote to Dioclefian, exhorting him to abandon his ſolitude, and remount the throne. Dioclefian, taken with the ſweets and tranquillity of a private and retired life, returned him the anſwer which we have related above. But Maximian, inſtead of following his example, ſuffered himſelf to be declared emperor a ſecond time by the ſenate and people of Rome; and receiving the purple at the hands of his ſon, was univerſally acknowledged for his collegue in the empire. Aurelius Victor writes, that his luſt of reigning, and deſire of ſupporting his ſon in his claim to the empire, prompted him to quit his ſolitude, and reſume the authority which he had unwillingly abdicated [b].

Maximian reſumes the empire.

While theſe things paſſed at Rome, Conſtantine was buſied in viſiting the provinces under his care, viz. Britain, Spain, and Gaul, and defending them againſt the barbarians. His father Conſtantius had no ſooner left Gaul, to make war upon the Picts in Britain, than the Franks, forgetful of their oaths, had invaded Gaul, and committed there dreadful ravages. Againſt them therefore Conſtantine marched at the head of a powerful army, overcame them in a pitched battle; and having taken two of their kings priſoners, Aſcaric and Gaiſus, or Regaiſus, he expoſed them to be devoured by the wild beaſts in the magnificent ſhews which he afterwards exhibited [c]. He thought himſelf obliged, ſays the panegyriſt [d], to renew the ſeverity of the antient Romans towards their captive kings, in order to reſtrain, with the fear of puniſhment, a perfidious people, who made no account count of the moſt ſacred ties that awed other nations. Eutropius writes, that he treated in like manner the kings of the Alemans, who, it ſeems, were in confederacy with the Franks, and fell into his hands in this war [e]. After this victory, he paſſed the Rhine, and entering the country of the Bructerians, when leaſt expected, made a dreadful havock of that people, and took a great many priſoners, whom he likewiſe condemned to be devoured by the wild beaſts [f]. He repaired all the forts on the Rhine, placed numerous garriſons in them, kept there a powerful fleet, and by that means ſtruck ſuch terror into the Franks and other German nations, that none of them dared to approach that river [g]. He even undertook to build a bridge over the Rhine [h], and accompliſhed, according to Baudrand [i], that great work; for he tells us, that it ſtood till the year 955, when it was broken down by biſhop Berno's orders. But Valeſius writes, that it was never finiſhed, ſuppoſing, we imagine, (for he alledges no proof in favour of his opinion) that ſuch a memorable work would have been more famous in hiſtory, had it ever been executed. Bucherius writes, that Conſtantine, to defend this bridge, built, or repaired, the caſtle of Druitz on the Rhine, over-againſt Cologn [l]. Be that as it will, Conſtantine, in memory of his victory over the Franks, appointed ſolemn ſports, called from them ludi Francici, to be annually celebrated from the fourteenth of July to the twentieth [m]. Notwithſtanding the ſeverity he exerted towards the enemy, Lactantius [n], and Euſebius [o] aſſure us, that he governed his ſubjects with extraordinary mildneſs and moderation; that to all he ſhewed himſelf kind, benevolent, and good-natured; that he made it his chief ſtudy to render thoſe happy who lived under his adminiſtration, &c.

The Franks break into Gaul, but are overcome by Conſtantine.

His ſeverity towards the captives.

[a] Vict. epit. p. 543. Lact. perſ. c. 18. p. 16, 17. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 672. Eutrop. p. 587. Euſeb. vit. Conſt. p. 498. Panegyr. 5. p. 131. [b] Aur. Vict. p 526. [c] Paneg. 9. p. 190, 197. 5. 127. 7. 163. [d] Idem, 5. p. 126.

The mildneſs of his government.

THE following year, Severus and Maximinus were created conſuls by Galerius, and acknowledged as ſuch in all the provinces of the empire, except thoſe that obeyed Maxentius, where Maximian cauſed himſelf to be declared conſul the ninth time. This is what we look upon as moſt probable; for the confuſion which appears this year 307, in the conſular tables, was the natural conſequence of that which prevailed in the empire. Conſtantine was likewiſe conſul this year, having, having, as we conjecture, been ſubſtituted in the room of Severus, who was killed before the year expired. Many writers, to avoid the confuſion occaſioned by ſuch a number of conſuls, have choſen to date this with the conſuls of the preceding year, whereof we have not yet had any inſtance, but ſhall have frequently in ſucceeding times. This year, Severus, in compliance with the orders he had received from Galerius, left Milan, and marched towards Rome, to drive from thence the uſurper Maxentius. He had with him a powerful army; but conſiſting of troops which two years before had belonged to Maximian, the father of Maxentius, they were eaſily gained over by the latter, and Anullinus, who commanded them in quality of captain of the guards. Hence Severus no ſooner approached Rome, with a deſign to beſiege it, than they abandoned him, and joined his rival. Hereupon Severus, with a ſmall body of troops that remained faithful to him, betook himſelf to flight, bending his rout towards Milan; but being cloſely purſued by Maximian, who met him at the head of ſome troops which he had raiſed in Campania, and was leading to Rome, he was obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Ravenna; which Maximian immediately inveſted. The place was well fortified, and ſupplied with great ſtore of proviſions; ſo that it might have eaſily held out till relieved by Galerius; but Severus, diſtruſting his own men, and relying upon the mighty promiſes and ſolemn oaths of Maximian, yielded up the place to him, and the purple with which he had been inveſted about a year and nine months before [p]. Maximian, unmindful of his oaths, carried him captive to Rome; and, after having kept him ſome time confined to a place on the Appian way, about thirty miles from the city, called Tres Tabernæ, or the Three Inns, he cauſed him to be there put to death. The only favour he could obtain was that of dying by having his veins opened. His body was interred in the tomb of Gallienus, about eight or nine miles from Rome [q]. He left a ſon behind him, named Severianus, who was put to death by Licinius in 313 [r]. Maximian, well appriſed, that Galerius would not ſuffer the death of Severus to paſs unrevenged, reſolved to ſtrengthen himſelf with the alliance of Conſtantine, who, having conquered the Franks, enjoyed at that time a profound Severus marches againſt Maxentius.

[e] Eutrop. p. 587. [f] Paneg. 3. p. 197. [g] Idem, p. 198. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Baudr. p. 192. [k] Valeſ. rer. Franc. p. 18. [l] Buch. hiſt. Belg. l. viii. c. 2. [m] Eutrop. p. 587. [n] Lact. perſ. c. 24. p. 23. [o] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 25. p. 420.

He is abandoned by his men, beſieged in Ravenna, and taken.

His death.

[p] Aur. Vict. p. 525. Zoſ l. ii. p. 673. Eutrop. p. 587. Anonym. p. 471. Hier. chron. Lact. perſ. c. 26. p. 24. [q] Vict. epit. p. 542. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 673, &c. [r] Lact. perſ. c. 50. P. 45.

profound peace and tranquillity, and was wholly bent on promoting the happineſs and welfare of his people. Having therefore fortified Rome with many new works, and put it in a condition of ſuſtaining a long ſiege, he left Italy, and went to confer with Conſtantine in Gaul, where he perſuaded him to marry his daughter Fauſta, and at the ſame time changed the title of Cæſar, with which he had contented himſelf hitherto, as appears from ſeveral medals [s], and from a panegyric pronounced on occaſion of his nuptials, into that of Auguſtus. Conſtantine is generally thought to have been declared emperor on the thirty-firſt of March of this year 307. Fauſta, whom he married, is ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions Flavia Maximiana Fauſta [t]. Lactantius calls her Maximian's ſecond daughter [w]. Perhaps he looked upon Theodora, his wife's daughter, as his own; for we find no mention made of any other daughter of Maximian. She was born and brought up in Rome [x]. The emperor Julian commends her modeſty and blameleſs conduct [y]. Minervina, Conſtantine's firſt wife, by whom he had Criſpus, muſt have been dead at this time; for he is not ſaid to have divorced her. By Fauſta he had, beſides Conſtantius, who is the beſt known of all his children, Conſtantine his eldeſt ſon, Conſtans his youngeſt, and two daughters, Conſtantia, or rather Conſtantina, who was married, firſt to Annibalianus, and afterwards to Gallus Cæſar, her couſin-germans, and Helena, the wife of the emperor Julian [z]. The wife of Gallus is ſtyled on an antient coin Flavia Julia Conſtantina Auguſta [a]. Galerius did not grant the title of Auguſtus to Conſtantine till about a year after, when he was obliged to beſtow it on Maximin [b]. While Maximian was in Gaul with Conſtantine, Galerius entered Italy with a powerful army; but not ſufficient, as he found by experience, to beſiege Rome: for, as he had never ſeen the great capital of the empire, he imagined it to be only ſomewhat larger than Antioch, and ſome other cities of the eaſt. He threatened to lay it in ruins, to put all the inhabitants to the ſword, and utterly to extirpate the ſenate; but when he approached that immenſe metropolis, and viewed its fortifications, deſpairing to be able to carry it by aſſault, and not having with him a ſufficient Conſtantine marries Fauſta the daughter of Maximian, and is by him declared emperor.

His iſſue by Fauſta.

Galerius approaches Rome with a deſign to beſiege it.

[s] Goltz. p. 126. Birag. p. 459. Byzant. fam. p. 15. [t] Panegyr. 5. p. 127. [u] Goltz. p. 128. [w] Lact. c. 27. p. 25. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Julian. orat. i. p 9. [z] Vide Anonym. p. 3. & Byz. fam. p. 46, 47. [a] Spanh. p. 640. [b] Lact. perſ. c. 32. p. 29.

sufficient number of troops to invest it, he retired to Interamna, now Terni, and thence sent Licinius and Probus to exhort Maxentius, in his name, to demand the empire of his father-in-law, and not usurp it by force of arms [c]. But Maxentius, having found means to gain under-hand some of Galerius's legions, was so far from hearkening to the deputies, that he would have marched out against Galerius, if he, distrusting his troops, and dreading the fate of Severus, had not hastened back into his own dominions. In his retreat he laid waste the country far and wide, to prevent the enemy from pursuing him, and allowed his soldiers to commit unheard-of disorders and cruelties [d]. Maximian, who was still in Gaul, being informed of the precipitous retreat of Galerius, did all that lay in his power to persuade Constantine to pursue him; but finding that prince no-ways inclined to engage in so dangerous a war, he repassed the Alps, and returned to Rome, where he reigned some time jointly with his son, but was less respected, and not so readily obeyed, as he. This piqued him to such a degree, that, divesting himself of all paternal affection, he resolved to deprive Maxentius of the empire, not doubting, but the troops that had abandoned Severus, as they had formerly belonged to him, would favour this attempt. Having therefore endeavoured under-hand to estrange them from his son, he assembled both the people and soldiery; and after a long descant upon the evils and misfortunes of the times, he turned unexpectedly to his son, who sat on the throne or tribunal with him, reproached him as the sole author of the present calamities, and, after many bitter and virulent invectives, stripped him of his purple robes, and tore them in pieces. Maxentius, leaping from the throne, implored the protection of the soldiery, who, being moved with his tears, but more with his promises, received him in their arms, loaded Maximian with injuries, and threatened him with present death [e]. Zonaras tells us, that Maximian, to appease the soldiery, told them, that he was not in earnest, but had made use of that artifice to try whether or no they were sincerely attached to his son: but no one believing him, he thought it advisable to leave Rome, and accordingly hastened back into Gaul, where he complained to Constantine, that his son had driven him from Rome. But Constantine, not seeming to be much affected with

But is obliged to retire with precipitation.

Maximian attempts to depose his son.

But is obliged to retire to Gaul.

[c] Idem ibid. c. 27. p. 25. Pan. 6. p. 136. Anonym. p. 472. [d] Lact. Anonym. ibid. [e] Panegyr. 6. p. 136. Eutrop. p. 687. Zos. l. ii. p. 674.

with his complaints, about the month of November he repaired to Galerius, the declared enemy of his ſon, to regulate with him, as he pretended, the public affairs, but in reality to watch an opportunity of diſpatching him, and ſeizing his provinces [f]. But no favourable occaſion offered of putting in execution his wicked purpoſe. Galerius was not then at Carnutum in Gaul, now Chartres, as we read in Zoſimus [g], but at Carnuntum, or Carnus, on the Danube in Pannonia, with Diocleſian, whom he had invited thither to authorize with his preſence the election of Licinius, whom he intended to create emperor in the room of Severus. On this occaſion Maximian, in a private conference with his antient collegue, did all that lay in his power to prevail upon him to reſume the empire, and deliver the people of Rome from ſo many tyrants [h]. Victor the younger writes, that Galerius himſelf preſſed Diocleſian to re-aſcend the throne [i]; which to us ſeems altogether improbable. Be that as it will, Diocleſian found ſuch delights in a retired life, that he would hearken to no propoſals of that nature. Lactantius aſſures us, that the deſign of Maximian was to re-inſtate Diocleſian and himſelf in the empire, and deſtroy the reſt one after another, his own ſon not excepted [k]. Some writers, and Eutropius among the reſt [l], ſeem to have believed, that Maximian only pretended to be at variance with his ſon, the better to deceive the other princes, and compaſs their ruin; but, inſtead of that, he was obliged to authorize with his preſence the promotion of Licinius, whom Galerius created emperor in the room of Severus, on the eleventh of November of this year 307. Licinius was a native of New Dacia, which lay on the Roman ſide of the Danube, and was, ever ſince the reign of Aurelian, accounted one of the provinces of Illyricum. He pretended to derive his pedigree from the emperor Philip, but was in reality ſprung from a family quite mean and ignoble [m]. His education was ſuitable to his birth; for he was brought up without the leaſt knowledge of letters; nay he was not aſhamed to declare himſelf an open enemy to learning, calling the ſciences the peſt and bane of the ſtate [n]. He was naturally of a cruel, violent, and haughty temper [o], and Licinius created emperor.

His extraction and character.

[f] Lact. perſ. c. 29. p 26. Eutrop. p. 687. [g] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 673. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Vict. epit. p 542. [k] Lact. perſ. c. 43. p. 37. [l] Eutrop. p. 587. [m] Anonym. p. 473. Gord. vit. p. 165. Vict. epit. p. 543. [n] Vict. ibid. [o] Euſeb. l. x. c. 8. p. 397.

and addicted, even in his old age, to the moſt infamous debaucheries [p]. His inſatiable avarice prompted him, when raiſed to the empire, to fill his coffers by the moſt unjuſt, tyrannical, and iniquitous methods [q]. However, he was a brave and experienced officer, kept the ſoldiers to their duty, puniſhed the leaſt tranſgreſſions with the utmoſt ſeverity, and by that means revived in the army the diſcipline of the antient Romans [r]. In the year 323, he was, according to Victor the younger, about ſixty. Euſebius ſpeaks of him as one at that time worn out with old age [s]; and Lactantius tells us, that Galerius did not create him Cæſar in 305, becauſe he was aſhamed to call him his ſon, but choſe to raiſe him to the empire at once, and ſtyle him his brother [t]. However, in 313, he married Conſtantia, the ſiſter of Conſtantine, and had children by her [u]. Galerius and he had lived in great intimacy ever ſince they firſt entered into the army; and the emperor, repoſing an entire confidence in him, had, in all his expeditions, after he had attained to the dignity of Cæſar, ſuffered himſelf to be wholly governed by his counſels. The memorable victory, which Galerius gained over the Perſians, was in great meaſure owing to the valour and conduct of Licinius [w]. Galerius ſeems at firſt to have given him only the provinces of Pannonia and Rhœtia; but at the ſame time he promiſed to put him in poſſeſſion of thoſe that were held by Maxentius, as ſoon as he had driven out that uſurper [x]. Thus was the empire ruled at once by ſix princes, viz. Maximian, Galerius, Licinius, Maximin, Conſtantine, and Maxentius.

Maxentius and his ſon Romulus conſuls at Rome.

THE following year, Maximan was conſul the tenth time, and Galerius the ſeventh; but at Rome the year was dated by the conſuls who ſhould be named, Maxentius who reigned there, refuſing to acknowledge the conſulſhip either of Galerius or his father Maximian. This continued till the twentieth of April, when Maxentius cauſed himſelf to be declared conſul with his ſon Romulus, ſtyled on the antient coins M. Aurelius Romulus [y]. Maxentius gave him the title of Cæſar and emperor, created him conſul the following year, and ranked him among the gods after his death, which happened during during his ſecond conſulſhip [z], being drowned, it ſeems, in the Tiber [a]. While the diſturbances and changes, which we have mentioned above, happened in the weſt, Maximin enjoyed a profound peace and tranquillity in the eaſt, which he governed with the title only of Cæſar. But when he underſtood that Licinius had been declared emperor, he preſſed Galerius to raiſe him too to the ſame rank. The emperor could not be prevailed upon to grant him his requeſt, but, to content him, contrived a new title, appointing, that he and Conſtantine ſhould, for the future, be ſtyled Filii Auguſtorum, ſons of emperors; which title is ſtill to be ſeen on ſome of his and Conſtantine's coins [b]. Maximin pretended to be ſatisfied with this new mark of diſtinction, but, in the mean time, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor by his army; and in the letter which he wrote on that occaſion to Galerius, aſſured him, that the troops had, without his conſent or co-operation, ſaluted him Auguſtus [c]. This gave Galerius great uneaſineſs; but nevertheleſs, as he did not think it adviſeable to quarrel with his nephew about the title he had uſurped, he confirmed it, and at the ſame time granted it to Conſtantine, who was thus, through the ambition of another man, acknowledged emperor through all the provinces of the empire [d].

[p] Vict. epit. p. 544. [q] Euſeb. p. 396, 397. Anonym. p. 474. [r] Eutrop. p. 587. Vict. epit. p. 543. [s] Euſeb. l. x. c. 8. p. 397. [t] Lact. perſ. c. 32. p. 29. [u] Idem ibid. c. 20. p. 19. [w] Eutrop. p. 587. [x] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 674. Lact. perſ. p. 434. [y] Buch. cycl. p. 238. Idat. Birag. p. 450, 452.

Maximin cauſes himſelf to be proclaimed emperor.

This year, Maximian, thinking himſelf neglected by Galerius, left Illyricum, and privately withdrew to Conſtantine in Gaul, with a deſign to lay hold of the firſt opportunity that offered to diſpatch him, and cauſe himſelf to be acknowledged in his room. The better to deceive him, he quitted the purple the ſecond time, declaring, that in imitation of Dioclefian, he would lead a retired life, and no longer concern himſelf with public affairs. Conſtantine received him with the greateſt marks of honour and eſteem, aſſigned him an apartment in his own palace, and commanded all his ſubjects to pay the ſame obedience to his father-in-law, as to his own. But the reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit of Maximian did not ſuffer him long to enjoy ſo happy a ſituation. Conſtantine was then buſied in building a bridge over the Rhine; which great undertaking ſtruck the neighbouring nations with ſuch terror, that they ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, offering to deliver up ſome of their chiefs as hoſtages and pledges of their ſincerity. However, ſome Franks ſtill Conſtantine acknowledged emperor by Galerius.

[z] Vide Noris de Dioclef. num. [a] Paneg. 6. p. 146. [b] Birag. p. 446. Lact. p. 23. Euſeb. p. 310. [c] Lact. perſ. p. 433. [d] Idem ibid. c. 43. p. 36. c. 44. p. 38.

continued in arms; and againſt theſe Maximian adviſed Conſtantine to march with a ſmall body of forces, and leave the reſt at Arelatum, now Arles. His deſign was to make himſelf maſter of Conſtantine's forces, and ſeize his provinces, if any misfortune ſhould befall him, as there was room to believe there might, ſeeing he was attended only by a ſmall army. Conſtantine, not ſuſpecting the leaſt treachery, followed the advice of his father-in-law, who marched part of the way with him, and then returned to Arles, where the emperor had left the flower of his troops. When he thought him engaged in the enemy's country, he all on a ſudden reſumed the purple a third time, made himſelf maſter of the palace, ſeized on the treaſures there, diſtributed great part of them among the ſoldiers who were preſent, and wrote to thoſe who were abſent letters filled with the moſt bitter invectives againſt Conſtantine, inviting them, with mighty promiſes, to follow the example of the troops at Arles [e]. Conſtantine was no ſooner informed of what had paſſed, than he led back his army by land from the Rhine to Challon, where he embarqued his forces on the Sône; and landing them unexpectedly at Arles, ſurpriſed Maximian, before he was in a condition to oppoſe him. The ſoldiers who had declared for Maximian, awed with the preſence of their lawful commander, returned to their duty, a ſmall number excepted, who being ſeduced by the preſents and promiſes of the uſurper, fled with him to Marſeilles, and ſhut themſelves up in that city. Conſtantine purſued them cloſe, and arriving before the place, would have carried it by aſſault, had not his ſcaling ladders unluckily proved too ſhort. This obliged him to ſound the retreat; but, in the mean time, ſome of the inhabitants having opened one of the gates to Conſtantine's men, they entered the city, ſeized on the uſurper, while he was uttering from the walls bitter invectives againſt the emperor, and carried him to Conſtantine; who, after having reproached him with his treachery and ambition, and obliged him to quit the purple, not only granted him his life, but ſuffered him, through an exceſs of clemency and good-nature, to continue with him in the ſame palace [f]. While theſe things paſſed in Gaul, the troops in Africa revolting from Maxentius, who was acknowledged there, declared Alexander, Maximian attempts to deſtroy Conſtantine.

He is taken priſoner; but uſed with great clemency by Conſtantine.

Alexander uſurps the empire in Africa.

[e] Lact. p. 26. Panegyr. 9. p. 199, 200. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 673. Valeſ. rer. Franc. p. 21. Lact. perſ. c. 99. p. 27.

[f] Panegyr. 9. p. 200, 201, 202.

der, who commanded them in quality of lieutenant, emperor, and with the uſual ceremonies gave him the purple at Carthage [g]. He was deſcended of an ignoble and mean family in Phrygia [h], or, as Aurelius Victor will have it, in Pannonia [i]. All authors paint him as one in every reſpect unequal to ſo great a charge, being ſtricken in years, and quite deſtitute of vigor, prudence, and courage. Beſides, his troops conſiſted chiefly of new levies, unacquainted with the military diſcipline, and for the moſt part without arms. However, as he had a Maxentius for his rival, he maintained his uſurped authority for the ſpace of three years at leaſt, ſome of his Greek coins, which have reached us, being dated the fourth year of his reign [k]. One Nigrinianus, who is repreſented on ſome antient medals with rays round his head, and the title of divus or deified, is by moſt antiquaries thought to have been the ſon of Alexander [l].

THE following year, 309, Maxentius took upon him his ſecond conſulſhip at Rome, having his ſon Romulus for his collegue [m]. There were, it ſeems, no other conſuls, in the other parts of the empire; for this year is commonly diſtinguiſhed by the conſuls of the preceding year thus, the year after the tenth and ſeventh conſulſhip, viz. of Maximian and Galerius. Some, however, are of opinion, that Licinius was this year conſul for the firſt time; and it is paſt all doubt, that he was conſul before the death of Galerius. This year Eumenius, as is commonly believed, pronounced his panegyric on Conſtantine, in a city which ſtood on a great river that falls into the Rhine above Cologne [n]; that is, according to moſt interpreters, in Treves, which ſtood then, as it ſtill does, on the Moſelle, the river plainly pointed at in the abovementioned deſcription. The panegyriſt tells us, that Conſtantine was then buſied in repairing the walls of that city, which had been ruined, and in building there a great circus, a large ſquare, baſilics, and a magnificent palace for the adminiſtration of juſtice. He extols the generoſity of the good-natured emperor, the effects whereof had been felt in all the places through which he had paſſed; and therefore he entreats him to viſit the city of Autun, where the orator himſelf was born, and at that time taught rhetoric. In the cloſe of his ſpeech, he recommends to the emperor his five children, and all his diſciples, ſome of whom already enjoyed the firſt employments in the ſtate [o]. The following year, Andronius and Probus were named conſuls by Galerius; but were not acknowledged as ſuch at Rome, where Maxentius took upon him that dignity the third time without a collegue. In the conſular tables this year is dated as the preceding, thus; the ſecond year after the tenth and ſeventh conſulſhip [p]. This year, Maximian, no longer able to lead a private and retired life, reſolved at all events to attempt the recovery of his former condition; but being well appriſed, that all his efforts would prove unſucceſsful, ſo long as Conſtantine lived, he determined, in the firſt place, to murder him; and, in order to compaſs his wicked purpoſe, had recourſe to his daughter Fauſta, the wife of Conſtantine, uſing his utmoſt endeavours, and all manner of careſſes and entreaties, to prevail upon her to betray her huſband, and leave the door of the bed-chamber open; which ſhe promiſed to do, but immediately revealed the whole to Conſtantine, who, unwilling to condemn his father-in-law without ſome undeniable proof of his guilt, placed one night an eunuch in his bed, and left the door of the chamber open. Maximian did not fail to lay hold of the opportunity, and entering the room about midnight, killed the eunuch, crying out as he retired, Conſtantine is dead; I am emperor. But Conſtantine appearing that inſtant, with a numerous guard, ſtopped him, and ſhewed him the body of the murdered eunuch. It is eaſier to conceive than expreſs the terror and diſmay that ſeized him, when he found himſelf thus convicted of the moſt deteſtable treachery imaginable, without being able either to excuſe or deny it. As he had been chiefly prompted to this exceſs of wickedneſs by the mild treatment which he had hitherto met with, and ſtill promiſed himſelf, from Conſtantine, that prince thought himſelf obliged, in his own defence, to put an end to the life and crimes of ſuch an ambitious, implacable, and treacherous enemy. The only favour he granted him was the choice of his death, and he choſe of all deaths the moſt infamous and diſgraceful, which was hanging [q]. Such was the unhappy, but deſerved, end of Maximian, after having reigned with great glory at leaſt twenty years, and lived, according to Victor the younger,

Eumenius pronounces his panegyric on Conſtantine.

[g] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 675. Vict. epit. p. 542. [h] Zoſ. & Vict. ibid. [i] Aur. Vict. p. 526. [k] Goltz. p. 125. [l] Birag. p. 445. [m] Buch. cycl. p. 238. Onuph. in faſt. p. 263. [n] Panegyr. 9. p. 198.

Maximian attempts to murder Conſtantine.

He is diſcovered and ſeized.

His death.

[o] Idem, p. 190, &c. [p] Buch. p. 238. & 249. Idat. Proſp. &c. [q] Lact. perſ. c. 30. p. 27. Eutrop. p. 587. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 674. Vict. epit. p. 542.

younger [r], about ſixty (E). Conſtantine cauſed all his ſtatues to be pulled down, his images to be torn in pieces, and his inſcriptions eraſed, not ſparing even ſuch as were common to him with Diocleſian [s]. The ſame year Galerius was ſeized with a moſt dreadful diſtemper, an incurable ulcer in his privy parts. Lactantius [s] and Euſebius [t] deſcribe at length the miſerable condition to which he was reduced, and tell us, that, beſides the inexpreſſible torments with which he was racked night and day, without the leaſt reſpite, ſuch an inſufferable ſtench iſſued out of his body, as infected not only the palace, but the whole city. The diſtemper encreaſed daily, in ſpite of all the art and ſkill of the beſt phyſicians and ſurgeons: his thighs putrified by degrees, his belly was conſumed, his bowels laid open, and the whole maſs of his blood corrupted. Notwithſtanding all the care that could be uſed, he was devoured alive with infinite ſwarms of worms and vermin. No longer able to bear ſuch unrelenting torments, he often attempted to lay violent hands on himſelf, and cauſed ſome of his phyſicians to be put to death, becauſe their remedies proved ineffectual. He had recourſe to Apollo, to Æſculapius, and all his gods, but to no effect; nay, the remedies which Apollo, or rather ſome impoſtor in his name, preſcribed to him, ſerved only to aggravate his raging diſtemper. He languiſhed in this painful and, beyond expreſſion, miſerable Galerius is ſeized with a dreadful diſtemper.

[r] Idem ibid. [s] Lact. perſ. c. 33. p. 30. [t] Euſeb. l. viii. c. 16. p. 314, 315.

(E) Some authors write, that Maximian died at Marſeilles, confounding perhaps his death with what happened to him there in 308, as Zoſimus confounds it with that of Maximin II. in telling us, that he died a natural death at Tarſus (46). In an antient chronicle, quoted by Du Cheſne (47), we are told, that about the year 1054, his body was diſcovered at Marſeilles in a leaden coffin, encloſed in a tomb of white marble, ſo well embalmed, that it was ſtill entire, and appeared freſh. The author of the chronicle writes, that he learnt this of thoſe who had ſeen the body; and adds, that Raimbaud, archbiſhop of Arles, perſuaded the inhabitants to throw the carcaſe of ſuch an unmerciful perſecutor of the church into the ſea, with the coffin, tomb, and whatever elſe was found with it. St. Ambroſe had written long before, that Maximian was buried in a moſt beautiful tomb of marble (48).

(46) Zoſ. l. ii. p. 674. (47) Du Cheſ. tom. 3. p. 641. (48) Ambroſ. epiſt. lvii. p. 321.

miſerable condition, a whole year and upwards, ſuffering every minute all the agonies of death [u]. The pagan as well as chriſtian writers take notice of this unaccountable malady of Galerius [w]. The latter aſcribe it to divine vengeance, as he had been the chief author of the perſecution and unheard-of cruelties ſuffered by the chriſtians. This year, Conſtantine waged war with the Alemans, the Bructerians, Cheruſcans, Chamavians, and ſeveral other German nations; who, after having attacked the Romans in ſeparate bodies, joined in the end all their forces, and formed a very numerous and powerful army [x]. Conſtantine, not depending upon the relation of others, ventured in diſguiſe into the midſt of their army, pretending to be a deputy ſent to them by the emperor. As he found, that not caring to engage him, they deſigned to ſeparate, which would have rendered the war more tedious, he aſſured them, that the emperor was not then with his army; which they no ſooner underſtood, than they diſmiſſed the pretended deputy, and without loſs of time marched with all their forces againſt the enemy. Conſtantine received them at the head of his army, put them to the rout at the firſt onſet, and made a dreadful ſlaughter of them in their flight [y]. It was perhaps on account of this victory that he took the title of Maximus, which we find on ſome of his medals ſtruck this year 310, the fifth of his reign [z]. Euſebius tells us, that, after he had driven out of Gaul, or entirely ſubdued, the barbarians bordering on the Rhine and the ocean, he paſſed over into Britain, and there reduced ſuch of the inhabitants as had not yet ſubmitted to him [a]. But of this expedition no mention is made by the panegyriſts.

Conſtantine overcomes ſeveral German nations.

THE next conſuls were Galerius, the eighth time, and Maximinus, the ſecond; but Maxentius refuſing to acknowledge them, Rome was without conſuls till the month of September, when Rufinus and Euſebius Voluſianus were honoured with that dignity [b]. As the diſtemper of Galerius grew daily more raging and violent, he began at length to aſcribe it to the juſt vengeance of heaven, for his cruelties to the innocent chriſtians, and immediately publiſhed an edict, ordering a ſtop to be put to the perſecution. This edict was enacted in the name of three emperors, viz. Galerius, Conſtantine, and Licinius.

Galerius puts a ſtop to the perſecution.

[u] Idem ibid. Lact. c. 33. Zoſ. p. 674. [w] Anonym. p. 472. [w] Aur. Vict. epit. p. 525. [x] Panegyr. 7. p. 163—165. [y] Idem, p. 164. [z] Birag. p. 462. [a] Euſeb. vit. Conſtanc. l. i. c. 25. p. 420. Buch. cycl. p. 238. [b] Lact. perſ. c. 35. p. 31.

Licinius. Maxentius was looked upon by Galerius as an enemy, and had never been acknowledged by him; and as for Maximin, he either would not agree with the reſt to put a ſtop to the perſecution, or his name has been, through a miſtake of the tranſcribers, omitted in the edict, as that of Licinius has been left out in moſt editions of Euſebius, and even in the Latin tranſlation by Rufinus. The edict was dated the twentieth year of the reign of Galerius, and conſequently muſt have been drawn up after the firſt of March of this year 311. It was publicly ſet up at Nicomedia on the thirtieth of April, and the following month his death was known there; for he died, according to the moſt probable opinion, at Sardica, the metropolis of New Dacia, now known by the name of Sofia, or, as the inhabitants ſtyle it, Triadizza [c]. Galerius had reigned, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæſar, nineteen years, two months, and ſome days. He had been emperor ſix years and a few days; for we find ſome of his coins dated the ſeventh year of his reign [d]. Before he expired, he earneſtly recommended to Licinius his wife Valeria, the daughter of Diocleſian, and Candidianus his natural ſon [e]; which ſhews, that Licinius was preſent when he died. He was buried in the ſame city where he was born, and afterwards deified with the uſual ceremonies [f]. Maximin was no ſooner informed of the death of Galerius, then he haſtened from the eaſt, where he then was, with a deſign to ſeize on his provinces, and entering Bithynia, made himſelf maſter of all the countries beyond the Propontis. On the other hand, Licinius, having drawn together his forces, marched to oppoſe him; and the two armies encamped over-againſt each other, the one on the coaſt of Aſia, and the other of Europe. However, they came at length to an agreement; and in a private interview, which they had in the ſtreights of Chalcedon, they entered into an offenſive and defenſive alliance, which they confirmed with the moſt ſolemn oaths [g]. Maximin remained maſter of Bithynia, and Licinius of Thrace, the ſtreights of Chalcedon being the common boundary between the two empires [h]. Valeria, the widow of Galerius, though earneſtly recommended by him at the point of death to Licinius, choſe to withdraw into

His death.

Licinius and Maximin divide his provinces.

[c] Lact. perſ. c. 33. p. 30. Euſeb. l. viii. c. 17. p. 315. [d] Pagi, p. 311. [e] Lact. c. 35, 50. p. 32, 44. Euſeb. l. viii. c. 17. [f] Vict. epit p. 543. Birag. p. 444. Euſeb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 364. [g] Euſeb l. ix. c. 10. Lact. c. 45. p. 39. [h] Euſeb. Lact. ibid.

into the dominions of Maximin, with her mother Priſca the wife of Dioclefian, Candidianus the natural ſon of Galerius, and Severianus the ſon of Severus, put to death by Maximian in 307. Maximin treated Valeria for ſome time with the utmoſt reſpect, honouring her with the title of mother; nay, he conceived a violent paſſion for her, and even offered to repudiate his own wife, and marry her. Valeria, not a little ſurpriſed at this unexpected propoſal, anſwered him with great freedom, That the ſtate and habit ſhe was in, the time of her mourning for the death of her huſband not being yet expired, did not allow her to think of marriage; that to her it ſeemed very ſtrange he ſhould put away a wife, who had not given him the leaſt occaſion of complaint; that ſuch a proceeding gave her room to expect the like treatment; and, in ſhort, that it was both unbecoming and unprecedented in a perſon of her rank to entertain the leaſt thought of a ſecond marriage. Maximin was provoked to ſuch a degree with this frank and generous anſwer, that, changing his love into hatred and rage, he immediately baniſhed both her and her mother, ſeized on all her effects, confined her domeſtics, put her eunuchs to the rack, and, upon falſe accuſations, ſentenced to death ſeveral illuſtrious ladies who attended her, and among the reſt two ſenators wives, and one, whoſe daughter was a veſtal at Rome. They were publicly executed at Nicea, upon the depoſition of a Jew, who falſly accuſed them of adultery, hoping to eſcape the puniſhment due to his crimes by impeaching them. The people loudly complained of ſuch a bare-faced piece of injuſtice, and, tranſported with rage, would have torn in pieces Eratineus the governor of that province, while he ſat on his tribunal to condemn them, and ſee his ſentence put in execution, had he not been ſurrounded by a numerous body of ſoldiers, who with much-ado protected him againſt the inſults of the incenſed populace. The Jew, their accuſer, being afterwards condemned to be crucified, acknowledged on the croſs their innocence, and his own guilt, in ſuffering himſelf to be ſuborned to accuſe them [i]. Valeria, though confined in the deſerts of Syria, found means to acquaint her father Dioclefian with the miſerable ſtate ſhe was in, who, moved with tenderneſs and compaſſion, ſent ſeveral perſons, and among the reſt a kinſman of his own, an officer of great diſtinction in the army, to entreat Maximin, by all the obligations he owed him, to releaſe his beloved daughter from her confinement, and allow him the ſatisfaction faction of enjoying her company in his old age. But the tyrant was deaf to all entreaties; which is said to have haſtened the death of the old emperor [k].

Valeria enormouſly abuſed by Maximin.

[i] Lact. perſ. c. 39, 40. p. 35, 36.

CONSTANTINE, in the mean time, was buſied in viſiting the provinces under his government. He arrived this year, the ſixth of his reign, at Autun; and finding the inhabitants overloaded with taxes, he not only forgave them what they owed to the exchequer ever ſince his acceſſion to the empire, but remitted above a fourth part of all impoſts. In acknowledgment of this favour, the city of Autun, looking upon the generous and good-natured emperor as their founder, took the name of Flavia, which was the name of his family; and upon his return to the place of his reſidence, probably Treves, they ſent Eumenius to return him thanks for his extraordinary kindneſs to them, which the orator did in a ſpeech that is ſtill extant [l]. In the mean time, Maxentius, who reigned at Rome, undertook the reduction of Africa, which had revolted, as we have related above, in 308, and declared Alexander emperor. Againſt him Maxentius diſpatched Rufus, or Rufius Voluſianus, probably the conſul of this year, and one Zenus, a celebrated commander, who, in the firſt battle that was fought, put the troops of Alexander to the rout, took him priſoner, and cauſed him immediately to be ſtrangled [m]. Thus ended the war in Africa; but not the calamities of that unhappy province: for Maxentius cauſed ſuch of the Africans, as were conſiderable either for their birth or wealth, to be inhumanly put to death, and ſeized their eſtates, pretending they had favoured the uſurper; nay, he commanded the city of Carthage, at that time one of the moſt beautiful and flouriſhing cities in the world, to be laid in aſhes. Thus was the province of Africa utterly ruined, and the inhabitants reduced to beggary, and obliged, through fear of the tyrant, to abandon their native country, and take ſhelter in the provinces of the other princes [n]. Maxentius triumphed at Rome for the defeat of Alexander, or rather for the deſtruction of Carthage, and the ruin of Africa. But Rome and Italy were no leſs grievouſly afflicted by the lewd, inhuman, and avaricious tyrant, than Carthage and Africa. The unexpreſſible calamities, under which they groaned, are deſcribed at length by Zoſimus [o], Euſebius [p], Aurelius Victor [q], and the pane-Conſtantine's generoſity to the city of Autun.

Maxentius reduces and ruins the province of Africa.

Rome and Italy grievouſly afflicted by him.

[k] Idem, c. 41. p. 36. [l] Paneg. 8. p. 188, &c. [m] Aur. Vict. p. 526. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 675. Lactan. perſ. c. 43. p. 37. [n] Paneg. 6, 7. p. 145, 173. Aur. Vict. Zoſ. ibid. [o] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 675. [p] Euſeb. l. viii. p. 310. [q] Aur. Vict. p. 526.

panegyriſts who flouriſhed in thoſe times [r]. His luſt ſpared not the moſt illuſtrious ladies of Rome, nor his avarice the chief men in the ſenate: he forced the former, by all manner of torments, to comply with his impure deſires; and condemned the latter, under various pretences, to death or baniſhment, in order to ſeize their eſtates. Euſebius [s] and Rufinus [t] tell us, that having by menaces forced the governor of the city to yield up to him his wife, by name Sophronia, ſhe, who profeſſed the chriſtian religion, and conſequently thought death a leſs evil than defiling herſelf with any impurity, begged a few minutes to put on her beſt attire; which being granted, ſhe withdrew into her cloſet, and there, after a ſhort prayer, buried a dagger in her breaſt, and died on the ſpot. This action is mightily commended by Euſebius and Rufinus; and Palladius ſeems to approve it [u]. It ſhews a courage in Sophronia above her ſex, and a love of purity worthy of the religion which ſhe profeſſed; but nevertheleſs cannot, in the opinion of St. Auſtin [w], be commended, or even excuſed, unleſs done by a particular or extraordinary impulſe from heaven, ſuch as he ſuppoſes Razias to have had, of whom mention is made in the books of the Maccabees. Maxentius allowed his ſoldiers the ſame unreſtrained liberty, or rather licentiouſneſs, which he took himſelf, abandoning to them the honour, the lives, and the fortunes of the moſt innocent perſons. By this means Rome was in a ſhort time reduced to a moſt deplorable condition; the ſenators were ſtripped of their eſtates, and either baniſhed upon falſe accuſations, or publicly executed; and the people ſo loaded with taxes, that they had not wherewithal to purchaſe the common neceſſaries, and great numbers of them died daily for want. He was greatly addicted to the ſtudy of magic, which prompted him to many unheard-of cruelties, as he hoped to learn future events from the entrails of women and innocent children [x]. A fire accidentally breaking out in the temple of Fortune, and the people flocking from all parts to extinguiſh it, a ſoldier uttered ſome words of raillery againſt the "unfortunate goddeſs"; which one of the populace hearing killed the ſoldier on the ſpot. His comrades, to revenge his death, fell ſword in hand upon the people; which occaſioned a dreadful tumult, in which an incredible number of

The reſolution and intrepidity of Sophronia, a chriſtian lady.

The cruelty of Maxentius.

[r] Panegyr. 6, 7. p. 137, 158. [s] Euſeb. hiſt. l. viii. c. 14. p. 313. [t] Rufin. c. 17. p. 141. [u] Pallad. hiſt. Lauſiaca, c. 150. p. 105. [w] Auguſt. civ. Dei, l. i. c. 26. [x] Panegyr. 6. p. 136.

of perſons loſt their lives [y]. Zoſimus writes, that Maxentius immediately reſtrained the fury of his ſoldiers; but though he excuſes him on this occaſion, yet he owns, that his tyranny grew daily more inſufferable, and that the Roman people impatiently wiſhed for a deliverer [z]. Prudentius gives us a pathetic account of the evils which the city endured under ſo cruel a tyrant, who was not aſhamed to fill the public priſons with the moſt venerable and illuſtrious perſons in the ſenate [a]. Being elated with his ſucceſs againſt Alexander, tyrant of Africa, he began to entertain thoughts of deſtroying the other princes, one after the other; for he was often heard to ſay, That he alone was emperor, and that the others were only his lieutenants, employed by him to defend and guard the confines of the empire againſt the incurſions of the barbarians, that he might enjoy at Rome an undiſturbed peace and tranquillity. He reſolved to begin with Conſtantine, under the plauſible pretence of revenging the death of his father Maximian, though we are aſſured, that he was not in the leaſt affected with it [b]. He had then under his command an hundred and ſeventy thouſand foot and eighteen thouſand horſe, moſt of whom had ſerved under his father, and conſequently were enured to military toils and dangers. He had amaſſed by his extortions vaſt ſums to defray the charges of a war, and great ſtore of proviſions, having for that purpoſe drained Africa and the adjacent iſlands. He no ſooner began to aſſemble his troops, than Conſtantine, well appriſed of his deſign, wrote to him, and by laying before him the dreadful evils and calamities attending a civil war, endeavoured to divert him from it. Nazarius tells us, that Conſtantine, pitying the miſerable condition to which he ſaw, with the utmoſt concern, the metropolis of the empire reduced, burnt with a deſire of redeeming it from the tyranny under which it groaned; but not thinking that could juſtify his engaging in a war with his brother-in-law, he endeavoured to ſatisfy him as to the death of his father. But Maxentius, who wanted only a pretence for ſtripping Conſtantine of his dominions, without giving ear to his remonſtrances, cauſed his ſtatues to be pulled down, and his images defaced, giving out, that he was determined at all events to revenge the death of his father. Hereupon Conſtantine, leaving a ſtrong body of troops to guard the banks of the Rhine, and prevent the barbarians from

He reſolves to make war upon Conſtantine.

[y] Euſeb. p. 310. Aur. Vict. p. 52. [z] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 675. [a] Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 219, 220. [b] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 675. Aur. Vict. p. 526.

Conſtantine begins his march to Italy.

from breaking into Gaul during his abſence, ſet out on his march to Italy, at the head of an army, conſiſting, acccording to thoſe who magnify their number the moſt, of ninety thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe. Of theſe only twenty-five thouſand were Romans, and the reſt auxiliaries [c]. A panegyriſt, in an oration pronounced before him, ſays, that he engaged in this war with a ſmaller number of troops than Alexander had with him, when he went to attack the king of Perſia [d]; that is, not quite forty thouſand men. He endeavoured to gain over Licinius, by promiſing him his ſiſter Conſtantia in marriage; which gave ſuch jealouſy to Maximin, that he ſent deputies to court the friendſhip of Maxentius, and entered into an alliance with him; which, however, was kept ſecret; for Conſtantine was not appriſed of it till he became maſter of Rome, and ſaw there the ſtatue of Maximin placed cloſe to that of Maxentius [e]. We are not told, that Maximin ſent any ſuccours to Maxentius, or Licinius to Conſtantine. In this war providence had ſomething in view infinitely more important, than the reſcuing Rome from the tyranny of Maxentius; nothing leſs than the delivering of the church from the cruel perſecution under which it had groaned for the ſpace of near three hundred years. Conſtantine had inherited of his father ſome love and eſteem for the chriſtians; for the firſt uſe he made of his authority was to put a ſtop to the perſecution in the provinces ſubject to him [f]. However, he had not yet ſhewn any inclination to embrace a religion which he both honoured and eſteemed; but in the war with Maxentius, apprehending that he ſtood in need of an extraordinary aſſiſtance from heaven, he began ſeriouſly to conſider with himſelf, what deity he ſhould implore as his guardian and protector. He revolved in his mind the fallacious anſwers given by the oracles to other princes, and the ſucceſs that had attended his father Conſtantius in all his wars, who deſpiſed the many gods worſhipped by the Romans, and acknowledged only one Supreme Being. At the ſame time he obſerved, that ſuch of his predeceſſors as had perſecuted the chriſtians, the adorers of this God, had miſcarried in moſt of their undertakings, and periſhed by an unfortunate and untimely end; whereas his father, who countenanced and protected them, had in all his wars been attended with uncommon ſucceſs, and ended his life in the arms of his children. Upon theſe conſide-

He delibe-rates with himſelf what god he ſhould implore.

[c] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 676. [d] Pan. 6. p. 137. [e] Lact. perſ. c. 43. p. 37. [f] Idem, c. 24. p. 25.

conſiderations, he reſolved to have recourſe to the God of his father, and adhere to Him alone. To Him therefore he addreſſed himſelf with great humility and fervour, beſeeching Him to make himſelf known to him, and to aſſiſt him in his preſent expedition. Heaven heard his prayer in a manner altogether miraculous; which, however incredible it may appear to ſome, Euſebius aſſures us, he received from the emperor's own mouth, who ſolemnly confirmed the truth of it with his oath. As he was marching at the head of his troops in the open fields, there ſuddenly appeared to him, and the whole army, a little after mid-day, a pillar of light above the ſun, in the form of a croſs, with this inſcription, In this conquer. The emperor was in great pain about the meaning of this wonderful viſion, till the following night; when our Saviour appearing to him, with the ſame ſign that he had ſeen in the heavens, commanded him to cauſe ſuch another to be framed, and to make uſe of it in conquering his enemies. The next morning, Conſtantine imparted to his friends what he had ſeen; and ſending for the ableſt artificers and workmen, ordered them to frame a croſs of gold and precious ſtones, according to the direction which he gave them. This croſs is minutely deſcribed by Euſebius who ſaw it [g]. Baronius, who has cauſed it to be engraved in his annals [h], places the images of Conſtantine and his children on the ſtandard that was faſtened to the croſs-part of it, though Euſebius ſeems to place them below the ſtandard. In a crown of gold at the top of the croſs was a figure, conſiſting of the two firſt letters of the name of Chriſt, according to the Greek orthography [i]. This figure, on ſome medals, is formed thus ☧ and in other thus ☩. This cypher was probably ſhewn to Conſtantine with the croſs; for we are no-where told that he contrived it. Some are of opinion, that this cypher, in which the croſs is plainly repreſented, was the only thing Conſtantine added to the antient ſtandard. This the pious emperor cauſed to be carried before him in all his wars, as an enſign of ſafety and victory [k]. Socrates ſeems to inſinuate, that in his time, about the year 430, it was lodged in the imperial palace at Conſtantinople [l]; and Theophanes tells us, that it was ſtill to be ſeen in the ninth century [m]. Conſtantine cauſed ſeveral other croſſes to be made after the ſame manner, and to be conſtantly

A miraculous apparition.

[g] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 27—31. p. 421—423. [h] Baron. ad ann. 312. [i] Euſeb. ibid. c. 31. p. 423. [k] Idem ibid. [l] Socrat. l. i. c. 2. p. 7.

The croſs becomes the chief ſtandard.

ſtantly carried at the head of his armies, inſtead of the figures of Mars, Jupiter, Romulus, &c. The name of Chriſt was not always at the top of the croſs, but ſometimes on the ſtandard [n]. When the troops in any part of the army began to give ground, the emperor cauſed the ſtandard with the croſs to be conveyed thither; and his faith ſays Euſebius [o], was rewarded with victory, which began on that ſide where the greateſt danger was apprehended. He choſe fifty of the moſt courageous, robuſt, and religious men among his guards to attend this ſtandard, and carry it in their turns. Euſebius aſſures us, that none of thoſe who carried it were ever wounded in battle; and adds, that, in one encounter, the perſon who held it, finding himſelf aimed at on all ſides by the enemy, and therefore delivering it to another, in order to avoid the danger by flight, was ſhot through with a dart the minute he parted with it; whereas the other eſcaped unhurt amidſt the ſhowers of arrows that flew round him. This Euſebius, as he aſſures us, learnt of Conſtantine himſelf [p]. In the year 416, Theodoſius the younger beſtowed great privileges on thoſe who carried the labarum or laborum; for ſo the ſtandard conſecrated, to uſe the expreſſion of St. Ambroſe [q], with the name of Chriſt, is ſtyled by Gregory of Nazianzum, Prudentius, and others. As to the etymology of that name, we are quite in the dark. The reader will find many conjectures concerning it in Du Cange, who is of opinion, that it was borrowed of the Germans [r]. At the ſame time, Conſtantine ordered the ſhields, helmets, and offenſive as well as defenſive weapons of the ſoldiers, to be marked with croſſes, as appears from Euſebius [s], and various antient monuments. Sozomen tells us, that the emperor cauſed the name of our Saviour to be put upon the labarum, that the ſoldiers, who, in all times, paid the utmoſt reſpect to the imperial ſtandard, might, by degrees, be brought to forget their falſe deities, and pay the ſame honours to Him, whoſe name they had conſtantly before their eyes [t]. Conſtantine had the above-mentioned viſion before he paſſed the Alps to make war upon Maxentius, and conſequently in Gaul; but as to the preciſe place, we are quite at a loſs. Some ſtand up for Beſancon; others

The labarum or laborum.

[m] Theoph. p. 11. [n] Nazar. orat. iii. p. 75. Sozom. l. i. c. 4. p. 405. Euſeb. p. 535. [o] Euſeb. ibid. l. ii. p. 447. [p] Idem ibid. p. 448. [q] Ambroſ. epiſt. xvii. p. 213. [r] Cange diſſert. de inferior. ævi numiſmat. p. 18. & gloſſar. p. 190. [s] Euſeb ibid. l. iv. c. 21. p. 535. [t] Soz. l. i. c. 4. p. 405.

others for Sinzic on the Rhine, at a ſmall diſtance from Cologne; and ſome for Numegen, a village on the Moſelle, about five miles below Treves; which Auſonius calls the illuſtrious camp of Conſtantine [u]; but their conjectures are altogether groundleſs. Baluſius complains, and not without reaſon, of the irreligious temerity of a modern writer [w], who is pleaſed to ſtyle the whole account of this miraculous apparition, that is, the beſt atteſted fact in the hiſtory of Conſtantine, a pious fiction, which, in other terms, is caling Euſebius an impious impoſtor, and at the ſame time charging him with the greateſt folly imaginable, in pretending to impoſe upon the world with ſuch an enormous falſhood, while many thouſands of witneſſes were ſtill living, who would not have failed to diſprove what he wrote, and give him the lye. To imagine a writer of Euſebius's character, guilty of ſuch folly, impudence, and preſumption is, in our opinion, carrying ſcepticiſm and incredulity to too great a height.

Conſtantine being, after the miraculous viſion, immutably determined to adore that God alone who had appeared to him, ſent for ſeveral biſhops, in order to be inſtructed by them in the myſteries of their religon, and in ſeveral particulars of the late apparition. He hearkened to them with the utmoſt reſpect, and believed what they told him of the divinity, incarnation, croſs, and death of our Saviour, reading with great attention the holy ſcriptures, and conſulting in his doubts the biſhops, whom for that purpoſe he kept conſtantly about him [x]. Euſebius does not name them; but Zoſimus tells us, that an Egyptian, coming from Spain to the place where Conſtantine was, prevailed upon him to abandon the religion of the Romans [y]. This may be true, though no great ſtreſs is to be laid upon what Zoſimus writes touching the converſion of Conſtantine; for Oſius, the celebrated biſhop of Corduba in Spain, was by birth an Egyptian, and might, as he was a man of great piety and learning, have been ſent for by the emperor. It is at leaſt certain, that Conſtantine ſoon after appointed him his almoner, and treated him on all occaſions with the utmoſt reſpect, eſteem, and veneration. The modern Greek writers pretend, that one of the emperor's chamberlains, by name Euphrates, had a great ſhare in his converſion; but of him no mention is made by the antients. We may well well imagine what a great alteration the converſion of Conſtantine produced in the church. The whole imperial family followed, it ſeems, his example; we are well aſſured, that his mother Helen did: for though Theodoret writes, that ſhe inſpired her ſon from his infancy with ſentiments of piety [z], yet Euſebius tells us in expreſs terms, that ſhe knew not the true God, till ſhe was induced by her ſon to embrace the truth, and adhere to it [a]. The zeal which Conſtantia ſhewed for the doctrine of Arius, inclines us to believe, that ſhe profeſſed the chriſtian religion. Euſebius tells us, that Eutropia, the widow of Maximian and mother-in-law of Conſtantine, followed the example of the emperor; and Valeſius maintains the ſame thing of her daughter Fauſta; which does not at all ſeem improbable, though not poſitively aſſerted by any of the antients. Johannes Damaſcenus writes, that Conſtantine cauſed not only the croſs, but the image of our Saviour, to be repreſented on his coins; but no medals have been yet found to confirm his opinion. On his coins appear only the labarum, and on ſome of his ſon Conſtantius the ☧ with the A and Ω, the emblem aſſumed by our Saviour in the Revelations [b]. The ſilence of the antient panegyriſts with reſpect to ſo public and remarkable an event as the apparition of the croſs, which occaſioned the converſion of Conſtantine, would ſeem to us unaccountable, were we not well appriſed of the great and almoſt invincible power of prejudice in matters of religion. The authors of thoſe panegyrics could not, even in their ſpeeches uttered before Conſtantine, forbear ſpeaking of their fabulous deities, as if the emperor had ſtill been a pagan. However, ſome of them ſeem to have hinted at that apparition, though in very dark and ambiguous terms; for one of the orators ſpeaks much at length of an extraordinary aſſiſtance, which, he ſays, all Gaul believed to have been ſent to Conſtantine from heaven [c]. Another ſays, that every one dreaded the war with Maxentius, on account of an evil omen [d]. This may be well underſtood of the croſs, than which nothing was more infamous, or more deteſted, among the Romans. But Conſtantine placed his chief confidence in it, and cauſing it to be carried at the head of his army, as the banner of victory, croſſed the Alps the following year, when he and Licinius were conſuls the ſecond time, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, till he arrived at Seguſium, now Suſa; which,

Conſtantine is inſtructed in the chriſtian religion, and embraces it.

[u] Buch. de Belg. l. vii. c. 6. p. 243. [w] Jacobus Oiſelius in theſaur. numiſ antiquor. p. 463. [x] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 32. p. 423, 424. [y] Euſeb. l. ii. p. 685.

His example is followed by the imperial family.

Conſtantine paſſes the Alps and makes himſelf maſter of ſeveral cities.

[z] Theodoret. l. i. c. 17. p. 563. [a] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iii. c. 47. p. 506. [b] Vide Du Cange Byzant. famil. p. 31—33. [c] Paneg. 7. p. 161. [d] Idem. 6. p. 135.

which, being fortified both by nature and art, and defended by a numerous garriſon, refuſed to ſubmit. Hereupon Conſtantine, having ordered a general aſſault, and at the ſame time cauſed fire to be ſet to the gates, carried the place by ſtorm the ſame day; but would not give it up to be plundered, nor ſuffer the inhabitants to be any-ways injured in their lives or fortunes [e], though Zoſimus writes, that he laid in ruins all the cities that preſumed to oppoſe him [f]. From Seguſium he marched to Auguſta Taurinorum, now Turin, in the neighbourhood of which place he was met by a numerous army of the enemy, whoſe cavalry, armed cap-à-pé, fell upon him with a fury hardly to be expreſſed; but Conſtantine ordering his ranks to open and receive them, they were ſurrounded on all ſides, and, unwieldy as they were, pulled off their horſes and killed, without the loſs of a ſingle man on Conſtantine's ſide. The reſt of the army was eaſily put to the rout, and purſued with great ſlaughter to the gates of Turin; which the citizens ſhut againſt them, but opened to Conſtantine, whom they received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable. All the cities between the Po and the Alps followed the example of this, ſending deputies with great ſtore of proviſions to the conqueror, and aſſiſting him to the utmoſt of their power againſt Maxentius, whoſe cruelties and tyranny they could no longer bear [g]. From Turin he marched to Milan, which city he entered without oppoſition; and having paſſed a few days there, he purſued his march to Breſcia, where he was met by a numerous body of horſe, who, being routed at the firſt onſet, retired in great confuſion to Verona, the place appointed for the general rendezvous of all the troops of Maxentius diſperſed up and down the country. They were very numerous, and commanded by Ruricius Pompeianus, an experienced officer and captain of the guards to Maxentius, who, not thinking it adviſeable to venture a battle, ſhut himſelf up in Verona, with part of his troops. Conſtantine, having paſſed the Adige a great way above that city, inveſted it with his whole army. Pompeianus made a vigorous ſally; but being repulſed with great loſs, he ſtole away in the night, and ſoon after returned, with a numerous army, which he had with incredible expedition drawn together from all parts. Conſtantine, receiving intelligence of his approach, left part of his troops to purſue the ſiege, and marched with the reſt to meet meet him. Hereupon an engagement enſued, which laſted almoſt the whole night; but in the end the troops of Pompeianus were utterly defeated, and the general himſelf killed. Conſtantine diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion in a very eminent manner, grappling hand to hand with the enemy like a common ſoldier; inſomuch, that his officers, after the battle, conjured him with tears in their eyes to moderate his courage for the future, and not expoſe to ſuch dangers a life, on which depended the ſafety and welfare of the ſtate [h]. The city of Verona ſtill held out for ſome time; but was in the end taken by ſtorm and utterly ruined. The garriſon ſurrendered at diſcretion, and Conſtantine, contrary to their expectation, granted them their lives; but that his own men might not be employed in guarding them, as they were very numerous, he cauſed chains to be made of their ſwords, and confined them in two priſons [i]. During the ſiege of Verona, Conſtantine detached part of his troops to attack Aquileia, Mutina, and ſeveral other cities; which readily ſubmitted. By this means he became maſter of all the places between the Alps and Rome, the deliverance of which city from the tyranny of Maxentius, was what he had moſt of all at heart [k]. He therefore bent his march thither, and approached the city with all his forces. His approach rouſed Maxentius, who had abandoned himſelf to eaſe, and wallowed in all manner of pleaſures and debaucheries, ſtifling the tidings that were daily brought to him of the defeat of his troops, and the progreſs of Conſtantine. He cauſed a bridge of boats to be laid over the Tiber, a little above the Milvian bridge, now Ponte Molle, ſo contrived that it could be eaſily looſened, which he charged one of his engineers to do as ſoon as Conſtantine was entered upon it with his army. But the emperor choſe to encamp in a ſpacious plain, over-againſt the Milvian bridge, hoping by that means to draw Maxentius out of Rome, and tempt him to venture a general engagement, being well appriſed, that if he kept within the city, which was ſupplied with great ſtore of proviſions, the beſieging him there would prove a dangerous undertaking, and protract the war to a great length. But Maxentius ordering his troops to encamp between the Milvian bridge and the city, in order to prevent Conſtantine from approaching the walls, did not ſo much as ſtir out of his palace, till he was frightened from it by an inauſpicious omen, which obliged him to repair with Maxentius's army defeated.

Verona beſieged.

[e] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 37. p. 426. [f] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 676. [g] Panegyr. 6, 7. p. 138, 166.

Verona taken.

And ſeveral other cities.

Conſtantine approaches Rome.

[h] Idem, 6. p. 141. & 7. p. 168, 169. [i] Idem, 6. p. 141, 142. [k] Idem, 7. p. 170, 171.

with his wife and ſon to the houſe of one of his friends [i]. Lactantius tells us, that the night preceding the twenty-ſeventh, or rather the twenty-eighth, of October, Conſtantine was admoniſhed in a dream to cauſe the ſhields of his ſoldiers to be marked with the ☧ and then give battle. The order was immediately executed, and not only on the ſhields, but likewiſe on the helmets, as appears from an antient medal [k], of all the ſoldiers were diſplayed the croſs, and the name of our Saviour [l]. The ſame day, the twenty-eighth of October, Maxentius, who then ended the ſixth year of his reign, exhibited, notwithſtanding the danger that threatened him, magnificent ſhews in the circus; and having cauſed the ſibylline books to be conſulted, had this anſwer, that the great enemy of Rome was doomed to periſh that very day. This he underſtood of Conſtantine; and therefore, quitting the city without delay, he croſſed the bridge, which he had cauſed to be laid over the Tiber, and choſe for the field of battle a place called Saxa rubra, or the red rocks, about nine miles from Rome, drawing up his numerous army between the enemy and the river. Conſtantine, overjoyed to hear that Maxentius had marched out of the city, immediately advanced againſt him; and having encouraged his men with certain hopes of victory, ordered the ſignal to be given for the battle. At the firſt onſet, the Romans and Italians in Maxentius's army, out of hatred to the tyrant, gave way and retired; but the others, chiefly the prætorian guards, the miniſters of his tyranny, ſtood their ground, and fought with great reſolution and intrepidity; ſo that the victory remained doubtful, till Maxentius's cavalry being broken, the tyrant abandoned the field to ſave himſelf acroſs the bridge of boats, and return to the city [m]. Lactantius writes, that the bridge broke down of itſelf during the battle [n]; but Euſebius and Zoſimus tell us, that the engines which faſtened the boats together, giving way under the great weight of the multitude that fled with or before Maxentius, the boats parted, and he was puſhed into the river by thoſe who were flying with him [o]. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken in the ſnare which he had laid for Conſtantine; and that, falling into the Tiber with his horſe and armour, he was there drowned, with many of his men and ſome of his chief officers.

His dream.

Maxentius defeated, and drowned in the Tiber.

[i] Idem, p. 145. [k] Baron. ad ann. 312. [l] Lact. perſ. c. 44. p. 37. [m] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 676. Anonym. p. 473. Panegyr. 6, 7. p. 145, 170. Lact. p. 38. [n] Lact. ibid. [o] Zoſ. p. 677. Euſeb. vit. Conſt. p. 427.

ficers. His body being with much ado found the next day, buried in the mud, Conſtantine cauſed his head to be ſtruck off, in order to ſhew it to the Roman people, who had not yet ſhewed any joy for his death, apprehending it might be only a falſe report, ſpread on purpoſe to diſcover their inclination and real ſentiments [p]. The ſame day, the twenty-ninth of October, Conſtantine, cauſing the head of Maxentius to be carried upon a pole before his army, made his public entry into the city, attended by the ſenate in a body, and by infinite crowds of people, who flocked from all parts to behold and welcome, with loud ſhouts of joy, their new prince and deliverer. In the ſhews which were exhibited the following days, the people, neglecting the diverſions, kept their eyes immoveably fixed on Conſtantine, returning thanks to the tutelar gods of the city and empire, for giving them, in the room of a cruel and inhuman tyrant, a prince, of whoſe humanity, prudence, and moderation, fame had proclaimed ſo many inſtances [q].

Conſtantine enters Rome.

His clemency after victory.

THE battle was no ſooner over, ſays one of the panegyriſts [r], than Conſtantine ſheathed his ſword, and not only pardoned, but received into favour, even his moſt inveterate enemies [c]; nay, and preferred ſuch of them as he found qualified for public employments. The people demanded with great importunity the death of ſome of the tyrant's chief miniſters, but could not prevail upon the good-natured emperor to comply with their demands, and humour their revengeful temper [d]. All the troops of Maxentius were immediately diſarmed; but Conſtantine reinſtated them ſoon after in their former condition, and employed them againſt the barbarians on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. As for the prætorian guards, a corps ſo famous ever ſince the time of Auguſtus, and ſo powerful as to raiſe to the empire, and depoſe, whom they pleaſed, he either diſbanded them, or reduced them to the rank of common ſoldiers, cauſing their camp, which had been begun by Sejanus, in the reign of Tiberius, to be utterly demoliſhed [e]. Aurelius Victor ſeems to inſinuate, that he would not ſuffer any troops to remain in Rome, thinking them more apt to foment, than ſuppreſs, tumults and ſeditions [f]. Zoſimus writes, that Conſtantine puniſhed ſome, though very few, of thoſe who had been moſt attached

The prætorian guards diſbanded.

[p] Zoſ. ibid. [q] Panegyr. 7. p. 146, 147. Lact. c. 44. p. 38. [r] Panegyr. 6. p. 148. [c] Liban. orat. 12. p. 262. [d] Panegyr. 6. p. 148. [e] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 677. Aur. Vict. p. 526. [f] Idem ibid.

tached to the tyrant [g]; and Nazarius, that he cut off his whole race [h], that is, his ſon, for he had no other iſſue; and of him no mention is made from this time forward, tho' he was alive when his father was drowned. Upon the death of Maxentius, incredible numbers of informers ſtarted up to accuſe ſuch as had adhered to him. But Conſtantine, treading in the footſteps of other good princes, put a ſtop to their accuſations, and the evils that thence threatened the ſtate, by a law enacted this year, in which he declared all informers, and ſuch as attempted to diſturb the peace and tranquillity of private perſons with unjuſt ſuits, guilty of death [i]. He reſtored the ſenate to its former luſtre and authority, filling it with perſons of the greateſt merit, choſen out of all the provinces ſubject to him. He recalled ſuch as had been baniſhed by Maxentius, ſet thoſe at liberty whom he had confined, and by a general edict, remitted to all without diſtinction whatever puniſhment had been inflicted upon them by Maxentius [k]. Not ſatisfied with delivering them from the evils under which they groaned, he exerciſed his generoſity and good-nature to all in ſuch a manner, as to make full amends, in the ſpace of two months, for the calamities they had ſuffered during the tyrant's ſix years reign [l]. As he was now maſter of all Italy, the people crouded from every quarter to Rome, to ſee their benefactor and deliverer, and were received by him with ſuch marks of kindneſs and unfeigned affection, that they returned home with a far greater opinion of his affability, good-nature, and moderation, than fame, which delights in exaggeration, had raiſed in them [m]. The ſenate, out of gratitude, decreed him the firſt place among the emperors, tho' claimed by Maximin, and a triumphal arch, which is ſtill ſtanding, and was raiſed, as we read in the inſcription, in honour of Conſtantine, for having, by divine inſtinct, and with extraordinary courage, delivered, in one combat, the republic from the tyrant and his whole faction. In the ſame inſcription, Conſtantine is ſtyled the deliverer of Rome, and the author of the public tranquillity. This arch is thought not to have been ended and dedicated before the ſolemnity of the tenth year of Conſtantine's reign, that is, before the year 315 [n]. Baronius obſerves, that it was adorned with ſeveral ſtatues, taken from monuments erected to the honour of M. Aurelius

He enacts a ſevere law againſt informers.

Honours conferred upon him by the ſenate.

[g] Zoſ. p. 677. [h] Paneg. 7. p. 157. [i] Cod. Theodoſ. 3. p. 430, 431. [k] Panegyr. 6. p 137. & 7. p. 175. Euſeb. l. i. c. 41. p. 409. [l] Panegyr. 7. p. 174. [m] Idem, p. 173. [n] Noris de Licin. num. c. 3. p. 49, 50.

and other princes, which far excelled in workmanſhip ſuch as were done at this time [o]. The ſenate conſecrated likewiſe to Conſtantine ſeveral magnificent edifices, which had been raiſed at a vaſt charge by Maxentius. Baronius obſerves, that the panegyriſts, in deſcribing the triumphal entry of Conſtantine into Rome, tell us, that he went to the palace and to the ſenate, but take no notice of his viſiting the capitol, tho' that was one of the chief ceremonies of the ſolemnity [p]. Zoſimus writes, that the court being, on occaſion of a certain ſolemnity, obliged to go to the capitol, Conſtantine was ſo far from complying with the antient cuſtom, that he openly deſpiſed and derided both that and the other ceremonies of the religion of the Romans [q]. As he aſcribed the late victory, and all his other ſucceſſes, not to his own conduct or ſtrength, but to God alone, ſoon after his entry into Rome, he cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to himſelf, holding a croſs in the right hand, with an inſcription, importing, that under the influence of that victorious and ſalutary ſign, he had delivered the city from the tyrannical yoke under which it groaned, and reſtored the ſenate and people of Rome to their antient liberty and ſplendor. About the month of November of this year 312, an edict was iſſued in his name, and in the name of Licinius, putting a ſtop to the great perſecution which had been begun by Dioclеſian, and had raged with incredible fury in moſt provinces of the empire for the ſpace of ten years. This edict was ſent by the two emperors to Maximin, the moſt implacable enemy the chriſtians ever had, accompanied by a letter from Conſtantine, wherein the pious emperor acquainted him with the miraculous aſſiſtance he had received from heaven, and the victory he had by that means gained over the tyrant Maxentius. As Maximin yet pretended to live in friendſhip and amity with Conſtantine and Licinius, (for the letter was ſigned by both princes) notwithſtanding his hatred to the chriſtians, he publiſhed in their favour the decree, which is related at length by Euſebius [r], and ſeems to have been enacted this year. That writer, in ſpeaking of the conduct of Conſtantine at this time, tells us, that he treated with the utmoſt reſpect the miniſters of the true God, kept ſeveral of them conſtantly with him, entertained them at his own table, and paid an entire deference to their counſels. He ſeems to have honoured above the reſt Melchiades, biſhop of Rome; for to him he appeals in ſpeaking of the veneration Pays great reſpect to the croſs.

Cauſes a ſtop to be put to the perſecution.

[o] Baron. ann. 312. Aur. Vict. p. 526. [p] Baron ibid.
[q] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 686. [r] Euſeb. l. ix. c. 9. p. 360.

neration he had for the catholic church, and his ſincere deſire of ſeeing unity reign in it without the leaſt ſchiſm or diviſion [s]. Theophanes mentions ſome conſtitutions ſaid to have been addreſſed by Conſtantine to that holy biſhop, but thought by Theophanes to be ſpurious pieces forged by the Arians [t]. It is certain, that the emperor beſtowed great privileges on the clergy of the city of Rome [u]. We are not told what privileges theſe were; but moſt writers ſuppoſe the emperor to have exempted them from the payment of taxes, from the diſcharging of public offices, not ſuitable to their calling, and ſuch-like burdens. Baronius pretends, that this year, 312, Conſtantine gave the Lateran palace to the biſhop of Rome [w]. But Optatus Milevitanus writes that in the year 313, a council was held there in the apartment of the empreſs Fauſta [x]; whence ſome conclude, that it ſtill belonged to the emperor. However, as it is certain, that it appertained to the ſee of Rome in the fourth century, and that the church adjoining to it was even then ſtyled the baſilic of Conſtantine, we cannot think it improbable, that the palace was a gift of Conſtantine to the biſhops of Rome, and that the church was built by him, as we read in Anaſtatius [y]. As for the famous donation, by which Conſtantine declared the Pope prince and ſovereign of Rome, it is now looked upon by the Roman catholic, as well as the proteſtant, writers, as a forgery of a later date. Baronius is aſhamed to maintain it as a genuine piece, and yet declines declaring it a forgery. It is commonly believed to have been forged in the eighth century by the noted impoſtor Iſidorus [z]. Euſebius tells us, that Conſtantine built a great number of churches, ſupplied them with vaſt riches, and adorned the altars with magnificent offerings [a]. There are ſeveral churches in Rome, and at other places, ſaid to have been founded by Conſtantine; but the authority of Anaſtatius and ſuch-like writers is not of ſufficient weight with us to aſcribe that glory to any in particular. What he writes of the church of St. Peter on the Vatican is confirmed by two verſes, that were formerly to be ſeen in the vault of that church, importing, that it had been founded by Conſtantine [b]. In demoliſhing the antient church, to build that which is at preſent looked upon as the moſt magnificent ſtructure in the Pays great reſpect to the biſhops and clergy.

Builds a great number of churches.

[s] Euſeb. hiſt. l. x. p. 391. [t] Theoph. p. 14. [u] Cod. Theodoſ. 16. t. 2. l. xiv, p. 40. [w] Baron. ann. 312. [x] Optat. l. i. p. 44. [y] Anaſt. c. 34. p. 13. [z] Vide P. Pagi, p. 324. [a] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. i. c. 4. p. 429. [b] Baron. ann. 324. Anaſt. c. 34. p. 15.

the world, the name Conſtantine was diſcovered in ſeveral places. In ſome monuments, thought to be of the ſixth century, we read, that Conſtantine built at Rome the baſilic of the Seſſorian palace, in which he placed the true croſs, about the year 326, whence it was called the church of the holy croſs [c]. In ſome antient inſcriptions, the church of St. Agnes is ſaid to have been built by Conſtantine, at the requeſt of his daughter Conſtantia, or rather Conſtantina, who is ſuppoſed to have been buried there in 354 [d]. Theophanes writes, that Conſtantine no ſooner ſaw himſelf maſter of Rome, than he cauſed the reliques of the holy martyrs to be carefully gathered and honourably interred [e]. He received, continues Euſebius in deſcribing his conduct, all ſtrangers with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, and made them rich preſents. Not thinking it enough to relieve the common beggars with money, he cauſed them to be maintained and cloathed at his own expence. To ſuch as were come of noble, but decayed, families, he was rather magnificent than liberal, beſtowing upon ſome of them eſtates, and profitable employments upon others. He took under his protection orphans and widows, ſupporting them with great generoſity, and eſtabliſhing rich funds for their maintenance. He married to wealthy citizens, and perſons of diſtinction, many young women, who were deſtitute of friends and relations, allowing them fortunes out of the exchequer proportionable to the eſtates of their huſbands. In ſhort, all who had the good fortune to live under him, felt the effects of his generoſity and good-nature. No one ever implored his aſſiſtance in vain; no one ever departed diſſatisfied from his preſence. He was often heard to ſay, that whoever was allowed to approach his prince, ought to receive ſome favour or other at his hands; that it was incumbent upon the prince to make it his chief ſtudy to content all who applied to him: hence to thoſe, againſt whom juſtice obliged him to pronounce in the judging of cauſes, he uſually gave large ſums, or by ſome other means made good the loſſes they ſuſtained; ſo that his generoſity was no leſs extolled and commended by thoſe who loſt their ſuit, than his juſtice was by ſuch as carried it. Thus far Euſebius *.

His generoſity and good-nature to all.

The indiction.

THE indictions, that is, a cycle or revolution of fifteen years, made uſe of in reckoning time, are ſuppoſed to have begun about the end of the preſent year 312. The origin of [c] Boll. 18. Feb. p. 69. [d] Idem, p. 70. [e] Theoph. p. 11.

* Euſeb. l. i. c. 43. p. 429, 430. & l. iv. c. 4. p. 528.

of this cycle, and the etymology of its name, has occaſioned great diſputes among modern writers. The reader will find in Du Cange a liſt of the authors who have written on this ſubject [f]. Conſtantine having reduced the time, which the Romans were obliged to ſerve, to fifteen years, ſays Baronius, he was conſequently obliged every fifteen years, to impoſe, or indicere, according to the Latin expreſſion, an extraordinary tax for the paying of thoſe who were diſcharged; and hence came this new cycle, which, from the Latin word indicere, was ſtyled indiction [g]. The opinion of Baronius, though in reality a bare conjecture, ſeems to Petavius more probable than any thing that has been ſaid by others on the ſame ſubject [h]; for we know nothing for certain touching the origin, name, or author of this cycle. There are three kinds of indictions, viz. the Cæſarean or imperial indictions, which begin on the twenty-fourth of September, and were long made uſe of in France and Germany [i]; the Conſtantinopolitan indictions, beginning with the year of the Greeks, on the firſt day of September; and the papal indictions, or indictions of the popes, who, ſome centuries ſince, reckon from the firſt of January of the year 313. Petavius ſeems to think, that the Conſtantinopolitan indiction was generally uſed among the Greeks as early as the reign of the emperor Anaſtatius, and perhaps of Theodoſius the younger; nay, he is inclined to believe, that the indiction originally began on the firſt of September [k]. And truly, from various paſſages of the hiſtory of the fifth century, it appears, that the emperors of Conſtantinople followed this ſtyle, and that it prevailed all over Syria, and even at Rome [l]. Some have reckoned the indictions from the year 314, or from September of the year 313, but Petavius [m] and cardinal Noris ſhew, that we ought to count them from the month of September of 312, though we have no certain proof that they firſt began then; for ſome pretend, that they were in uſe in the time of Julius Cæſar, or Auguſtus [n]; which we can hardly believe, ſince no mention is made of indictions by any author who flouriſhed before the reign of Conſtantine. The firſt thing thing we find dated by them is the council of Antioch, held, as we read in Athanaſius [p], if that paſſage is genuine, which Petavius queſtions [q], in the year 341, and in the fourteenth indiction. However, it is certain, that St. Ambroſe mentitions the indiction in a letter of the year 386, and obſerves, that it began in the month of November [r]. From that time forward it is common in the code, where mention is made of the indiction of the year 367, and in other monuments both of ſacred and profane hiſtory; but the indictions, as cardinal Noris obſerves, are ſeldom marked right [s]. Onuphrius quotes a book on the indictions, by one Chyrius Fortunatianus, whom he takes to be the biſhop of Aquileia of that name, ſo famous in the time of Conſtantine's children [t]. But Petavius thinks there never was any ſuch book; and likewiſe rejects, as quite groundleſs, the opinion of thoſe who tell us, that the council of Nice commanded all biſhops to mark the indiction in their letters [u]. He even ſuſpects the council of Rome, ſaid to have been held under pope Julius, and dated the ſixth indiction [w]. The reader muſt obſerve, that the firſt year of this cycle is called the firſt indiction; the ſecond year the ſecond indiction, and ſo of the reſt, till the fifteenth; after which, the cycle is begun anew, and the years counted in the ſame manner.

[f] Vide Chron. Paſchale, ſeu Alexandrin. ex edit. Cangiana, Pariſ. ann. 1688. [g] Baron. ann. 312. [h] Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 365. [i] Vide Johan. Forbes, inſtitut. hiſtorico-theologic. l. v. c. 20. p. 268. & P. Pagi, ann. 312. [k] Petav. p, 564. [l] Noris, epoch. p. 340—342. [m] Petav. p. 363. [n] Noris ibid. [o] Vide Petav. c. 39. p. 360—362. & Noris, epoch. p. 169, 171.

Maximin perſecutes the chriſtians.

During the war between Conſtantine and Maxentius in the weſt, Maximin, who had enjoyed a profound tranquillity in the eaſt ever ſince his agreement with Licinius, began anew the perſecution, which the edict of Galerius, in favour of the chriſtians, had obliged him to interrupt for ſome time. In a reſcript addreſſed to the inhabitants of Tyre he had bragged of the happineſs of his reign, which, he ſaid, had never been interrupted or diſturbed by wars, ſtorms, dearth of proviſions, contagions, or earthquakes. This exemption from the evils that afflicted other parts of the empire, he aſcribed to the great care he took in promoting the worſhip of the gods, and perſecuting with fire and ſword their enemies the chriſtians [x]. But providence did not fail to humble his pride, and puniſh, in a very remarkable manner, his cruelty to thoſe who deſerved it the leaſt. For the very next winter proving exceeding dry, the drought produced a famine when no-ways expected, and the famine a dreadful plague, attended with nauſeous ſores, which breaking out in the face, and eſpecially about the eyes, deprived of ſight an infinite number of men, women, and children. This Euſebius, with a great deal of reaſon, looks upon as a puniſhment from heaven upon Maximin, who ſparing, out of his great mercy, to uſe his expreſſion, the lives of ſeveral chriſtians, cauſed their right eyes to be put out, in order to diſtinguiſh them by that mark of infamy from his other ſubjects [y]. To the famine and plague, that ravaged the dominions of Maximin with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, was added a deſtructive war. For the tyrant, attempting to oblige the Armenians, who had embraced the true religion, to offer victims to his falſe deities, forced them to take arms in their own defence, and from antient friends and allies, to become enemies of the Roman people and empire [z]. This muſt be underſtood of Armenia Major; for the people of Armenia Minor were not allies, but ſubjects, of the empire. This is the firſt inſtance we find in hiſtory of a religious war, or a war for the ſake of religion. As to the iſſue of it, we are only told, that, in the courſe of this war, Maximin and his army ſuffered much, our hiſtorian being wholly taken up in deſcribing the inexpreſſible miſeries that attended the plague and the famine, in all the provinces ſubject to Maximin, and the charitable conduct of the chriſtians towards their greateſt enemies, during the time of their diſtreſs [a]. Maximin was obliged, as we related above, by the decree of Conſtantine and Licinius, to put a ſtop to the perſecution this year, not daring yet openly to oppoſe them.

His dominions afflicted with many dreadful calamities.

ed

[p] Athan. de ſyn. p. 894. [q] Petav. p. 363. [r] Idem, p. 364. [s] Noris, epoch. p. 342. [t] Onuph. p. 265. [u] Petav. p. 365. [w] Concil. tom. ii. p. 527. [x] Euſeb. l. ix. c. 7. p. 353, 354.

THE next conſuls were Conſtantine and Licinius, both for the third time. The former did not, it ſeems, ſtay at Rome above two months, as appears from a law which he publiſhed at Milan, dated the tenth of March [b]. He was met in that city by Licinius, and there he married to him his ſiſter Conſtantia, whom he had betrothed to him before his war with Maxentius [c]. They both wrote to Diocleſian, inviting him to aſſiſt at that ſolemnity; but he begging to be excuſed on account of his age, they highly reſented it, and ſent him a ſecond letter, filled with menaces, which haſtened his death; for he died ſoon after, in the month of July of this year 313 [d]. The two emperors, in this interview, enacted acted an edict in favour of the chriſtians, which is related at length by Euſebius [e]. Conſtantine was ſoon obliged to leave Milan, and haſten into Gaul to make head againſt the Franks, who, forgetful of the treaty which they had made with him a few years before, were aſſembling their forces with a deſign to invade the Roman dominions. The emperor arrived while they were preparing to paſs the Rhine; but finding they withdrew, awed by his preſence, he gave out, that the Germans too were ready to break into Gaul; and leaving ſome troops concealed among the woods at a ſmall diſtance from the river, retired with the reſt. The Franks no ſooner heard of his departure, than they paſſed the Rhine; when the Romans, riſing unexpectedly out of their ambuſcade, fell upon them before they could draw up their forces, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to repaſs the river in the utmoſt confuſion. Conſtantine, not allowing them time to recover themſelves from their conſternation, entered their country, laid waſte their lands, burnt their habitations, and, having taken an incredible number of captives, expoſed them all to be devoured by the wild beaſts, in the ſhews which he exhibited on account of his victory [f]. This ſeverity towards a perfidious and faithleſs enemy, whom no ties could bind, is commended by his panegyriſt; but whether it anſwers the character of a mild, generous, and good-natured prince, which all the writers of thoſe times give him, is what we leave our readers to judge. Cruelty, even towards an enemy, however treacherous, was not, at leaſt, countenanced by the religion which he profeſſed. For this victory he took the title of Francicus [g]. Conſtantine was, as appears from the date of ſeveral laws [h], in the months of November and December of this year, at Treves; during which time the panegyric of the anonymous writer is thought to have been pronounced [i], in which the orator extols the victory, which he had lately gained over Maxentius; and in the end of his ſpeech addreſſes himſelf to the great and only true God; but at the ſame time plainly ſhews, that he had not yet wholly renounced the ſuperſtitious ceremonies of the Gentiles. He obſerves, that certain barbarians, who inhabited a diſtant country, had ſubmitted to Conſtantine; but as to this particular, there is a profound ſilence among hiſtorians. This year, Conſtantine granted great privileges to catholic churches in Africa, which province had ſubmitted to him upon the news

Conſtantine marries his ſiſter Conſtantia to Licinius.

[y] Idem ibid. [z] Idem, p. 355. [a] Euſeb. ibid. p. 553—557. [b] Cod. Theodoſ. t. 5. p. 114. [c] Lact. perſ. c. 45. p. 38. Vict. epit. p. 545. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 677. Anonym. p. 473. [d] Vict. epit. p. 542.

Overcomes the Franks.

He beſtows great privileges on the clergy and the church.

[e] Euſeb. l. x. c. 5. p. 388. [f] Valeſ. rer. Franc. l. i. p. 23.
[g] Idem, p. 25. [h] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 7. [i] Paneg. 6.

news of the death of Maxentius. In a reſcript addreſſed to Anulinus, whom he had appointed proconſul of Africa, he commands him to exempt the clergy belonging to the catholic church there, of which Cæcilianus, biſhop of Carthage, was the head, from all civil employments, that they might not be diverted from the ſacred functions of their office. Nothing, ſays he in that reſcript, ſpeaking of the clergy, will more contribute to the welfare of the ſtate, than their applying themſelves wholly to the worſhip of God [k]. This ordinance was notified by Anulinus to Cæcilianus, as appears from his anſwer to Conſtantine, dated the fifteenth of April of this year 313. As this exemption was granted only to the catholic clergy, the heretics, probably the Donatiſts, attempted to diſturb them in the enjoyment of it; which obliged Conſtantine to confirm the privileges he had granted them by a new edict, dated the twenty-firſt of October of this year. His exempting the clergy thus from the public offices in the cities, proved very burdenſome to the other inhabitants, and many entered themſelves among them on purpoſe to enjoy that privilege: the emperor therefore, by another edict, put a ſtop to the encreaſe of the clergy, ordaining, that none ſhould be admitted among them but to ſupply the places of others deceaſed; and that thoſe, who were admitted, ſhould be perſons not qualified by their birth or wealth for the firſt and moſt chargeable employments. In virtue of this edict, ſeveral cities attempted to oblige ſuch of the clergy as were qualified for thoſe offices to diſcharge them, though they had been ordained before it was enacted; which Conſtantine prohibited by a reſcript, dated the eighteenth of July of the year 320. But after all, his forbidding perſons of rank and eſtates to enter themſelves among the clergy, in order to eaſe the laymen, was afterwards looked upon by other emperors, ſome ſay by Conſtantine himſelf, as an affront and injury offered to the church; and therefore that edict was annulled, and perſons of the higheſt rank were allowed to enter into holy orders, but upon condition of their reſigning to others, either their whole eſtates, or the greateſt part of them; which was deemed ſuitable to that diſintereſtedneſs which the church requires in her miniſters [m]. Some writers are of opinion, that Conſtantine at the ſame time exempted the church-lands from all taxes and burdens whatſoever, there being mention made of this immunity, as already eſtabliſhed, in a law of the year 315;

[k] Euſeb. l. xx. c. 6. p. 392.
[l] Cod. Theod. t. 6. p. 21.
[m] Idem, t. 6. p. 23, &c.

315; but others pretend this law to be of a later date, and aſcribe the above-mentioned exemption to Conſtantius, the ſon of Conſtantine [n]. We have a letter written this year by Conſtantine to Cæcilianus, biſhop of Carthage, acquainting him, that he deſigned to put into the hands of the miniſters of the catholic church a conſiderable ſum, to be diſtributed by them among the indigent chriſtians in Africa, Numidia, and Mauritania; and that with this deſign he had ordered Urſus, his receiver in Africa, to pay him a certain ſum, to be diſtributed according to the tickets which he ſhould receive from Oſius: he adds, that if the ſum he mentions was not by him thought ſufficient, he might recur to Heraclides, another of his receivers, whom he had enjoined to ſupply him with what monies he wanted for ſo pious an uſe [o]. Oſius, mentioned in this letter, is, without all doubt, the great Oſius, biſhop of Corduba, to whoſe counſels Conſtantine ever paid the utmoſt regard in whatever related to the affairs of the church. In the ſame letter he acquaints Cæcilianus, that by word of mouth, he had ordered Anulinus, proconſul of Africa, and Patricius, lieutenant in that province, to check and ſuppreſs thoſe who diſturbed the peace of the catholic church there, meaning, we ſuppoſe, the Donatiſts, who had formed a powerful party againſt Cæcilianus himſelf. Not ſatisfied with the orders he had given to his officers, in order to put an end to the diſturbances raiſed by thoſe obſtinate ſchiſmatics, and maintain the unity of the church, he aſſembled, on the ſecond of October of this year, a council at Rome; and another, far more famous, the year following, at Arles in Gaul [p].

Gives ſums to the clergy to be diſtributed among the indigent chriſtians.

His zeal for the unity of the church.

When Conſtantine left Milan to oppoſe the Franks, threatening to invade Gaul, Licinius returned to Illyricum, where he was ſoon after attacked by Maximin, who, taking umbrage at his marrying the ſiſter of Conſtantine, and jealous of the good underſtanding that paſſed between thoſe two princes, reſolved to deſtroy them, and to begin with Licinius, whoſe ruin he hoped to compaſs, while the other was employed in Gaul againſt the Franks and Germans. With this view, he aſſembled in great haſte his forces; and leaving Syria, marched in the depth of winter into Bithynia; and from thence paſſing into Thrace, laid ſiege to Byzantium, which, after having held out eleven days, was obliged to ſubmit. He attacked Heraclea next, which made a vigorous defence, but was War between Licinius and Maximin.

[n] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 11. [o] Euſeb. l. x c. 6. p. 393. [p] Idem ibid.

was in the end taken by ſtorm. In the mean time, Licinius, having drawn together what forces he could, took the field, not with a deſign to venture an engagement, (for he had with him only thirty thouſand men, whereas Maximin's army was twice that number) but to ſtop the progreſs of his conqueſts. However, the two armies meeting between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, Licinius, if we may give credit to Lactantius [q], was admoniſhed in a dream to give the enemy battle, and aſſured of victory, provided he implored the aſſiſtance of the true God, by a prayer which was ſuggeſted to him in his ſleep. Licinius remembering it when he awaked, dictated it to his ſecretary, and cauſed many copies of it to be diſtributed among his ſoldiers, whom he took care to acquaint with his dream; which inſpired them with new courage and an eager deſire of engaging the enemy, over whom they promiſed themſelves certain victory, ſince heaven had declared in their favour. This prayer is related at length by Lactantius [r]. Licinius deſigned to give battle on the firſt of May, the day on which Maximin ended the eighth year of his reign. But Maximin having drawn up his army in battle-array on the laſt day of April, Licinius could no longer put off the engagement. When the two armies were in preſence of one another, the officers and ſoldiers of Licinius, quitting their ſhields and helmets, with their hands lifted up to heaven, repeated three times the above-mentioned prayer. Afterwards the two princes had an interview; but Maximin hearkening to no terms, they parted, and ordered the ſignal for battle to be given [s]. Zoſimus writes, that Licinius's men at firſt gave ground and retired; but ſoon after returned to the charge and carried the day [t]. But Lactantius [u] and Euſebius [w] tell us, that the army of Maximin was put to flight at the firſt onſet, and purſued with great ſlaughter by the conqueror. Moſt of his troops, eſpecially the legions, were cut in pieces, and the reſt, his guards not excepted, abandoning him, ſubmitted to Licinius. Maximin himſelf, quitting his purple robes, fled in the diſguiſe of a ſlave, and, croſſing the Boſphorus, reached Nicomedia on the firſt of May about ſun-ſet, having in the ſpace of twenty-four hours travelled an hundred and ſixty miles. He did not ſtop at Nicomedia; but, taking with him his wife and children, continued his flight into Cappadocia, where he Licinius's dream or viſion.

He gains a complete victory over Maximin.

[q] Lact. perſ. c. 46. p. 39. [r] Idem, ibid. p. 40. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 677, [u] Lact. p 41. [w] Euſeb. l. ix. c 10. p. 363.

he halted, and reſumed the purple, being met there by ſome troops that were marching from Syria to his aſſiſtance [x]. Licinius entering Bithynia a few days after the battle, was received every-where with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable, eſpecially at Nicomedia, where he cauſed ſolemn thanks to be returned to the Almighty for the ſucceſs with which he had bleſſed his arms; and then ordered the edict, which had been enacted by him and Conſtantine at Milan, in favour of the chriſtians, to be publiſhed; which was done accordingly on the laſt day of June of this year 313, that is, about ten years and four months after the edict, which gave riſe to this long and bloody perſecution, had been firſt publiſhed in the ſame city, by Dioclefian and Galerius [y]. Licinius had no ſooner put a ſtop to the perſecution by this edict, than he left Nicomedia, and purſuing Maximin, arrived at the ſtreights of mount Taurus, where he had reſolved to make a ſtand; but his courage failing him at the approach of the victorious army, he retired with great precipitation to Tarſus, propoſing to paſs from thence into Egypt, and raiſe a new army there. But diſtruſting the troops he had with him, and apprehending they deſigned to deliver him up to Licinius, he altered his mind, and reſolved, ſince he found no means of making his eſcape, to put an end to his life by poiſon; which, however, had not the deſired effect, but brought upon him a dreadful diſtemper, whereof the unaccountable ſymptoms are deſcribed at length by Euſebius, and Lactantius [a], who aſcribe it to divine vengeance. He was tormented night and day with inexpreſſible pains; his eyes and tongue putrefied, a puniſhment juſtly inflicted upon him for the blaſphemies he had uttered againſt heaven, and his cauſing the eyes of many chriſtians to be put out; an inviſible fire, to uſe the expreſſion of Euſebius [b], was kindled in his bowels, which, being attended with unrelenting torments, reduced him in a few days to a ſkeleton; his whole body was covered over with a kind of leproſy, and devoured by ſwarms of vermin: He could not be prevailed upon to take any nouriſhment, but greedily ſwallowed handfuls of earth, as if he had hoped by that means to aſſwage his pains, and allay the hunger, which tormented him without intermiſſion [c]. Euſebius tells us, that reflecting in this condition on his unjuſt conduct towards the chriſtians, Licinius becomes maſter of all Bithynia.

The unaccountable diſtemper of Maximin.

[x] Euſeb. Lact. Zoſ. ibid. [y] Lact. perſ. c. 48. p. 41.
[z] Euſeb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 361. [a] Lact. perſ. c. 49. p. 43.
[b] Euſeb. p. 365. [c] Euſeb. ibid. Lact. p. 44. Hier. in Zachar. xiv. ver. 12.

chriſtians, and aſcribing the agonies he ſuffered to his cruelty towards them, he cauſed an edict to be publiſhed, more favourable to them than that which he had been forced by Conſtantine and Licinius to enact the year before. But as his repentance, ſays Euſebius, was not ſincere, it obtained no eaſe to his torments, which at length put an end to his life at Tarſus in Cilicia, about the middle of Auguſt, after he had reigned nine years with the title of Cæſar, and five years and ſix months with that of Auguſtus [d]. He left ſeveral children behind him, whom he had created Cæſars, as appears from ſeveral antient coins [e]; but their names are not mentioned by hiſtorians. By his death, Licinius became maſter of all the Eaſtern provinces; ſo that the whole empire was now divided between him and Conſtantine. Maximin was declared by the edicts of the two ſurviving princes a public enemy, and treated as ſuch; for his ſtatues were pulled down, his images defaced, his name razed out of all public inſcriptions, and ſuch monuments as had been erected to his honour overturned and levelled with the ground. His children and relations were ſentenced to death and publicly executed; his wife was thrown into the Orontes at Antioch and drowned; all his miniſters and favourites were involved in his ruin, and among the reſt Culcianus, who had put a great number of chriſtians to death in Egypt; Firmilianus, who had ſignalized his hatred againſt them in Paleſtine; and Peuceces, whom the tyrant had favoured above the reſt, and created three times conſul. Licinius cauſed likewiſe a celebrated magician, by name Theotechnes, and all his aſſociates to be publicly executed at Antioch, after having obliged them to diſcover and own the impoſtures, with which they had led aſtray the ignorant populace, and ſtirred them up againſt the chriſtians [f]. Candidianus, the ſon of Galerius, being introduced to Licinius at Nicomedia, was received by him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, and treated for ſome time in a manner ſuitable to his rank; but when he thought himſelf ſafe, he was, by the order of Licinius, murdered with Severianus, the ſon of Severus, killed, as we have related above, in the year 307. Valeria, the daughter of Dioclefian and widow of Galerius, who had adopted Candidianus, was no ſooner informed of his death, than ſhe withdrew from Antioch with her mother Priſca, and wandered about in diſguiſe and undiſcovered for the ſpace of fifteen months; but being

His death.

All his friends, relations, and favourites, put to death by Licinius.

[d] Chron. Alex. p. 456. [e] Noris de Licin. c. 2. p. 48.
[f] Euſeb. l. ix. c. 11. p. 366, 367. & de Pall. c. 18. p. 342.

at laſt known at Theſſalonica, ſhe was ſeized there, and by Licinius's order publicly executed with her mother, and both their bodies thrown into the ſea [g]. Thus were the families of theſe three cruel perſecutors of the church, Dioclesian, Galerius, and Maximin, utterly cut off and extirminated. Zoſimus tells us [h], that the ſecular games ought to have been celebrated at Rome this year, but were neglected by Conſtantine; which was no-ways pleaſing to the pagans, who looked upon them as one of the chief ſupports of the empire, and a powerful preſervative againſt plagues, wars, earthquakes, and other calamities, though the laſt, celebrated by Severus an hundred and ten years before, in the conſulate of Chilo and Libo, had not, as we have ſeen, kept off theſe evils.

The death of Valeria and Priſca.

THE next conſuls were Rufius Voluſianus, the ſecond time, and Annianus. Conſtantine paſſed the firſt months of this year at Treves, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws [i]. By one, which was publiſhed at Rome on the twenty-fourth of April, he declared all thoſe free, who had been condemned to ſlavery by Maxentius, commanding, under the ſevereſt penalties, ſuch as held them in captivity to reſtore them forthwith to their antient liberty [k]. From Treves the emperor paſſed to Arles, where he ordered a general council to meet of all the biſhops in the weſt, in order to ſuppreſs the Donatiſts, who raiſed great diſturbances in the church. The letter he wrote to the council is a manifeſt proof of his piety, of his reſpect for the clergy, and his zeal for the unity of the church [l]. He was obliged to leave Gaul before the biſhops met, a war breaking out this year between him and Licinius, of which hiſtorians give us but a confuſed account, ſome blaming Licinius as the author of it, and others Conſtantine. The anonymous writer, whom we have often quoted, lays the whole blame on Licinius. According to him, Conſtantine had married his ſiſter Anaſtaſia to Baſſianus, whom he deſigned to create Cæſar, and appoint governor of Italy; but not caring to take this ſtep without the approbation of Licinius, he diſpatched one Conſtantius to acquaint him with his deſign and obtain his conſent. But having diſcovered at the ſame time, that Licinius attempted to ſtir up Baſſianus againſt him by means of Senecio, the brother of Baſſianus, he wrote a letter to Licinius, upbraiding him with treachery, and inſiſting

War between Conſtantine and Licinius.

[g] Idem, c. 50, 51. p. 44, 45. [h] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 671. [i] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p 8, 9. [k] Cod. Juſt. 7. t. 22. leg. 3. p. 665. [l] Concil. tom. 1. p. 1431.

ſiſting upon his delivering up to him Senecio, who had taken refuge in his court. Licinius was ſo far from complying with his requeſt, that, reſenting the letter he had written to him, he cauſed his ſtatues to be pulled down in Æmona, a city of Upper Pannonia. Hereupon Conſtantine, having drawn together in great haſte a body of twenty thouſand men, marched into Illyricum, hoping to ſurprize Licinius. But he found him already in the field, with an army far more numerous than his own. However, he advanced into Pannonia; and the two armies meeting in the neighbourhood of Cibalæ, an engagement enſued, in which Licinius was utterly defeated, with the loſs of twenty thouſand of his beſt troops. It appears from Zoſimus, who relates the moſt minute particulars of this battle, that it was fought on the eighth of October of this year, 314 [m]. Licinius fled to Sirmium, and from thence, with his wife, his children, and treaſures, into Dacia, where he raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar one of his officers, by name Valens. From Dacia, he paſſed into Thrace, and there aſſembled a ſecond army, far more numerous and powerful than the former. In the mean time, Conſtantine made himſelf maſter of Cibalæ and Sirmium; and having cauſed the bridge over the Save to be repaired, which Licinius had ordered to be broken down, he purſued the enemy into Thrace. Upon his arrival at Philippopolis, he was met by a deputation from Licinius, with propoſals for an accommodation; but Conſtantine inſiſting upon his depoſing Valens, and Licinius obſtinately refuſing to comply with that article, a ſecond battle was fought in the plains of Mardia in Thrace, which laſted from morning to night, when both armies retired, according to Zoſimus, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide [n]. Aurelius Victor [o] and the anonymous author of Conſtantine's life [p] write, that Conſtantine would have gained a complete victory, had not night intervening ſaved Licinius's army from utter deſtruction. The next day, Licinius ſent one Meſtrianus, who is ſtyled comes or count, to Conſtantine, to negotiate a peace, which was in the end concluded upon the following terms: 1. That Valens ſhould be forthwith depoſed, and reduced to his former condition. 2. That Syria, Egypt, Lybia, Aſia, Thrace, Mœſia, and the leſſer Scythia, ſhould remain in the poſſeſſion of Licinius; but that Illyricum, Dardania, Macedon, Greece,

Licinius defeated in Pannonia,

And in Thrace.

The articles of their agreement.

[m] Anonym. p. 473. Zoſ. l. i. p. 678. Eutrop. p. 588. Euſeb. p. 210. Vict. epit. p. 543. [n] Zoſ. p. 679. [o] Aur. Vict, p. 526. [p] Anonym. p. 474.

Greece, and Mœſia, ſhould be yielded to Conſtantine [q]. Mœſia is named in both diviſions, there being then two provinces of that name, the one, known at preſent by the name of Servia, belonging to Illyricum, and the other, now Bulgaria, to Thrace. Peace being thus concluded, the two emperors entered the following year, 315, on their fourth conſulſhip. Conſtantine, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, paſſed the beſt part of this year in Illyricum and Greece, which had been yielded to him by the late treaty. By one of theſe laws, dated the firſt of Auguſt, he forbids the crucifying of criminals, and entirely aboliſhes that ſort of puniſhment, though common among the Romans till his time, eſpecially with reſpect to ſlaves. This prohibition is generally looked upon by the fathers as an inſtance of his reſpect for the croſs and paſſion of our Saviour [r]. By another law, enacted at Naiſſus on the thirteenth of May, he commands the officers of the revenue to receive, and educate, at his expence ſuch children as ſhall be brought to them by their parents, as not being in a condition to provide for them by their own labour and induſtry [s]. He ordered this law to be engraved on braſs, and to be publicly hung up in all the cities of Italy. In the year 322, he extended it to Africa, enjoining the proconſuls, governors, and receivers of the revenue there, to ſupply with corn out of the public granaries ſuch parents as they ſhall find incable of maintaining their children. By a third law publiſhed this year at Sirmium, and dated the ſecond of June, he forbids, on pain of death, the attaching for debt either ſlaves or cattle employed in tilling the ground [t]. From Illyricum, Conſtantine went to Aquileia, and from thence to Rome, where he was on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt and the thirteenth of September, as appears from a law addreſſed to Probinus, or rather Probianus, proconſul of Africa, and from an edict addreſſed to the people of Rome [u]. On the eighteenth of October, he was at Naiſſus in Dacia; for the law bears that date, which he publiſhed there, forbidding, under pain of being burnt alive, the Jews and their patriarchs, to moleſt ſuch as ſhould abandon their ſect to embrace the true religion, and inflicting ſevere puniſhments on thoſe who ſhould embrace the Jewiſh religion.

Several laws enacted by Conſtantine.

[q] Idem ibid. Sozom. l. i. c. 2. p. 403. Zoſ. p. 779. [r] Vide Auguſt. ſerm. 88. c. 9. p. 473. [s] Cod. Theod. 11. t. 27. l. i. p 188. [t] Cod. Theodoſ. l. i. p. 224, 225. [u] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 10.

religion [w]. Conſtantine paſſed almoſt the whole year enſuing, when Sabinus and Rufinus were conſuls, in Gaul; for on the eleventh of January he was at Treves, on the fourteenth of May at Vienna in Dauphiny, and on the thirteenth of Auguſt at Arles, where his wife Fauſta was delivered of a ſon, whom ſome take to be Conſtantine his eldeſt ſon, and others to be his youngeſt ſon Conſtans. This year, the emperor enacted a law, dated the eighth of June, and addreſſed to a biſhop, by name Protogenes, probably the celebrated biſhop of Sardica, by which he gave leave to all maſters to infranchiſe their ſlaves in the preſence of the chriſtian people aſſembled with their biſhops or paſtors in the church, without recurring, as was preſcribed by the Roman laws, to the prætors and conſuls. Thus the manumitting of ſlaves, which before was attended with great difficulties and no ſmall expence, became eaſy and no-ways chargeable, the maſters being no longer obliged to recur to the prætors and conſuls at Rome, but only to their own biſhops and clergy [x]. In the month of October of this year, the emperor was at Milan, and there heard the complaints of the Donatiſts againſt Cæcilianus biſhop of Carthage [y]; and on the fourth of December at Sardica, where he enacted a law, commanding perſons even of the greateſt diſtinction, when guilty of rapes, extortions, or other crimes of that nature, to be tried by the governors of the provinces and executed, without being allowed to appeal to the governor of Rome, or the emperor [z]. This ſeverity was judged neceſſary to check the inſolence of the nobility, who began to oppreſs the people in a moſt tyrannical manner, eſpecially in the remote provinces. The following year 317, when Gallicanus and Baſſus were conſuls, Conſtantine and Licinius agreed to create three Cæſars, viz. Criſpus and Conſtantine, the ſons of the emperor Conſtantine, and Licinius or Licinianus, the ſon of Licinius by Conſtantia, the ſiſter of Conſtantine. This promotion was made, according to the beſt chronologers, on the firſt of March, and was afterwards notified to the armies, and publiſhed in all the cities of the empire [a]. The ſon of Licinius is ſtyled on the antient coins Valerius Licinianus Licinius, and Fauſta delivered of a ſon at Arles.

Criſpus, Conſtantine, and young Licinius created Cæſars.

[w] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xvi. tit. 8. leg. 1. p. 214. [x] Cod. Juſt. l. i. tit. 13. leg. 1. p. 111. Sozom. l. i. c. 9. p. 414. [y] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 13. [z] Cod. Theodoſ. l. ix. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4. [a] Anonym. p. 474. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 679. Hier. chron. Liban. orat. 3. p. 111.

alſo Licinius the younger [b], and was but an infant, about twenty months old, when raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar [c]. Criſpus, Conſtantine's ſon by his firſt wife, was born, according to ſome, in the year 300, according to others in 296, ſo that he was at this time in the ſeventeenth or twenty-firſt year of his age [d]. Conſtantine had committed the care of his education to the celebrated Lactantius, a perſon equally capable of inſtructing him in the ſciences, and inſpiring him with ſentiments of piety. Euſebius ſtyles him an excellent prince, a prince beloved of heaven, a ſon in no reſpect inferior to his father [e]. He is called in the antient inſcriptions Flavius Valerius Julius Criſpus [f]. This year was born, according to the common opinion, on the ſeventh, or, as others will have it, on the thirteenth, of Auguſt, in Illyricum, and according to ſome in the city of Sirmium, Conſtantius, Conſtantine's ſecond ſon by Fauſta the ſiſter of Maxentius [g]. Conſtantine paſſed the following year, when Licinius was conſul, the fifth time, with Criſpus, partly in Illyricum, and partly in the neighbourhood of Rome, and revived the antient Roman law againſt parricides, which had been abrogated by Pompey the Great, comprehending under the name of parricide the murder, not only of a father and mother, but likewiſe of a ſon [h]. The next conſuls were Conſtantine, the fifth time, and Licinius Cæſar. Conſtantine paſſed this and the three following years in Illyricum; and by ſeveral laws enacted there, and addreſſed to the governors of Rome and to the Roman people, endeavoured to reform the many abuſes which had long prevailed in the metropolis of the empire. By one of theſe laws, publiſhed at Rome on the firſt of February, he gives the pagans leave to conſult the aruſpices, that is, thoſe who pretended to foretel events from the entrails of victims; but forbids the aruſpices, as well as the other pagan prieſts, to enter the houſes of private perſons, though their friends or relations, upon pain of being burnt alive: ſuch as received them were by this law to forfeit their eſtates, and be baniſhed for life; the informers were not to be puniſhed in this, as in other caſes, but amply rewarded for their zeal [i]. The end of this law was to prevent Conſtantius born.

Laws againſt the aruſpices.

[b] Goltz. p. 130. Noris de Licin. c. 1. p. 39, 40. [c] Vict. epit. p. 543. [d] Zoſ. p. 679. Panegyr. 7. p. 177. [e] Euſeb. l. x. c. 9 p. 398. [f] Goltz. p. 129. [g] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 13. Du Change Byzant. famil. p. 47. [h] Cod. Theodoſ. l. ix. tit. 15. p. 112, 113. [i] Cod. Theodoſ. l. ix. tit. 16. leg. 1, 2, p. 114, 115.

vent all private ſacrifices and conſultations. By another law, dated the ſeventeenth of December, he commands thoſe, who ſhall conſult the aruſpices or other diviners, to ſend their anſwers to him [k]. The emperor continued this year at Sirmium till the twenty-ſecond of June, as appears from the dates of his laws; was at Naiſſus on the fifteenth of July, at Milan on the ſeventeenth of September, at Aquileia on the twelfth of October, at Sardica on the twenty-ſixth of November, and again at Sirmium on the firſt of December [l]. The following year, Conſtantine entered upon his ſixth conſulſhip, having his ſon Conſtantine for his collegue. This year he abrogated the Papian and all other laws againſt celibacy; but ſuffered thoſe who had children to enjoy the privileges granted them by thoſe laws [m]. He annulled another law, impowering the creditors to ſeize on the eſtates and effects of their debtors; and at the ſame time declared, that ſuch as had forfeited their eſtates by that law, might redeem them by paying the ſums they owed [n]. By a law dated the firſt of February, he forbids the officers of the revenue to puniſh with rods, or confine to the public priſons, ſuch as were backward in paying the common taxes; but orders them to be ſecured in places where every one might ſee and viſit them [o]. This law muſt have been unknown to Zoſimus, who tells us, that rods and all ſorts of torments were uſed by the officers of Conſtantine in exacting what was due to the exchequer [p]. Two other laws were enacted by Conſtantine this year, the one forbidding married men to keep concubines [q], and the other commanding all judges to diſpatch the cauſes of criminals, and the goalers to treat them, however guilty, with humanity, to keep them in open and wholeſome places, and not to confine them, at leaſt in the day-time, to dungeons: he declares ſuch as ſhall by ill uſage extort money from their priſoners, guilty of death; and threatens with his indignation the magiſtrates who ſhall wink at ſuch diſorders [r]. This year Criſpus gained a victory over the Franks, the particulars of which are not mentioned in hiſtory: Nazarius in his panegyric only tells us, that he overcame the Franks, granted them a peace, and then returned to his father [s].

Conſtantine revokes the Papian and other laws againſt celibacy.

Laws in favour of priſoners.

THE

[k] Idem, l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 1. p. 257. [l] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 16—27. [m] Sozom. l. i. c. 9. p. 413. Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iv. c. 26. Cod. Theod. p. 643, 644. [n] Idem, p. 251, 252. [o] Idem, p. 68, 69. [p] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 691. [q] Cod. Theodoſ. p. 70, 71. [r] Idem, p. 33. [s] Panegyr. 7. p. 177.

THE following year, when Criſpus and Conſtantine, the emperor's two ſons, were conſuls, Conſtantine publiſhed an edict on the ſeventh of March, forbidding all manner of work on ſundays [t]. Sozomen writes, that, out of reſpect to the croſs, he likewiſe ordered fridays to be kept holy [u]. But of this edict no mention is made either by Euſebius, or any other hiſtorian. However, the authority of Sozomen, who lived at Conſtantinople, was by profeſſion a pleader, and ſhews himſelf every-where thoroughly acquainted with the laws, is of great weight with us. The following year 322, Petronius Probrianus and Anicius Julianus being conſuls, Conſtantine gained a great victory over the Sarmatians [w]. Optatianus writes, that they were overcome in ſeveral battles with the Carpi and the Getæ, that is, the Goths [x]. Theſe battles were fought, according to that writer, at Campona, Marga, and Bononia, all three cities of Illyricum on the Danube, the firſt in Pannonia or Valeria, near the preſent city of Buda, and the other two in Upper Mœſia [y]. Rauſimodes, king of the Sarmatians, had, as we read in Zoſimus [z], beſieged a city, which he does not name; but Conſtantine, haſtening to the relief of the place, put the enemy to flight, and having obliged thoſe who had made their eſcape to repaſs the Danube, purſued them croſs that river, defeated them a ſecond time with great ſlaughter, their king being killed among the reſt, and returned with an incredible number of captives. Euſebius does not ſpeak of this victory in particular; but tells us in general terms, that heaven rewarded with many victories over the different clans of barbarians the emperor's zeal for the propagation of the goſpel [a]. The Sarmatian games, which were yearly celebrated about the latter end of November, probably took their riſe from this victory [b]. The next conſuls were Severus and Rufinus. Conſtantine, after his victory over the barbarians, marched with his army to Theſſalonica; but while he was buſied there in making a port, the Goths, notwithſtanding their late defeat, entered Thrace and Mœſia, committing every where dreadful ravages. Conſtantine marched againſt them with incredible expedition; and having gained a complete victory over them, purſued them with great ſlaughter into

And for keeping holy ſundays.

Conſtantine defeats the Sarmatians.

And the Goths.

[t] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iv. c. 18. p. 534. Cod. Juſt. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 3. p. 250. [u] Sozom. l. i. c. 8. p. 412. [w] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 22. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 680. [x] Optat. c. 23. [y] Baud. [z] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 680. [a] Euſeb. vit. Conſtant. p. 431. [b] Cod. Theod. Chronol. p. 22.

to the dominions of Licinius; which that prince highly reſenting, complained of it as an open breach of the treaties ſubſiſting between them. Conſtantine endeavoured to appeaſe him; but as Licinius, diſſatisfied with the late partition of the empire, waited only a plauſible pretence to break with Conſtantine, after ſeveral embaſſies and unſucceſsful negotiations, both princes began to prepare for war. Conſtantine diſpatched expreſſes into all the provinces, ordering his troops to haſten into Illyricum and join him [c]. Zoſimus writes, that his army was an hundred and thirty thouſand men ſtrong, and that he aſſembled at the port of Athens a fleet conſiſting of two thouſand two hundred veſſels of different rates and ſizes; whereas Licinius had with him but an hundred and fifteen thouſand men, and three hundred and fifty gallies [d]. Conſtantine was ſtill at Sirmium on the 25th of May [e], and a few days after at Theſſalonica, whence he marched into Thrace, and found Licinius encamped there on the banks of the Hebrus, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. The two armies continued ſome days encamped over-againſt each other, being parted by the river. Conſtantine was for laying a bridge croſs the Hebrus; but, in the mean time, having diſcovered a ford at ſome diſtance, he paſſed it at firſt with twelve horſemen, who being followed by a few more, kept the enemy in play, till the whole army croſſed the river. Both princes drew up their forces in battle-array, and prepared for the enſuing engagement, which was likely to prove deciſive. Euſebius writes, that the author of the war, that is, Licinius, gave the ſignal for the onſet, and that Conſtantine, having firſt with a fervent prayer invoked the Almighty, and given for the parole God our Saviour, ordered the croſs, in which he confided more than in the number and bravery of his ſoldiers, to be diſplayed at the head of his army. His confidence, ſays the ſame writer, was not ill-grounded; for victory attended the royal banner where-ever it appeared [f], Conſtantine's men behaved with incredible bravery, animated by the example of their leader, who, though he expoſed himſelf to the greateſt dangers, eſcaped only with a ſlight wound in the thigh. But of the enemy thirty-three thouſand were killed upon the ſpot, and the reſt though advantageouſly poſted upon a riſing ground, obliged to betake themſelves to a precipitous and diſorderly flight. Licinius eſcaped in the night, with what forces he could

War between Conſtantine and Licinius.

[c] Anonym. p. 474. [d] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 680. [e] Cod. Theod. p. 23. [f] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. ii. c. 3. & 6. p. 445, 447.

Licinius entirely defeated at Adrianople.

could rally, to Byzantium; and the next morning ſuch of his men as had remained in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, ſubmitted to Conſtantine, who, tranſported with joy for ſo ſignal a victory, granted a diſcharge to many of his veterans [g]. This memorable battle was fought on the third of July of this year 323. Euſebius tells us, that Licinius, before the battle, retired to a neighbouring wood to ſacrifice to his gods; and, when the ceremony was over, told thoſe who attended him, that he had offered victims to the gods, whom both his and their anceſtors had ever adored, but the enemy had forſaken, to embrace a religion unknown to the Romans, whoſe ſtandards he diſhonoured with the ignominious ſign of a croſs. He added, that as Conſtantine, tranſported with a blind zeal for his new religion, had declared himſelf an enemy rather to his gods than to him, it was incumbent upon them to defend and protect him, that the world might conclude from the ſucceſs of the approaching engagement, how powerful were the gods of the Roman empire, how weak the unknown God adored by Conſtantine. "If we are overcome, continued "he, we muſt deſpiſe thoſe deities whom we now adore, "and adore that deity whom we now deſpiſe. But if our "gods bleſs our endeavours with ſucceſs, as I am confident "they will, we muſt with an eternal war purſue their ene-"mies, and utterly extirpate the chriſtian name." Euſebius tells us, that he learnt this ſpeech, ſoon after the battle, of thoſe who were with Licinius when he made it [h]. Sozomen likewiſe writes, that Licinius had reſolved, if his gods had granted him the victory, to purſue with fire and ſword their enemies the chriſtians; and therefore that writer looks upon his defeat as a glaring inſtance to prove, that the chriſtians were, in a ſpecial manner, favoured by heaven, and that their religion was not an human contrivance, but the work of the Almighty [i]. As Licinius had fled to Byzantium, Conſtantine purſued him thither without loſs of time, ordering his fleet, commanded by his ſon Criſpus, to repair to the ſame place. Criſpus immediately put to ſea, and ſailing along the coaſts of Macedon and Thrace, entered the ſtreights of Gallipoli, where the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of two hundred veſſels, under the command of Abantus, or, as others call him, Amandus, waited for him. As the place was very narrow, Criſpus thought it adviſeable to engage him only with eighty eighty of his beſt ſhips. Victory was long doubtful, both fleets fighting with great obſtinacy and reſolution: but in the end the enemy being encumbered by the great number of their ſhips running foul of one another in ſo narrow a place, were utterly defeated, with the loſs of five thouſand men, and one hundred and thirty ſhips. Amandus, the enemy's admiral, with the utmoſt difficulty ſaved himſelf aſhore[k]. Zoſimus, who deſcribes all the particulars of this battle, tells us, that even the winds fought for Conſtantine, in order to render the victory of the ſon by ſea no leſs glorious than that of the father had been by land [l]. Criſpus himſelf haſtened to his father with the joyful tidings of the total defeat of the enemy's fleet, and was by him received with the moſt tender expreſſions of paternal affection and eſteem. Conſtantine had already laid ſiege to Byzantium, after having gained ſome new advantages over the enemy; but, before his fleet arrived, Licinius made his eſcape by ſea, and taking with him the flower of his troops, and his treaſures, paſſed the ſtreights, and ſhut himſelf up in Chalcedon, with a deſign to raiſe a new army in Aſia. In that city, he preferred to the dignity of Cæſar one M. Martianus, the chief officer of his houſhold, and diſpatched him with a conſiderable force to Lampſacus, to make head againſt Conſtantine, in caſe he attempted to enter the Helleſpont [m]. But Conſtantine, leaving Byzantium, embarqued his troops, and croſſing over into Aſia, landed in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon; and finding Licinius encamped on a riſing ground not far from that city with a numerous army, which he had drawn together with incredible expedition, he began to prepare for a ſecond engagement. But, in the mean time, deputies arriving from Licinius, with propoſals for an accommodation, Conſtantine hearkened to them with great joy, and complied with the terms they propoſed, which were, ſays Euſebius [n], no leſs advantageous to Licinius, than to the whole empire. But this agreement was ſhort-lived; for Conſtantine being ſoon after informed that Licinius was drawing together forces from all parts, and had even invited the barbarians to join him, advanced to Chalcedon, with a deſign to inveſt the place, and oblige Licinius to comply with the terms of their agreement. But as he approached Chryopolis, the port of Chalcedon, he was there to his great

[g] Euſeb. ibid. Anonym. p. 475. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 681. [h] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. ii. c. 5. p. 445, 446. [i] Soſom. l. i. c. 7. p. 409.

And his fleet by Criſpus in the ſtreights of Gallipoli.

Licinius creates M. Martianus Cæſar.

An agreement between Licinius and Conſtantine, which is broken by the former.

ſurprize,

[k] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 681, 682. Anonym. p. 475. [l] Idem ibid.
[m] Zoſ. p. 683. Anonym. p. 475. [n] Euſeb. ibid. l. ii. c. 15. p. 451.

ſurprize, met by Licinius, at the head of a numerous army. Zoſimus writes, that he had with him above an hundred and thirty thouſand men, counting the troops commanded by Martinianus, whom he had ordered to leave Lampſacus and join him [o]. Conſtantine drew up his men in battle-array; but, ſcrupling to break the treaty, waited till the ſignal was given by the enemy; which was no ſooner done, than he fell upon them with ſuch reſolution and intrepidity, that, not able to withſtand him, they immediately gave way and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. In this battle Licinius loſt, according to the anonymous writer of Conſtantine's life, twenty-five thouſand men [p]; but, according to Zoſimus, above an hundred thouſand [q]. It was fought on the eighteenth of September; and a few days after the cities of Byzantium and Chalcedon opened their gates to the conqueror. Licinius fled, with what forces he could rally, to Nicomedia, whither Conſtantine purſued him, and immediately inveſted the place; but, on the ſecond day of the ſiege, his ſiſter Conſtantia entreating him with many tears, by the tenderneſs he had ever ſhewn her, to forgive her huſband, and grant him at leaſt his life, he was prevailed upon to comply with her requeſt; and the next day Licinius, finding no means of making his eſcape, preſented himſelf before the conqueror, and, throwing himſelf at his feet, yielded to him the purple and the other enſigns of ſovereignty. Conſtantine received him with great demonſtrations of kindneſs, entertained him at his table, and afterwards ſent him to Theſſalonica, aſſuring him, that he ſhould live unmoleſted, ſo long as he raiſed no new diſturbances [r]. However, he was ſoon after ſtrangled by Conſtantine's orders, who, on that account is highly blamed by Zoſimus and Aurelius Victor. St. Jerom has copied the very words of the latter in his chronicle. The anonymous writer, whom we have often quoted, tells us, that the ſoldiers, having demanded the death of Licinius, Conſtantine complied with their requeſt, fearing he might, in imitation of Maximian, one day reſume the empire. Zonaras writes, that upon the complaints brought againſt Licinius by the ſoldiery, Conſtantine referred the whole affair to the ſenate, who ſentenced him to death [s]. Socrates ſays in expreſs terms, that Licinius began privately to make new preparations for war, and to invite the barbarians to his aſſiſtance; which Conſtantine

Licinius utterly defeated.

He ſubmits to Conſtantine.

He is by his order put to death.

[o] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 683. [p] Anonym. p. 475. [q] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 683. [r] Idem, p. 684. Vict. epit. p. 543. [s] Zonar. vit. Conſt. p. 4.

tine no ſooner knew, than he ordered him to be put to death, and by that means prevented a new civil war [t]. Conſtantine cauſed all his ſtatues to be pulled down, and by two laws, the one dated the ſixteenth of May 324, the other the twelfth of February 325, annulled all his acts, and repealed the laws which had been publiſhed by him or his officers in his name [u]. As for Martinianus, Zoſimus writes, that Conſtantine abandoned him to the fury of the ſoldiery [w], as ſoon as he fell into his power. But the anonymous writer and Victor the younger aſſure us, that Conſtantine at firſt granted him his life; but afterwards ordered him to be put to death, as having been privy to the deſigns of Licinius [x]. All thoſe who had prompted him to perſecute the chriſtians, underwent the ſame fate [y], and among the reſt his ſon Licinius, who was this year degraded from the dignity of Cæſar, and two years after, that is, in 325, according to St. Jerom, ſentenced to death. Licinius had been created emperor on the eleventh of November 307, and conſequently had reigned near ſixteen years. We have not thought it neceſſary to take notice of the miracles, which Zonaras and Nicephorus have inſerted in their account of the defeat of Licinius, as things not vouched by any antient writer. For this victory Conſtantine, and after him his ſon and ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, aſſumed the title of Victorious, which we find ſtill prefixed to ſome of his letters [z]. Not long after the defeat of Licinius, he preferred Conſtans, at that time his third ſon and ſix years old, to the dignity of Cæſar.

CONSTANTINE, now maſter of all the eaſtern provinces, made it his chief ſtudy to eſtabliſh there the worſhip of the true God, as he had already done in the weſt, and to aboliſh all the remains of idolatry, which had been no leſs countenanced by Licinius, than the chriſtian religion perſecuted and oppreſſed. He began with two edicts, whereof both Greek and Latin copies were ſent into all the provinces of the empire, ſigned with the emperor's own hand, and addreſſed, the one, To the churches of God, the other, To the people of each province. By theſe edicts he reinſtates in their former condition all, who, on account of their religion, had been condemned to exile, to the mines, or any other puniſhment; orders their goods and eſtates to be forthwith reſtored Conſtantine orders whatever had been taken from the churches, &c. to be reſtored to them.

[t] Socrat. l. i. c. 4. p. 8. [u] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xv. tit. 14. leg. 1. p. 404, 405. [w] Zoſ. p. 685. [x] Anonym. p. 475. Vict. epit. p. 543. [y] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. p. 452. Anonym. ibid. [z] Euſeb. ibid. p. 452. Optat. p. 284.

ſtored to them or to their heirs; gives leave to ſuch as had been deprived of their military employments to reſume them, if they pleaſed; and commands the officers of the revenue, as well as private perſons, of what rank or condition ſoever, to deliver up to the churches, upon the publication of the edict, without waiting the ſentence of the magiſtrates, what houſes, tenements, gardens, orchards, &c. had ever belonged to them, but more eſpecially the places where the holy martyrs had been interred. He threatens with his indignation ſuch as ſhall not yield immediate obedience to this ordinance, which, he ſays, compriſes thoſe too who may have purchaſed ſuch lands, houſes, &c. of the emperor, or received them as a preſent, or by way of reward for their paſt ſervices. Theſe, however, he encourages to depend upon his generoſity; but requires of them, as well as of the reſt, an immediate compliance with his edict [y]. Theſe ordinances were followed by others, forbidding the offering of ſacrifices to idols, the conſecrating of any new idol, and the conſulting, either in public or in private, the aruſpices, ſoothſayers, oracles, &c. He had no ſooner cauſed theſe laws to be publiſhed, than he enacted another, ordering the churches, which had been pulled down during the perſecution, to be rebuilt at his own expence, enjoining his receivers in the different provinces to furniſh the neceſſary ſums for that purpoſe; and thoſe whom he appointed to overſee ſuch buildings, to take care that they were capable of containing all the inhabitants; for we hope, added the pious emperor, that they will all embrace the faith of the true God. He wrote upon the ſame ſubject to all the metropolitan biſhops, ſtyling them his beloved brethren, and among the reſt to Euſebius of Cæſarea, who relates his letter at length, and tells us, it was the firſt he had received from him [z]. Not long after, he publiſhed an edict drawn up by himſelf, and addreſſed to all the people of the empire; wherein he exhorts them to renounce their antient ſuperſtition, to adore but one God, the Creator of the univerſe, and to place all their hopes in Jeſus Chriſt. This edict is related at length by Euſebius, who tranſlated it out of the original Latin into Greek [a]. Conſtantine, not thinking it yet adviſeable to pull down the temples of the idols, ordered them to be ſhut up in all the places where that might be done without tumults and bloodſhed; to be ſtripped of their riches and ornaments, and even

He enacts ſeveral edicts againſt the worſhipping of idols.

Orders the temples to be ſhut.

of

[y] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. ii. c. 19.—28. p. 453, 458. [z] Idem ibid c. 44, 45. p. 464, 465. [a] Idem ibid. c. 47, 48. p. 465, 466.

of their idols; and all the lands, houſes, and revenues belonging to them to be applied to pious uſes. In virtue of this ordinance, the Pythian and Smynthian Apollo, the tripod of Delphos, the muſes of Helicon, the famous Pan, whom all the cities of Greece had conſecrated after the Perſian war, and whatever miſled antiquity had for many ages revered and adored, were publicly dragged through the ſtreets, and either daſhed in pieces, or made uſe of as maſter-pieces of art to adorn the ſquares, villas, palaces, public galleries, &c. [b]. From the ſeveral laws enacted this and the following year 324, when the emperor's two ſons, Criſpus and Conſtantine, were conſuls, it appears, that Conſtantine continued in the eaſt, reſiding for the moſt part at Nicomedia. The next year, Paulinus and Julianus being conſuls, the emperor, to put a ſtop to the diſturbances and diviſions that rent the church, aſſembled the famous council of Nice, at which he aſſiſted in perſon, and afterwards condemned to baniſhment the refractory hereſiarch Arius, with Euſebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, and ſeveral others, who could not be prevailed upon to renounce his impious tenets. On the twenty-fifth of July of this year, the emperor ſolemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence the twentieth year of his reign, and on that occaſion made a great entertainment in his palace, to which he invited all the biſhops of the council, treated them with the utmoſt reſpect, made them ſeveral preſents, and cauſed large ſums to be diſtributed among the poor, diſpatching at the ſame time orders to all the governors of provinces to ſupply yearly the ſacred virgins, widows, and eccleſiaſtics in each city of their reſpective diſtricts with a certain quantity of corn [c]. Conſtantine paſſed this year partly at Nice, partly at Nicomedia, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws. By one publiſhed at Nicomedia on the ſeventeenth of October, and addreſſed to all the ſubjects of the empire, he encourages ſuch as had been, or ſhould be, oppreſſed, or any ways injured by his miniſters, counſellors, governors of provinces or cities, &c. to apply to him for redreſs, aſſuring them, that they ſhould be well received, and amply rewarded, for undeceiving him, ſince he had employed none but ſuch as he believed to be men of integrity. But the beſt princes, adds he, are liable to be deceived and impoſed upon by wicked miniſters; if therefore thoſe in whom I repoſed Aſſembles a council at Nice.

He encourages all his ſubjects to recur to him

[b] Idem, c. 10, 511. Sozom. p. 449. [c] Euſeb. p. 491. Soz. p. 438.

I repoſed an entire confidence, have deceived me by a falſe appearance of integrity, and injured the meaneſt of my ſubjects, let the perſon thus injured lay his complaints before me, and accuſe me as the author of the injuries he has ſuffered, if I do not revenge them [d]. In the beginning of November he enacted another law, forbidding throughout the whole empire the combats of gladiators, and ordering, that criminals, inſtead of being obliged to fight in the arena, ſhould, for the future, be condemned to work in the mines [e]. The following year, Conſtantine entered upon his ſeventh conſulſhip, having his third ſon Conſtans for his collegue. The emperor paſſed the winter in Thrace and Illyricum; for he was on the third of February at Heraclea, and on the fifteenth of March at Sirmium. From thence he went to Milan, and from Milan to Rome, where he was on the eighth of July; but he did not ſtay long there, being, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, in the beginning of October at Spoletum, on the twenty-third of the ſame month at Milan, and on the laſt day of December at Sirmium [f]. Zoſimus, a declared enemy to Conſtantine, writes, that the whole Roman people loaded him with injuries and curſes, for having abandoned the religion of his anceſtors, and promoted with great zeal the worſhip of an unknown God; and adds, that the diſreſpect and averſion which the Romans ſhewed him prompted him to transfer the ſeat of the empire to Byzantium [g]. Libanius tells us, that he bore with great patience the ſatires and lampoons, that were daily publiſhed againſt him during his ſtay at Rome. He left the city highly diſſatisfied with the diſreſpectful behaviour of the Roman people, and was never after prevailed upon to return to it [h]. But the moſt remarkable event of this year was the death of Criſpus, Conſtantine's eldeſt ſon. The empreſs Fauſta, jealous of the great reputation he had acquired, and piqued to ſee him preferred to her own children, falſly accuſed him of having ſolicited her to inceſt. Some ſay, that ſhe charged him with aſpiring at the ſovereignty. Be that as it will, Conſtantine, hearkening to the accuſation, and not only forgetting on this occaſion his uſual clemency, but acting contrary to all laws of juſtice and equity, without examining an accuſation of ſuch importance, without giving the accuſed prince room to clear himſelf, ordered him to be put to death. Some write, that he

He is inſulted by the Roman people.

[d] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 25. [e] Cod. Theodoſ. tit. 5. p. 397. [f] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 28, [g] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 686. [h] Liban. orat. xv. p. 412.

he was diſpatched with poiſon; others, that by the emperor's orders his head was ſtruck off. He was, according to the moſt probable opinion, executed at Pola, in Iſtria, on the firſt of March, being then in the thirtieth, or, as others will have it, only in the twenty-fifth, year of his age. He was a prince of extraordinary endowments, had ſignalized himſelf in a very eminent manner againſt the Franks and in the war with Licinius, and was univerſally beloved by the people and ſoldiery, on account of his bravery, his obliging behaviour to perſons of all ranks, his generoſity, and other princely qualities. He had in all likelihood embraced the chriſtian religion, nay, and been baptized, according to Baronius; but the authority of Nicephorus, whom that writer quotes, is of no great weight with us. The death of Criſpus was followed by that of young Licinius, Conſtantine's nephew, at that time in the twelfth year of his age [i]. St. Jerom ſtyles theſe executions the effect of an unheard-of cruelty [k]. Fauſta did not long out-live her ſon-in-law; for, being this very year convicted of having accuſed him falſly, and moreover of having proſtituted her honour to perſons of the meaneſt rank, Conſtantine cauſed her to be ſuffocated with the ſteam of a hot bath [l]. With Fauſta many perſons of diſtinction, ſuppoſed to have been acceſſory to her crimes, were condemned, and either privately diſpatched with poiſon, or publicly executed [m]. Evagrius, to excuſe Conſtantine, denies all theſe facts [n]; but they are too well atteſted, both by the Greek and Latin hiſtorians, to be denied, or even called in queſtion. Euſebius, in his eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, which he publiſhed before the death of Criſpus, beſtows the higheſt encomiums upon that prince, and tells us, that he had great ſhare in the victory gained over Licinius [o]; but in the life of Conſtantine, he ſuppreſſes thoſe encomiums, and though he deſcribes at length that memorable victory, yet he does not ſo much as mention the name of Criſpus. This ſilence is, in our opinion, a ſtrong argument againſt Evagrius, who pretends the above-mentioned facts to have been feigned by the enemies of Conſtantine, becauſe he does not find them in Euſebius; but as they are ſufficiently atteſted by ſeveral other credible writers, we ought rather to infer from the ſilence of Euſebius, that he was well appriſed nothing could be alledged to excuſe Conſtantine, and therefore took no notice of thoſe executions, chuſing rather to incur the cenſure of having tranſgreſſed the known laws of hiſtory, than to take upon him the juſtifying of facts, which all the world but too juſtly condemned. This inexcuſeable cruelty and injuſtice in Conſtantine drew down upon his family divine vengeance; for his brothers, his nephews, and his favourite miniſters, were, ſoon after his death, all maſſacred by Conſtantius, his ſecond ſon by Fauſta, whom he loved and cheriſhed above the reſt. Conſtantine his eldeſt ſon was killed by Conſtans the youngeſt, Conſtans by Magnentius, Gallus their couſin by Conſtantius, and Conſtantius by Julian, the brother of Gallus. Julian periſhed in a moſt miſerable manner, and in him ended the numerous family of Conſtantine, which every one expected, would have furniſhed the empire with princes for many ages, the emperor having three brothers, four ſons, ſeveral ſiſters and daughters, and nine nephews [p]. Conſtantine ſeems to have paſſed the following year 327, when Conſtantius and Maximus were conſuls, in Illyricum and Thrace; for on the twenty-ſeventh of February he was at Theſſalonica, on the eighteenth of May at Sardica, and at Heraclea on the fifth of Auguſt. He probably paſſed the following winter at Nicomedia; for he was in that city on the firſt of March [q].

He puts his ſon Criſpus to death.

And likewiſe his nephew Licinius, and his wife Fauſta.

[i] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 685. Aur. Vict. p. 527. Ammian. l. xiv. p. 29. Eutrop. p. 588. [k] Hier. chron. [l] Zoſ. p. 685. Vict. epit. Philoſtorg. hiſt. eccleſ. 470. Ammian. p. 56. Hier. chron. [m] Eutrop. p. 588. [n] Evag. l. iii. c. 41. p. 371. [o] Euſeb. l. x. c. 9. p. 398, 399.

His cruelty and injuſtice puniſhed by heaven.

This year, Conſtantine granted the privileges of a city to the village of Drepanum in Bithynia, ſtyling it, from the name of his mother, Helenopolis. This honour he beſtowed upon the place out of reſpect to the holy martyr Lucianus, who had ſuffered under Maximin in the year 312, and was interred there [r]. About this time the empreſs Helena is ſaid to have diſcovered the ſepulchre and croſs of our Saviour, which induced Conſtantine to build at Jeruſalem the famous church of the reſurrection, which was conſecrated in the year 335 [s].

Makes Drepanum a city.

The pious princeſs died ſoon after in the arms of her ſon, who cauſed her body to be conveyed with great pomp to Rome, and to be interred in the burying place of the emperors [t]. To honour her memory, he gave the name of Helenopolis to a city of Paleſtine [u], and that of Helenopontus to a part of the Euxine ſea [w], and cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to her

The empreſs Helena dies.

[p] Julian. ad Athen. p. 497, 498. [q] Cod. Theod. p. 29. [r] Hier. chron. p. 662. Socrat. l. i. c. 18. p. 49. [s] Philoſtorg. hiſt. eccleſ. l. ii. c. 12. p. 474. [t] Theodoret. l. i. c. 17. p. 564. Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iii. c. 47. p. 506. [u] Sozom. l. ii. c. 1. p. 443. [w] Cod. Juſt. p. 235.

her honour at Daphne near Antioch. From this ſtatue the ſtreet in which it ſtood took the name of Auguſtal [x]. The following year, Januarius and Juſtus being conſuls, Conſtantine was, as we have hinted above, on the firſt of March at Nicomedia, and on the thirteenth of July at a place in Mœſia called Oiſcos and Eſcos[y]; whence ſome conjecture, that he was waging war with the barbarians in thoſe parts: and indeed we read in the chronicle of Alexandria [z], that this year the emperor paſſed the Danube ſeveral times, and that he even laid a bridge over that river. Both the Victors mention this bridge among his other great works; and on ſeveral antient coins of this and the following years, notice is taken of a bridge, of his paſſing the Danube, and his defeating the Goths [a]. According to the chronicle of Alexandria [b], he began this year the city of Conſtantinople; but, according to others, on the twenty-ſixth of September of the following year 329. Notwithſtanding his zeal for the catholic faith, he recalled this year from baniſhment the two biſhops Euſebius and Theognis, great ſticklers for the doctrine of Arius, and ſuffered them to gain a great aſcendant over him. The next year Conſtantine took upon him his eighth conſulſhip, having his eldeſt ſon, the fourth time conſul, for his collegue. He paſſed this whole year in the neighbourhood of the Danube; for on the nineteenth of June he was at Sardica in Dacia; on the twenty-ſecond of July at Sirmium in Pannonia; on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month at Naiſſus in Dardania; on the third of Auguſt at Heraclea in Thrace; on the eighteenth of the ſame month, and twenty-ninth of September, at Sardica; and on the twenty-fifth of October at Heraclea [c].

The emperor recals from baniſhment two Arian biſhops.

The following year 330, when Gallicanus and Symmachus were conſuls, is remarkable for the dedication of the city of Conſtantinople, the greateſt of all Conſtantine's works. Authors are divided in their opinions with reſpect to the motives that prompted Conſtantine to undertake the building of that city. Zoſimus writes, that he did it out of hatred to the Romans, ſeeing himſelf ſcorned and inſulted by them for having embraced and introduced a new religion [d]. He had, according to Eutropius, nothing elſe in view but to diſplay his power, and ſhew, that, in a few years, he could build a city equal to Rome, which, for ſo many ages, had been not undeſervedly

Conſtantine undertakes the building of a new city

[x] Suid. p. 448. [y] Cod. Theod. p. 30. [z] Chron. Alexand. p. 662. [a] Birag. p. 467. [b] Chron. Alex. p. 602. [c] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 30, 31. & l. xi. tit. 30. leg. 15. p 236, 237. [d] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 686.

vedly looked upon as the wonder of the univerſe [e]. Others only tell us, that Conſtantine, diſliking Rome for motives unknown to them, reſolved to build a city elſewhere, and reſide there. That he diſliked Rome, whatever his motives were, is very plain; for though he had been maſter of that metropolis near twenty years, yet he had never made any long ſtay in it, but paſſed moſt of his time in Gaul, and, after his victory over Licinius, in Thrace. Sozomen writes, that Conſtantine, ſeeing himſelf abſolute maſter of the whole empire, and not being diſturbed by any domeſtic tumults or foreign wars, undertook the building of a new city, as a work worthy of a great prince, and reſolved, as he did not care to reſide at Rome, to ſettle the imperial ſeat there [f]. The firſt place he choſe for executing his deſign was between Troas and antient Ilium, on the coaſt of Aſia; but afterwards changing his mind upon a viſion which he had, or imagined to have had, he reſolved to enlarge the antient city of Byzantium, and make it the ſecond, or, if he could, the firſt, of the empire. This pretended viſion is much ſpoken of by the modern Greek and Latin writers [g]; and Conſtantine himſelf, in one of his laws, declares, that, in the choice of the place, he followed the directions of heaven [h].

He enlarges the city of Byzantium.

gan with extending the walls of the antient city from ſea to ſea; and while ſome of the workmen were buſied in rearing them, others were employed in raiſing within them a great number of ſtately buildings, and among the reſt a palace noways inferior in magnificence and extent to that of Rome. As he deſigned to fix his own court there, and was deſirous, that the ſucceeding emperors ſhould follow his example, and honour his new city with their ordinary reſidence, he ſpared no coſt or labour to render it both beautiful and convenient.

Adorns it with many new buildings.

With this view he built a new capitol and amphitheatre, made a circus maximus, ſeveral forums, porticoes, and public baths, and divided the whole city into fourteen regions, ſecuring the inhabitants with many wholſome laws, and granting them great privileges and immunities. By this means Byzantium became in a ſhort time one of the moſt flouriſhing and populous cities of the empire, whole families flocking thither from all parts, eſpecially from Pontus, Thrace, and Aſia, Conſtantine having appointed by a law enacted this year, year, that ſuch as had lands in thoſe countries, ſhould not be able to diſpoſe of them, nor even leave them at their death to their heirs, unleſs they had a houſe in his new city. The common people were enticed thither from the different and moſt diſtant provinces, and even from Rome itſelf, by the emperor's largeſſes, and the great quantities of corn, oil, and meat, which were daily diſtributed among them [i]. But however deſirous the emperor was to ſee his new city filled with people, yet he did not care it ſhould be inhabited by any but chriſtians; and therefore cauſed all the idols to be pulled down, and their temples to be conſecrated to the true God. He built beſides an incredible number of churches, and cauſed croſſes to be erected in all the ſquares and public places. When moſt of the buildings were finiſhed, the emperor, on the eleventh of May of the year 330, the twenty-fifth of his reign, cauſed his new city, by a very ſolemn dedication, to be conſecrated, according to Cedrenus, to the virgin Mary [k]; but, according to Euſebius [l], to the God of martyrs. Some modern Greek writers tell us, that this ceremony was performed by the fathers of the council of Nice, that the ſolemnity laſted forty days, and that Conſtantine, during the whole time, cauſed an immenſe quantity of all ſorts of proviſions to be daily diſtributed among the populace [m]. It was on this occaſion that Conſtantine ſtyled the new city from his own name Conſtantinople, or the city of Conſtantine, and likewiſe Second, or, as others will have it, New Rome [n]. At the ſame time he equalled it to antient Rome, granting it the ſame rights, immunities, and privileges enjoyed by that metropolis [o]. He eſtabliſhed a ſenate and other magiſtrates, with a power and authority equal to that of the Roman ſenate [p], and declared New Rome the metropolis of the eaſt, as Old Rome was of the weſt. Conſtantine, having accompliſhed this great work, according to ſome in five, according to others in two, years, fixed his reſidence in the new city, and never more returned to Rome. The removal of the imperial ſeat from Rome to Conſtantinople, happened in the year of the chriſtian æra 330, the twenty-fifth of Conſtantine's reign, and 1078, after the foundation of Rome. By this removal the Roman empire received a fatal ſtroke, and ſhrunk by degrees into nothing, as the reader will find in the ſequel of this hiſtory.

[e] Eutrop. p. 488. [f] Soz. l. ii. c. 3. p. 444. [g] Vide Du Cange urb. Conſtantinop. deſcript. l. i. p. 23, &c. [h] Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 64. [i] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 687. Soz. p. 444. Socrat. l. ii. c. 13. p. 90.

And ſolemnly conſecrates it, and equals it to Rome.

[k] Vide Du Cange de Conſtantinop. l. i. p. 27. [l] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iii. c. 48. p. 507. [m] Vide Georg. cod. in antiq. Conſtantinop. p. 25. [n] Socrat. p. 45. [o] Sozom. l. ii. c. 3. p. 444. [p] Cod. Theod. l. xiv. tit. 13. leg. 1. p. 220, 223.

CHAP. XXVI.

The Roman hiſtory, from the removal of the imperial ſeat to Conſtantinople, to the death of the emperor Julian.

CONSTANTINE having fixed his court at Conſtantinople, continued there, as appears from three dates of ſeveral laws [q], great part of the enſuing year 331, when Baſſius and Ablavius were conſuls, being chiefly employed in building new churches, and adorning with other ſtately monuments the city he deſired might be honoured with the reſidence of the ſucceeding emperors. The next year, Pacatianus and Hilarius being conſuls, the Sarmatians having implored the aſſiſtance of Conſtantine againſt the Goths, who had made an irruption into their country, and committed every-where unheard-of cruelties, the emperor, either in perſon, or, as ſome write, by his ſon Conſtantine, gained a memorable victory over them on the twentieth of April. Near an hundred thouſand of the enemy were either cut in pieces, or periſhed after the battle with hunger and cold; inſomuch, that the barbarians were obliged to ſue for peace, and deliver up hoſtages to the emperor, among whom was the ſon of their king, Ariaric or Araric [r]. Sozomen and Socrates write, that the Goths acknowledging the power of the God adored by Conſtantine, who had miraculouſly aſſiſted him in this war, great numbers of them embraced the chriſtian religion, which had been firſt preached among them about ſeventy years before [s]. The Sarmatians, unmindful of the aſſiſtance they had received from Conſtantine, as ſoon as he withdrew with his victorious army, began to ravage the provinces of Mœſia and Thrace; but the emperor, returning with incredible expedition, fell upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and forced the reſt to ſubmit to what terms he was pleaſed to impoſe upon them [t]. The next conſuls were Dalmatius, either the brother or nephew of Conſtantine, and Xenophilus, or Zenophylus. This year Conſtantine created Conſtans, his youngeſt Conſtantine gains a complete victory over the Goths.

And the Sarmatians.

[q] Cod. Theod. p. 353, & ſeq. [r] Ammian. p. 476. Jul. orat. i. p. 16. Euſeb. vit. Conſtant. l. iv. p. 529. [s] Soz. p. 48. Socrat. p. 411. [t] Anonym. p. 476.

youngeſt ſon, Cæſar, who was born in 320, and is ſtyled in all the antient inſcriptions Flavius Julius Conſtans [u]. The ſame year, Syria, Cilicia, and Thrace were grievouſly afflicted with a peſtilence and famine, which ſwept off incredible numbers of people. Theophanes tells us, that at Antioch, the wheat was ſold at four hundred pieces of ſilver the buſhel [w]. During this calamity, Conſtantine ſent to the biſhop of Antioch thirty thouſand buſhels, and an incredible quantity of corn, oil, and all ſorts of proviſions to the other churches, to be divided among the widows, orphans, eccleſiaſtics, &c. Towards the cloſe of this year, embaſſadors arrived at Conſtantinople from the Blemyes, the Indians, the Ethiopians, and Perſians, with rich preſents for the emperor, whoſe friendſhip they courted, acknowledging him, ſays Euſebius [y], for their ſovereign, and declaring, that they coveted nothing ſo much as to live in peace and amity with ſo great a prince, ſo renowned a warrior. The Perſian embaſſadors, in the name of Sapor their king, renewed the antient treaties between the two empires. Conſtantine received them with extraordinary marks of honour; and being informed that the chriſtians were very numerous in Perſia, he was tranſported with joy; and looking upon himſelf as their general protector, he wrote a letter in their behalf to Sapor, which is related at length by Euſebius [z] and Theodoret [a]. The letters from Conſtantine to the biſhops, begging their prayers, and thoſe both from him and his children to the great Antony for the ſame purpoſe, which we read in Euſebius [b], Athanaſius [c], Sozomen [d], and Proſper [e], are ſuppoſed to have been written this year. The following year, when Optatus and Anicius Paulinus Junior were conſuls, the Goths, under the command of Geberic their king, who had ſucceeded Araric, made new irruptions into the country of the Sarmatians, whom they defeated in a great battle fought on the banks of the Mariſus, in which their king, by name Wiſimar, and moſt of their chiefs, were cut in pieces. The Sarmatians in this extremity armed their ſlaves, and by their means gained a complete victory over the Goths; but the victorious ſlaves, ſenſible of their ſtrength, threw off the yoke, and turning their

The emperor's generoſity during a famine.

Embaſſadors ſent to him from the moſt diſtant nations.

[u] Euſeb. ibid. p. 533. [w] Theoph. p. 23. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Euſeb. ibid. l. i. c. 8. p. 409, 410. [z] Idem ibid. c. 9—13. p. 350—535. [a] Theod. l. i. c. 24. p. 573—575. [b] Euſeb. ibid. l. iv. c. 14. p. 533. [c] Athan. vit. Anton. p. 497. [d] Soz. p. 47. [e] Proſp. chron.

their arms againſt their maſters, for whoſe defence they had been entruſted with them, drove them out of the country, and ſeized their houſes, lands, and effects for themſelves. St. Jerom [f] and Ammianus Marcellinus [g] call theſe ſlaves Limigantes; and the former tells us, that, in his time, the free-born among the Sarmatians were ſtyled Arcaragantes. The Sarmatians, thus driven from their habitations, fled for refuge to Conſtantine, who received them, to the number of three hundred thouſand, incorporated in his legions ſuch of them as were fit for ſervice, and gave ſettlements to the reſt in Thrace, Scythia, Macedon, and Italy [h]. Another party of the fugitive Sarmatians had recourſe to certain barbarians, called by Ammianus Victohales, and ſuppoſed to be the ſame people with the Quadi Ultramontani. Theſe were re-eſtabliſhed in their antient poſſeſſions by the Romans in the year 358, after they had driven out the Ligimantes [i]. This year Euſebius, biſhop of Cæſarea, pronounced before Conſtantine his ſpeech on the holy ſepulchre; and returning afterwards to his dioceſe, wrote and inſcribed to Conſtantine a book on the feaſt of Eaſter; for which the emperor returned him thanks by a very kind and reſpectful letter, deſiring him at the ſame time to cauſe fifty copies of the holy ſcriptures to be tranſcribed, and ſent him for the uſe of the churches of Conſtantinople. Euſebius immediately complied with his requeſt, and, in his anſwer to him, acquainted him with the converſion of Maiuma, the port of Gaza in Paleſtine, of the city of Conſtantina in Phœnicia, and of ſeveral others; which gave Conſtantine an inexpreſſible pleaſure [k]. The learned cardinal Noris takes Conſtantina to be the city and iſland of Aradus; for a biſhop of that place, by name Atticus, ſtyled himſelf biſhop of Aradia Conſtantia; which the above-mentioned writer ſuppoſes to have been, through miſtake, put inſtead of Aradus Conſtantina [l]. Conſtantine was this year, on the ſeventeenth of June, at Conſtantinople, on the fifth of July at Singidunum in Mœſia, and on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt at Naiſſus in Dacia [m]. The next conſuls were Flavius Julius Conſtantius, the emperor's brother, and Rufius Albinus. As Conſtantine, on the twenty-fifth of July of this year 335, entered the thirtieth year of his reign, which had happened to

He allots the Sarmatians ſettlements in the dominions of Rome.

[f] Hier. chron. [g] Ammian. l. xvii. p. 107. [h] Euſeb. p. 529. Ammian. p. 478. Jornand. rer. Goth. p. 641. [i] Ammian. l. vii. p. 106. & l. xvii. p. 105—111. [k] Euſeb. ibid. p. 542—545. [l] Noris. epoch. p. 363. Concil. tom. 4. p. 921. [m] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 34.

to no emperor ever ſince the time of Auguſtus, he celebrated that day at Conſtantinople with extraordinary pomp and magnificence; and ſoon after aſſembled two councils, the one at Tyre, hoping by that means to appeaſe the diſturbances raiſed in the church by the followers of Arius; the other a few weeks after at Jeruſalem, to conſecrate the magnificent church which he had built there. But the council of Tyre condemned, for ſeveral pretended crimes, and depoſed, the great Athanaſius, biſhop of Alexandria; and that of Jeruſalem admitted Arius and his followers to the communion of the church. The emperor, miſled by the Arians, eſpecially by Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia, and by a prieſt, whom his ſiſter Conſtantia, the widow of Licinius, had earneſtly recommended to him on her death-bed, conformed to the deciſions of both councils; and though the crimes laid to the charge of Athanaſius were evidently falſe, yet he was ſo far prepoſſeſſed againſt him, that, inſtead of examining the accuſations, when he appealed to his tribunal, he baniſhed him into Gaul, and at the ſame time depoſed and ſent into exile three other biſhops, viz. Euſtathius of Antioch, Aſclepas of Gaza, and Lucas of Adrianople, for zealouſly oppoſing the wicked and impious tenets of Arius [n]. The emperor, not ſatisfied with having created his three ſons, Conſtantine, Conſtantius, and Conſtans, Cæſars, raiſed this year, on the eighteenth or twenty-fourth of September, to the ſame dignity his nephew Dalmatius, ſon to his brother of the ſame name, and appointed Annibalianus, brother to young Dalmatius, king of Pontus [o]. Soon after their promotion, the emperor, to prevent any miſunderſtanding, jealouſy, or quarrels between his nephews and children, divided the government of the empire among them in the following manner: Conſtantine, the eldeſt, had Gaul, Spain, and Britain; Conſtantius, the ſecond ſon, all the Orient; that is, Aſia, Syria, and Egypt; and Conſtans, the youngeſt, Illyricum, Italy, and Africa. To his nephew Dalmatius he gave Thrace and part of Illyricum; that is, Macedon and Achaia; and to king Annibalianus, his other nephew, Armenia Minor and the neighbouring provinces; that is, Pontus and Cappadocia, with the city of Cæſarea, which he deſired might be the capital of his kingdom [p]. About this time one Calocerus, a man of great intereſt and authority in the iſland of Cyprus,

The council of Tyre and Jeruſalem.

Conſtantine favours the Arians.

Divides the empire amongſt his children and nephews.

[n] Euſeb. ibid. p. 545. & 510. [o] Eutrop. p. 588. Aur. Vict. p. 227. Chron. Alex. p. 668. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 692. [p] Euſeb. orat. in tricennal. Conſt. p. 609. Vict. epit. p. 544. Anonym. p. 476.

Cyprus, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor there, and made himſelf maſter of the whole iſland. But Dalmatius, who was ſent with an army againſt him, defeated the rebel, took him priſoner, and carrying him to Tarſus in Cilicia, condemned him to be burnt alive in that city [q]. On an antient medal quoted by Spanhemius [r], mention is made of one Tiberius, who uſurped the ſovereignty in the time of Conſtantine; but of him we find nothing in hiſtory. As for one Azotus, who was overcome by Conſtantine, as we read in Suidas and Codinus, it appears from ſeveral epigrams in the anthology, that both he and that Conſtantine, by whom he was overcome, were but drivers of chariots in the circus. Athanaſius was accuſed of having ſupplied with money a rebel, by name Philumenes [s]; but of him not the leaſt mention is made in hiſtory. The emperor was this year at Conſtantinople on the thirtieth of March, at Viminacum in Mœſia on the twelfth of Auguſt, and again at Conſtantinople on the twenty-ſecond of October [t]. The following year, Nepotianus and Facundus being conſuls, died the famous hereſiarch Arius, and ſoon after him Alexander biſhop of Conſtantinople, whom Conſtantine had ſolicited in vain to re-admit the anathematized heretic to the communion of the church. The holy biſhop Paul was raiſed to the ſee of Conſtantinople in the room of Alexander; but the emperor was perſuaded by Euſebius, biſhop of Nicomedia, to baniſh him into Pontus [u]. Towards the cloſe of this year Conſtantine married his ſecond ſon Conſtantius to the daughter of Julius Conſtantius and Galla. Julius Conſtantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla ſiſter to Rufinus and Cerealis, of whom hereafter. He had by Galla Gallus Cæſar, born in Hetruria in the year 325 or 326, another ſon, who was killed in 337, and one daughter, married this year to Conſtantius, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us. The emperor Julian, ſpeaking of this and other marriages between the nephews and nieces of Conſtantine, ſays that a ſtrange confuſion reigned in the imperial family; that marriages were celebrated which were no marriages; and that the laws, both human and divine, were profaned and troden under foot [w]. But there were yet no laws forbidding marriages between couſin-germans. On occaſion of this marriage, Arius dies.

Conſtantius married to the daughter of Julius Conſtantius.

[q] Theoph p. 23. Aur. Vict. p. 296. [r] Spanh. l. vi. p. 601. [s] Athan. apol. 2. p. 779. [t] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 35. [u] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iv. c. 49. p. 551. [w] Julian. orat. vii. p. 425.

riage, Conſtantine cauſed large ſums, and great quantities of proviſions, to be diſtributed among the people in all the cities and provinces of the empire [x]. He had long before married his eldeſt ſon Conſtantine; but to whom, we are no-where told. The year enſuing, when Felicianus and Titianus were conſuls, the Perſians, after having lived in peace with the Romans for the ſpace of forty years; that is, ever ſince the year 297, began to commit hoſtilities in Meſopotamia, becauſe the emperor refuſed to reſtore to them the five provinces which they had been obliged to yield to Galerius. Hereupon Conſtantine having drawn together a very numerous and powerful army, and made the other neceſſary preparations for a vigorous war, began his march, with a deſign to invade the Perſian dominions. But in the mean time the enemy, terrified at his approach, diſpatched embaſſadors to him, with propoſals of an accommodation; which ſeeming very reaſonable to the emperor, a peace was concluded, and both armies withdrew. Thus Euſebius [y]. But Feſtus and moſt other hiſtorians tell us, that Conſtantine, deſirous of triumphing over the Perſians, would not grant them a peace upon any terms, and that by death alone he was prevented from invading their dominions [z]. Be that as it will, Conſtantine, having celebrated this year with extraordinary ſolemnity the feaſt of Eaſter, which fell on the third of April, was ſoon after taken ill, being then in the ſixty-fourth year of his age. He had recourſe to the warm baths of Conſtantinople; but his diſtemper encreaſing, he removed, for change of air, to Helenopolis in Bithynia, and from thence to a caſtle at a ſmall diſtance from Nicomedia, called Achyrona, or Aguyrona. Being there appriſed, that his end approached, he declared in a ſpeech, which he made to the biſhops who attended him, his eager deſire of being baptized, adding, that he deſigned to have received that ſeal of ſalvation in the waters of the Jordan; but ſince God, in his infinite wiſdom, had otherwiſe diſpoſed of him, he acquieſced to his will. When the ceremony was over, he was clad in white, and would not afterwards ſo much as touch or ſee his purple robes, paſſing moſt of his time in pious meditations, and edifying diſcourſes with the biſhops on the immortality of the ſoul, and the rewards and puniſhments of another life. Some of the officers of the army, who were admitted into his room, expreſſing with a flood of tears their concern for the loſs of ſo good a prince,

The Perſians awed by the terror of Conſtantine's army.

Conſtantine taken ill.

He is baptized.

[x] Euſeb. ibid. p. 551. [y] Euſeb. ibid. p. 554, 555. [z] Feſt. p. 57. Liban. orat. iii. p. 120. Eutrop. p. 117.

prince, he told them, That they ought rather to rejoice than mourn, ſince he was going to exchange a ſhort and miſerable, for an eternal, life, happy beyond conception or expreſſion [a]. St. Jerom writes, that he was baptized by Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia; and that, by receiving baptiſm at his hands, he fell into the hereſy of Arius [b]. But Athanaſius and all other eccleſiaſtical writers, Lucifer alone excepted, aſſure us, that he held always inviolate the faith of the council of Nice, tho', deceived and miſled by the Arians, he perſecuted thoſe who defended it againſt the tenets of that hereſiarch. As for Euſebius, though he held, yet he did not openly profeſs, the doctrine of Arius; nor was he cut off from the communion of the church. As he was therefore biſhop of the place, Conſtantine could not decline being baptized by him, without openly affronting him, and likewiſe tranſgreſſing the laws of the church. Before he died, he ordered the great Athanaſius to be recalled from baniſhment, notwithſtanding the warm remonſtrances of Euſebius of Nicomedia, who did all that lay in his power to prevent the return of that zealous champion of the true faith [c]. He probably ordered at the ſame time the other catholic biſhops to be recalled; for Athanaſius tells us, that they were all reſtored with him to their reſpective ſees by the children of Conſtantine [d]. By his laſt will he bequeathed ſome revenues to the city of Rome, and others to that of Conſtantinople. He likewiſe confirmed the above-mentioned diviſion of the empire among his three ſons and two nephews [e]. The emperor Julian writes, that he committed to Conſtantius, his ſecond ſon, the care of all things, appointing him in a manner his executor, either becauſe he loved him above the reſt, or becauſe Conſtantius, who was nearer, arrived before the reſt, at leaſt before Conſtantine the eldeſt, who was then in Gaul [f]. But it is certain, that the emperor died before any of his children arrived, though he had diſpatched expreſſes to them all as ſoon he found himſelf paſt recovery. Not long therefore before he expired, he privately put his will into the hands of an eccleſiaſtic, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence, not knowing him to be a follower of Arius, and obliged him to promiſe upon oath not to deliver it to any but Conſtantius. This commiſſion proved very

He orders Athanaſius to be recalled from baniſhment.

He dies, and is univerſally lamented

[a] Euſeb. c. 62. p. 557, 558. Socrat. l. i. c. 39. p. 75. [b] Hier. chron. [c] Sozom. l. iii. c. 2. p. 498. Athan. apol. 2. p. 806. [d] Athan. ſolit. p, 814. [e] Socrat. l. i. c. 39. p. 75. Soz. l. ii. c. 34. p. 495. [f] Julian. orat. l. ii. p. 83 & 175.

very prejudicial to the church, on account of the credit which it procured to the eccleſiaſtic and his ſect with the new emperor [g]. Conſtantine having ſettled matters in the manner he judged beſt both for the church and ſtate, after various pious ejaculations, expired about noon on the twenty-ſecond of May, that year 337, Whitſunday, after having lived according to the moſt probable opinion, ſixty-three years, two months, and twenty-five days, and reigned thirty years, nine months, and twenty-ſeven days. His death was bewailed by perſons of all ranks, as the greateſt misfortune that could befal the empire. The ſoldiers no ſooner heard of it, than they tore their cloaths, fell proſtrate on the ground, and gave other public teſtimonies of their deep concern, calling him their deliverer, their beloved leader, their common parent. The people of Conſtantinople, overwhelmed with ſorrow, and drowned in tears, for the loſs of their great benefactor, of their magnificent and generous founder, expreſſed their grief in a manner ſuitable to ſo general a calamity [h]. Meſſengers were immediately diſpatched with the diſmal tidings to his children, and in the mean time the body of the deceaſed prince, with the purple and diadem, was put into a golden coffin, and conveyed to Conſtantinople, being attended by all the troops quartered in that neighbourhood, who had aſſembled upon the firſt notice of his death. It was expoſed to public view in the chief hall of the palace, with an infinite number of tapers burning round it in golden candleſtics. All the great officers both civil and military, the ſenate, and other perſons of diſtinction, came to pay their devoirs to the corſe, kneeling before it, as if the emperor had been ſtill alive. Court was kept in the ſame manner as when he was living, and thoſe who attended his perſon, came at the uſual hours, as if he had ſtill wanted their attendance. This empty honour, formerly paid to the deceaſed emperors, as appears from Herodian and other writers, ſeems to have been long before laid aſide, and to have been revived now in honour of Conſtantine. His children were daily expected to pay him the laſt duty; but Conſtantius alone came, the other two being probably at a great diſtance; and ſoon after his arrival, cauſed the corſe to be conveyed with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence to the famous church of the Apoſtles, which the emperor had built cloſe to the palace, deſiring to be interred terred in it, that he might, after his death, ſays Euſebius [k], partake of the prayers offered there by the faithful in honour of the holy Apoſtles. That magnificent ſtructure was built in the form of a croſs, and covered, not with tiles, but gilt braſs. Conſtantine and the ſucceeding emperors were buried, not in the church itſelf, but in the porch, where mauſoleums were erected for them, and a burying-place allotted for the biſhops of the city; the prieſthood, ſays Sozomen [l], claiming equal honour and reſpect with the imperial dignity, eſpecially in holy places, where it holds the firſt rank. This church had been conſecrated a little before Conſtantine's death. Conſtantius attended the body to the church, but withdrew with the ſoldiers, as he had not yet been baptized, when the miniſters of the church began the holy ceremonies [m]. As ſoon as they were over, the body was depoſited in the porch, where Conſtantius cauſed a magnificent mauſoleum to be raiſed over it [n]. Not many years after, that is, in 358, or 359, the porch being ready to fall, the body of the emperor was conveyed from thence to the church of St. Aacius, a native of Conſtantinople, and martyr, built likewiſe by Conſtantine [o]; but it was afterwards carried back to the church of the Apoſtles [p], where it was to be ſeen, with the bodies of other princes of the ſame family, many ages after. Though Conſtantine had never made any conſiderable ſtay at Rome, and had in the end entirely abandoned that metropolis, yet the people expreſſed an uncommon concern for his death; for they no ſooner heard of it, than they ſhut up their ſhops and public baths, and intermitted all kinds of ſports and diverſions, as was uſual in time of ſome great and general calamity. They all demanded with one voice, that his body might be brought to Rome; and expreſſed the greateſt concern imaginable, when they underſtood, that it was, by his will, to remain at Conſtantinople [q]. It appears from ſome antient coins, that the ſenate of Rome conferred divine honours upon him [r]. He was by moſt churches, eſpecially in the eaſt, honoured as a ſaint, as he is ſtill by the chriſtians in Egypt, and the Greek church, which ſolemnizes his feſtival on the twenty-firſt of May with a very ſolemn office. The Muſcovites celebrate his anniverſary on the ſame day, though they can give no reaſon for their preferring that day to the twenty-ſecond of the ſame.

Honours done him after his death.

[g] Socrat. p. 75. Zoſ. p. 496. Theodor. p. 585. Rufin. p. 167. [h] Euſeb. c. 65. p. 559.

His obſequies.

He is honoured by the eaſtern churches as a ſaint.

[k] Euſeb. p. 555, 556. [l] Sozom. l. c. 34. p. 469. [m] Euſeb. c. 71. p. 562. [n] Idem ibid. & Julian. orat. i. p. 29. [o] Socrat. l. ii. c. 38. p. 145. [p] Chryſoſt. 2. Cor. [q] Aur. Vict. p. 527. Euſeb. c. 69. p. 561. [r] Goltz. p. 128.

ſame month, on which he died, as is agreed on by all writers, both antient and modern. About the middle of the fifth century, extraordinary honours were paid to his tomb, and to his ſtatue, which was ſet up upon a column of porphyry [s].

Encomiums beſtowed upon him by the modern Greeks.

The modern Greeks equal him to the apoſtles, as one to whom we all owe our being chriſtians: the apoſtles, ſay they, preached the goſpel in all parts of the world; but it never prevailed over paganiſm, till it was countenanced and eſtabliſhed by the great Conſtantine; which in reality is preferring the emperor to all the apoſtles. But of thoſe high flights, entirely ſuitable to the temper of the Greeks, we leave our readers to judge. All authors allow him to have been a prince endowed with extraordinary accompliſhments both of body and mind, an excellent commander, an able ſtateſman, a great encourager of learning, and himſelf much addicted to read, write, and meditate.

Authors diſagree as to his character.

But, as to his character in general, there is a great diſagreement among authors, ſome of the heathen writers painting him as a perfect tyrant, and the chriſtians extolling him as the beſt prince that ever ſwayed a ſceptre. The emperor Julian ſpeaks of him as a prince extremely ambitious of military glory, and one who had nothing ſo much at heart as the aggrandizing of himſelf and his family; and adds, that the bad example he ſet therein to his children, armed them againſt each other [t].

Several groundleſs charges brought againſt him by the pagan writers.

He is charged by ſome with having enriched the imperial robes with pearls not uſed before his time, and with conſtantly wearing the diadem. But this charge is quite groundleſs, it being certain, that Diocleſian was the firſt who added pearls to the imperial robes, and Conſtantius Chlorus the firſt who wore conſtantly the diadem, even when he was only Cæſar, as we read in Aurelius Victor [w] and Eutropius [x], and is evident from his medals [y]. The emperor Julian [z] and Zoſimus [a] repreſent him as a voluptuous prince, entirely abandoned to all manner of diverſions and pleaſures, to banquets and revellings, to public ſhews, &c. inſomuch, that he could ſpare no time from ſports and entertainments, to regulate the affairs of the ſtate. On the other hand, Victor [b], Euſebius [c], and Libanius [d], tell us, that he was conſtantly employed in reading,

[s] Theodoret. vit. Conſtant. l. i. c. 34. p. 66. [t] Jul. orat vii. p. 423, 424. [w] Aur. Vict. p. 523. [x] Eutrop. p. 586. [y] Spanh. p. 683. [z] Jul. Cæſ. p. 23, 42, 54. [a] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 687. [b] Vict. epit. p. 543. [c] Euſeb. p. 539. [d] Liban. orat. iii. p. 107.

ing, writing, meditating, compoſing ſpeeches, (ſome of which, of an extraordinary length, have reached our times) hearing embaſſies, giving audience to his miniſters and ſubjects; in ſhort, that he never was idle, but ever buſied either in forming or executing ſome great deſign or other for the good of the empire. Moſt of his laws were dictated by himſelf; he never continued long in any place, but was, as we have often obſerved, continually moving from one city or province to another; ſo that we cannot help thinking this charge as groundleſs as the former. Julian and Zoſimus, zealous ſticklers for idolatry, were evidently prejudiced againſt a prince, who had enacted ſo many ſevere laws againſt all manner of idolatrous worſhip. We are told, that he kept with him for the ſpace of thirty years one Samacus, who, pretending to be a fool, diverted the emperor when tired out with buſineſs. This was not a diverſion worthy of ſo great a prince. It proves, however, that Conſtantine applied himſelf ſeriouſly to buſineſs. Victor the younger, after having told us that he was addicted to raillery, gives us the following idea of his reign: Conſtantine, ſays he, reigned thirty years, and behaved the ten firſt like an excellent prince, the ten following like a robber, and the ten laſt like a prodigal [e]. The ſame charge is brought againſt him by Zoſimus, who writes, that, when he became maſter of the whole empire, he abandoned himſelf without controul to his rapacious temper, loading the people with heavy taxes, and at the ſame time ſquandering away the money thus raiſed upon undeſerving favourites, or uſeleſs buildings [f]. Amongſt the other impoſts with which that virulent writer pretends that Conſtantine oppreſſed the people, he mentions one called the chryſargyrum, and will have Conſtantine to have been the firſt who enacted it. But this Evagrius maintains to be a mere calumny, owing to the implacable hatred which that pagan bore to the deliverer of the church [g]. And truly long before Conſtantine's time a tax was laid upon the public proſtitutes, which moſt writers take to be meant by the chryſargyrum. Conſtantine, to ſave charges in raiſing it, ordered it to be paid only every fourth year. Zoſimus aſcribes to him another tax called follis, which was levied upon all perſons of quality, and occaſioned, according to that writer the ruin of all the cities of the empire [h]. But he is the only author who ſays, that it was introduced by Conſtantine Aureliu

[e] Vict. epit. p. 543. [f] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 685. [g] Evagr. iii. c. 40. p. 370. [h] Zoſ. p. 691.

Aurelius Victor writes in expreſs terms, that it was firſt raiſed by Maxentius [i]. In our opinion, it is not at all probable, that Conſtantine laid any new burdens upon the people, ſeeing he generouſly remitted to all his ſubjects the fourth part of the land-tax, and diſcharged ſeveral cities of contributions, which they had paid for the ſpace of an hundred and fifty years; among the reſt Tripolis in Libya, and Nice in Bithynia [k]. From an antient inſcription we learn, that one year he remitted all taxes throughout the empire [l]. Zoſimus writes, that, during his reign, rods, priſons, and all kinds of ſevere treatment, were made uſe of by him in levying the common taxes [m]; whereas the laws he enacted, forbidding theſe violences under the ſevereſt penalties, are ſtill extant, as we have obſerved above. Whence we leave the reader to judge what credit that implacable enemy to Conſtantine and the chriſtian religion deſerves. Zoſimus and Julian are rather accuſers than hiſtorians; and an accuſer is not to be believed, unleſs witneſſes can be produced to vouch what he ſays. Hence the accuſations brought againſt Conſtantine by theſe two writers, are of no weight with us, unleſs confirmed by the authority of other hiſtorians. Aurelius Victor [n], Ammianus Marcellinus [o], and even his panegyriſt Euſebius [p], complain of his employing, in the adminiſtration of affairs, perſons altogether unworthy of the confidence he repoſed in them, and ſuffering them to enrich themſelves at the expence of the people committed to their care. This fault, altogether inexcuſable in a prince, Euſebius aſcribes to his exceſſive goodneſs, which induced him to pardon, or only to inflict ſlight puniſhments on, ſuch of his miniſters as were found guilty of the moſt enormous extortions. He could not, ſays Euſebius, prevail upon himſelf to condemn thoſe whom he had once judged worthy of his favour; and hence his miniſters, preſuming upon his indulgence and good-nature, often committed great diſorders in the provinces, and oppreſſed the people in a moſt tyrannical manner. His thus neglecting to puniſh the crimes of his miniſters, rendered him, without all doubt, no leſs guilty than if he had committed them himſelf.

Several regulations introduced by Conſtantine.

We ſhall now proceed to ſeveral regulations in the government, both civil and military, thought to have been firſt introduced by Conſtantine. Before his time there were, according cording to Zoſimus [q], two captains of the guards, known by the name of præfecti prætorio, who had an equal authority over all the troops diſperſed in the ſeveral provinces of the empire. But Conſtantine, jealous of their too great power, leſſened it by creating two more, and allotting to each of them a certain number of provinces. By this means the whole empire was divided into four parts, which were the Orient, Illyricum, Italy, and Gaul, governed by the four præfecti prætorio, each of whom had ſeveral dioceſes or diſtricts under his juriſdiction. To the præfectus prætorio orientis were ſubjected the five following dioceſes; viz. Thrace, Aſia, Pontus, Egypt, and the Orient. Each of theſe dioceſes compriſed ſeveral provinces, as is manifeſt from the Theodoſian code, and the acts of ſeveral antient councils. The dioceſe of Thrace, whereof Heraclea, and afterwards Conſtantinople, was the metropolis, conſiſted of five provinces, viz. Europe, Thrace, Hemimuntum, Rhodope, Mœſia Secunda, or Lower Mœſia, and Scythia. The dioceſe of Aſia, which had Epheſus for its metropolis, compriſed ten provinces, viz. Pamphylia, the Helleſpont, Lydia, Piſidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia Pacatiana, Phrygia Salutaris, Lycia, Caria, and the iſlands of Rhodes, Leſbos, and the Cyclades. In the dioceſe of Pontus, the metropolis of which was Cæſarea in Cappadocia, were eleven provinces, viz. Paphlagonia, Galatia, Bithynia, Honoriades, Cappadocia Prima, Cappadocia Secunda, Pontus Polemonaicus, Helenopontus, Armenia Prima, Armenia Secunda, Galatia Salutaris. The dioceſe of Egypt which had Alexandria for its metropolis, conſiſted of ſix provinces, viz. Upper Libya, or Libya Pentapolitana, Lower Libya, Thebais, Egypt, Arcadia, and Auguſtamnica. The Orient compriſed fifteen provinces, the metropolis of which was Antioch: the provinces were, Palæſtina Prima, Palæſtina Secunda, Phœnicia Prima, Syria, Cilicia, Cyprus, Arabia, Iſauria, Palæſtina Salutaris, Phœnicia Libanenſis or Phœnicia Secunda, Euphratenſis, Syria Salutaris, Oſrhoene, Meſopotamia, Cilicia Secunda. The præfectus prætorio Illyrici had but two dioceſes under his juriſdiction, viz. Macedon, and Dacia; of which the former conſiſted of ſix provinces, viz. Achaia, Macedon, the iſland of Crete, Theſſaly, New and Old Epirus, and part of Macedonia Salutaris: the metropolis of this dioceſe was Theſſalonica. The dioceſe of Dacia compriſed five provinces, viz. Dacia Mediterranea, Dacia Ripenſis, Mœſia Prima, Dardania Prævalitana, and part

[i] Aur. Vict. p. 526. [k] Euſeb. p. 528. Aur. Vict. p. 527. [l] Vide Baron. ad ann. 312. [m] Zoſ. p. 691. [n] Aur. Vict. p. 527. [o] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68. [p] Euſeb. p. 540.

The præfecti prætorio, and diviſion of the empire into four prefectures.

[q] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 687.

part of Macedonia Salutaris. The præfectus prætorio Galliarum had three dioceſes under his juriſdiction, viz. Gaul, Spain, and Britain. In the dioceſe of Gaul were ſeventeen provinces, viz. Viennenſis, Lugdunenſis Prima, Germania Prima, Germania Secunda, Belgica Prima, Belgica Secunda, Alpes Maritimæ, Alpes Penninæ, Maxima Sequana, Aquitania Prima, Aquitania Secunda, Novempopulana, Narbonenſis Prima, Narbonenſis Secunda, Lugdunenſis Secunda, Lugdunenſis Turonica, Lugdunenſis Senonica. In the dioceſe of Spain were ſeven provinces, viz. Bœtica, Luſitania, Galicia, Tarraconnenſis, Carthaginienſis, Tingitana, and the Balearic iſlands. The dioceſe of Britain conſiſted of five provinces, viz. Maxima Cæſarienſis, Valentia, Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis. The præfectus prætorio of Italy had three dioceſes under his juriſdiction, viz. Italy, Illyricum Occidentale, and Africa. Illyricum conſiſted of ſix provinces, viz. Pannonia Secunda, Savia, Dalmatia, Pannonia Prima, Noricum Mediterrancum, Noricum Ripenſe: Sirmium was the metropolis of this dioceſe. Africa compriſed five provinces, viz. Africa Carthaginienſis, Byzacene, Mauritania Sitifienſis, Mauritania Cæſarienſis, and Tripolitana. Italy was divided into ſeventeen provinces, which were Venetia, Æmilia, Liguria, Flaminia and Picenum Annonarium, Hetruria and Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, Campania, Sicilia, Apulia and Calabria, Lucania and Brutium, Alpes Cotiæ, Rhætia Prima, Rhætia Secunda, Samnium, Valeria, Sardinia and Corſica. The prefects were the firſt officers of the empire, and generally looked upon, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus Marcellinus, as emperors of an inferior rank. They had ſeveral other officers under them, viz, proconſuls, vicars, rectors, conſulars, correctors, and preſidents. In the eaſt were two proconſuls; one in Achaia, and another in Aſia, and ſometimes, but very ſeldom, a third in Paleſtine: in the weſt there was but one, viz. the proconſul of Africa. The vicars repreſented the prefects, and were their lieutenants; whence, in the antient inſcriptions, they are ſtyled pro-præfecti or vice-præfects. There were vicars in the provinces of Aſia, Pontus, Thrace, the Orient, Macedon, Africa, Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and two in Italy, viz. the vicar of the city of Rome, and the vicar of Italy: under the former were the ten following provinces, Campania, Hetruria and Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, Sicilia, Apulia and Calabria, Lucania and Brutium, Samnium, Sardinia, Corſica, and Valeria: under the vicar of Italy were five provinces, Liguria, Æmilia, Flaminia, Picenum Annonarium, and Venetia; to which were afterwards

Italy divided into ſeventeen provinces.

The ſeveral officers under the præfecti prætorio.

added Iſtria, the Alpes Cotiæ, and both the Rhætias. The provinces under the vicar of Rome were called provinciæ ſuburbicariæ; and thoſe under the vicar of Italy, provinces of Italy. The vicar of Italy reſided at Milan, which by that means became the metropolis of all the Italian provinces. Next in dignity to the vicars were the rectors, who governed whole provinces under the prefect or his vicars, as did likewiſe the conſulars, the correctors, and the preſidents: Phœnicia was governed by a conſular, who reſided ſometimes at Tyre, ſometimes at Berytus, and ſometimes at Damaſcus: ſeveral provinces of Italy had likewiſe a conſular for their governor, viz. Æmilia, Liguria, Venetia, Picenum, Sicilia, Flaminia, and Campania: Hetruria, Apulia and Calabria, Lucania and Brutium, were governed by correctors; and Samnium, Valeria, the Alpes Cotiæ, both Rhætias, Sardinia, and Corſica, by preſidents. The prefects under Conſtantine and his ſon Conſtantius had only the title of clariſſimi, which was common to all ſenators, but were ſoon after diſtinguiſhed with that of illuſtres. Moſt writers, upon the authority of Zoſimus, aſcribe the inſtitution of theſe four prefects to Conſtantine; but that author was perhaps therein miſtaken, it being certain, that the empire was by Dioclefian divided into four parts, and governed by two emperors, and two Cæſars, each of whom had an army, and a præfectus prætorio; nay, even before Dioclefian's time, we find one Clarus ſtyled prefect of Illyricum and Gaul [r]. The prefects were originally military; but after this diviſion of the empire, became altogether civil officers, the command of the troops being given to two magiſtri militiæ, the inſtitution of which office is likewiſe aſcribed by Zoſimus to Conſtantine [s]. In Dioclefian's time, each province had its peculiar general, ſtyled dux or duke; but Conſtantine in their room created the two above-mentioned magiſtri militiæ, one for the foot, and another for the horſe, with a full power of making what regulations in the army they thought proper; of puniſhing the ſoldiers when guilty of breach of duty, or any other crime; of diſcharging and admitting into the army whom they pleaſed, &c. Sometimes both commands were veſted in one perſon; for in a law dated the ſeventeenth of June, 315, mention is made of one Euſebius, commander in chief both of the horſe and foot; and one Sylvanus, in two laws addreſſed to him in 349, is ſtyled magiſter utriuſque militiæ [t]. But their number was

The magiſtri militiæ.

ſoon

[r] Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 17. p. 193. [s] Zoſ. p. 688. [t] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xi. tit. 1 leg. 1. p. 6. & chronol. p. 48.

ſoon encreaſed; for in the time of Theodoſius I. they were at leaſt five, viz. one for the court, called præſentalis; one for Thrace, one for the Orient, one for Illyricum, and one for Gaul [u]. Theſe magiſtri militiæ were afterwards diſtinguiſhed with the title of comites or counts, and raiſed to the rank of the firſt officers of the empire. The patricii or patricians were ſuperior in rank both to the magiſtri militiæ, and the prefects. This was a new dignity inſtituted by Conſtantine, but had no power or authority annexed to it, being only a title of honour. The patricians, though raiſed above all the other ſubjects of the empire, were nevertheleſs obliged to give the precedency to the conſuls [w]. Conſtantine conferred this dignity on Julius Conſtantius, his brother, and Optatus, his brother-in-law [x]. The patricians are ſeldom mentioned by the writers of the fourth century, but frequently by thoſe of the fifth. The title of comes or count ſeems likewiſe to owe its origin to Conſtantine. Before Conſtantine's time, thoſe who attended the emperors out of Rome in quality of counſellors, ſtyled themſelves comites; but to that word added the name of the prince whom they attended. In Conſtantine's time, the name of the prince was omitted, and thoſe who accompanied him were ſtyled ſimply comites, companions, and in the modern languages counts: one Dionyſius is the firſt to whom we find that title to have been given: afterwards it became a title of honour, and was beſtowed upon all officers of any rank, though they neither followed the court, nor accompanied the emperor. Theſe comites or counts were divided, according to their employments, into three orders or ranks; and hence the expreſſions which we frequently meet with in the writers who flouriſhed under Conſtantine and his ſucceſſors, comes domeſticus primi ordinis, ſecundi ordinis, &c [y]. We find no mention made of the title of nobiliſſimus, or moſt noble, before Conſtantine's time, who gave it to two of his brothers, viz. Julius Conſtantius and Annibalianus [z]. It was, under the ſucceeding princes, beſtowed upon their ſons, before they were raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar. Of the writers who flouriſhed under Conſtantine, we ſhall ſpeak in our note (F).

The patricians.

The comites or counts.

[u] Notit. c. 5, 8, 34, 38. [w] Zoſ. p. 692. Cod. Theodoſ. p. 74, 75. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Vide Du Cange gloſſ. p. 1074. [z] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 692.

(F) We ſhall begin with thoſe who have written the hiſtory of Conſtantine. Euſebius of Cæſarea publiſhed his life in four books, but but declares in the beginning of his work, that he designs to insert in his history such accounts only as serve to shew his piety and religion, and may prove edifying to his readers. However, he relates great part of his wars; and we may depend upon the truth of what he writes relating thereunto, since the emperor honoured him with his intimacy and friendship, and informed him himself of many transactions. He composed this work soon after the emperor's death; for he tells us, that he began it when Constantine's children reigned; and on the other hand it is certain, that he did not survive the emperor two full years. Besides the life of Constantine, he wrote two panegyrics on that prince, one in 325, which has been since lost; and another, of an extraordinary length, in 335, which has reached our times, but gives us no great insight into the transactions of those terms (1). Several other panegyrics on Constantine, composed in the beginning of his reign, are still extant, and have been of great use to us, as the reader must have observed, in writing the history of his life. Among these there are two, the authors of which are not known; one of them was pronounced in the year 308, on occasion of the marriage of Constantine and Fausta; and the other in 313, after the defeat of Maxentius (2). Two other panegyrics were composed by Eumenius, of whom we have spoken in the text, the one about the year 309, and the other in 311, to return thanks to the emperor for the favours and privileges granted to the city of Autun: that written by Nazarius was pronounced on the first of March, 321. Eumenius was professor of eloquence in the city of Autun, and esteemed one of the best orators of his time. St. Jerom speaks of Nazarius as a celebrated orator in 324, and adds, that he had a daughter no less esteemed for her eloquence than himself. Vinctus, in his comments upon Ausonius, calls her Eunomia; and styles her, upon what authority we know not, a christian virgin (3). Praxagoras by birth an Athenian, wrote, when only nineteen years old, two books on the kings of Athens; and three years after, two others, comprising the life of Constantine. At the age of thirty-one, he published the life of Alexander the Great in six books (4). An abridgment of his life of Constantine is to be found in Photius (5). His style is clear, but unequal. He was a pagan, but bestows great encomiums on Constantine. He is supposed to have flourished under Constantius, and to have been contemporary with the sophist Bemarchus, who was a native of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, wrote several declamations and speeches, and published the life of Constantine in ten books (6). But none of his works have reached our times. Libanius mentions one Bemarchus, a pagan sophist, but greatly favoured by Constantius (7). Eu-

(1) Euseb. or. habit. in tricennal. Constantin. p. 605. (2) Panegyr. 5. p. 124. & 7. p. 152. (3) Vinct. in Auson. p. 158. (4) Phot. c. 62. p. 64. (5) Idem, p. 64. (6) Voss. hist. Græc. l. ii. c. 17. Suidas, β. p. 551.

(7). Eunapius likewiſe wrote the hiſtory of Conſtantine, but compriſed without all doubt in the general hiſtory, which he publiſhed of all the emperors from the death of Alexander Severus (8). We may well rank Conſtantine himſelf amongſt the writers and men of learning who flouriſhed in his time; for many monuments of his application and ſtudy have reached our times, and are to be found in Euſebius, who has tranſmitted them to us. Of theſe, the chief, or at leaſt the moſt diffuſe and extenſive, is his oration ad ſanctorum cætum, or his diſcourſe addreſſed to the aſſembly of ſaints. Euſebius aſſures us, that this ſpeech, as well as his many laws and letters, were all compoſed by himſelf. His ſpeech, and ſeveral letters he wrote in Latin, and cauſed them to be afterwards tranſlated into Greek, though he muſt have been well acquainted with the Greek tongue too, having paſſed moſt of his time in the eaſt. Of his letters or edicts the following are ſtill extant in Euſebius: the edict of Milan in 313, in favour of the chriſtians; his letters to Anulinus, proconſul of Africa, for the eccleſiaſtic immunity, and ordering whatever had been taken from the churches to be reſtored; his letter to Cæcilianus, biſhop of Carthage, concerning the alms, which were by his orders to be diſtributed among the indigent chriſtians in Africa; his letter to Melchiades, biſhop of Rome in 313, touching the council of that city againſt the Donatiſts; that which he wrote in 314, to Chreſtus, biſhop of Syracuſe, concerning the council of Arles; his edict addreſſed to the inhabitants of Paleſtine, and the people of the eaſt, in 323, for the re-eſtabliſhing of the confeſſors; his letter to Euſebius the hiſtorian, concerning the building of churches; his edict to the people of the eaſt, exhorting them to embrace the chriſtian religion; his letter to Alexander and Arius, touching their diſputes in point of religion; his letter to the churches, concerning what had been decided in the council of Nice in 325, with reſpect to the celebration of Eaſter; the letter he wrote to Macarius for the building of the church of the reſurrection at Jeruſalem, and that to the biſhops of Paleſtine for the building of another at Mambre; three touching the promotion of Euſebius to the ſee of Antioch about the year 331, part of the edict which he addreſſed to the heretics; his letter to Sapor, king of Perſia, in behalf of the chriſtians; two to Euſebius, the one touching his treatiſe on Eaſter, the other requiring him to ſend him fifty copies of the ſcripture; his letter to the biſhops of the council of Tyre in 335, for the quieting of the troubles in the church. Beſides theſe letters or edicts in Euſebius (9), others have been tranſmitted to us by different authors, viz. five touching the Donatiſts,

(7) Liban. vit. p. 15. (8) Eunap. p. 40. Voſſ. ibid. c. 18. (9) Euſeb. hiſt. l. x. c. 5, 7. & Conſt. l. ii. c. 24, 25, 46, 48, 64. l. iii. c. 17, 20, 30, 32, 52, 60, 64. l. iv. c. 9, 13, 35, 42.

tiſts, written about the year 314 (10); one to Arius and his diſciples about the year 324, complaining of their obſtinacy (11); one to the church of Alexandria, upon the condemnation of Arius by the council of Nice; one to the whole church, commanding his books, and thoſe of his followers, to be burnt (12); one to the church of Nicomedia, on the baniſhment of the two Arian biſhops, Euſebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nice (13); another on the ſame ſubject, to Theodotus, biſhop of Laodicea (14); one to Arius, inviting him to court (15); ſome lines of that which he wrote to Athanaſius, enjoining him to admit Arius to the communion of the faithful (16); one to the church of Alexandria, wherein he commends the conduct of Athanaſius (17); one to Athanaſius himſelf, condemning thoſe who had ſlandered him (18); one to Johannes Melecianus, congratulating him upon his being reconciled to the church (19); one to the Euſebians of the council of Tyre, inviting them to Conſtantinople (20). To theſe we may add the letter which he wrote to the poet Optatianus, thanking him for a poem which he had publiſhed in his commendation; and aſſuring him, that he had nothing more at heart than the encouraging of learned men. Beſides the authors of the Auguſtine hiſtory, of whom we have ſpoken already, ſeveral other authors flouriſhed under Conſtantine. St. Jerom extols among the reſt, the orator Attius Patera or Paterius, a native of Bayeux, and ſprung, according to Auſonius (21), from the antient Druids. He taught Rhetorick at Rome with great applauſe, about the end of Conſtantine's reign, and afterwards at Bourdeaux (22), ſince Auſonius ranks him among the profeſſors of that city. He was the father of the orator Delphidius (23), of whom hereafter; and Hedibias, to whom St. Jerom wrote his hundred and fiftieth letter, was deſcended from him. He was a pagan, as St. Jerom tells us in expreſs terms (24). The reader will find in Auſonius (25) ſeveral things relating to him, which it would be too tedious to inſert here. Suidas aſcribes ſeveral rhetorical pieces to one Onaſimus, a native of Cyprus or Sparta, who lived in the time of Conſtantine, and is ſtyled by Suidas both an hiſtorian and ſophiſt (26). At the ſame time flouriſhed Palladius, a native of Methone in Peloponneſus, who publiſhed a treatiſe on the feaſts of (10) Cæcil. Optat. p. 280, 283, 285, 287. (11) Vide Baron. ad. ann. 319. (12) Socrat. l. i. c. 9. p. 30, 32. (13) Gelaſ. Cyzicen. acta Nic. concil. p. 217. (14) Idem, p. 224. (15) Socrat. l. i. c. 25. p. 61. (16) Ath. apol. p. 778, 779. (17) Idem, p. 785. (18) Idem, p. 787. (19) Idem, p. 803. (20) Vide Baron. ann. 325. (21) Auſon. de profeſſ. Burdigal. car. 4. p. 145. (22) Idem, car. 6. p. 150. Hier. epiſt. 150. p. 410. (23) Auſon. ibid. p. 145. (24) Hier. p. 140. (25) Auſon. ibid. p. 149. (26) Suid. o. v. p. 311.

of the Romans, and ſome other philological pieces (27). And this is all we know of theſe two writers, whom Voſſius ranks among the Greek hiſtorians (28). The reader will find in Photius (29) ſeveral grammatical obſervations copied by him from four books written in Iambic verſe by one Helladius, a native of Antinopolis or Biſantinopolis, as he ſtyled it, in Egypt. This work was intitled Chreſtomathia: he publiſhed ſeveral other pieces, was a pagan, and lived under Licinius and Galerius (30). Photius ſpeaks elſewhere of one Helladius, author of a very copious lexicon (31). In the time of Conſtantine flouriſhed the celebrated Platonic philoſopher Iamblichus: he was a native of Chalcis in Lower Syria, ſprung from a rich and noble family, and very famous among the pagans, as appears from Eunapius, who wrote his life (32). He ſtudied philoſophy firſt under one Anatolus or Anatolius, and afterwards under the celebrated Porphyrius. He had an incredible number of diſciples, taken with his probity, ſays Eunapius, and not with his eloquence; for he both ſpoke and wrote very improperly. From what Eunapius ſays of him, it is manifeſt, that he ſtudied magic with no leſs application than philoſophy (33). He died at Alexandria before the year 331, ſome time after he had put the laſt hand to the life of a philoſopher of that place, named Alypius, who was his cotemporary. This work has not reached our time, nor ought we regret the loſs of it; for Eunapius ſpeaks of it as a very mean performance (34). Several works of a philoſopher, named Iamblichus, are ſtill extant, and highly eſteemed by the beſt judges, but commonly aſcribed, not to the diſciple of Porphyrius, but to another Iamblichus, who lived at Apamea in Syria, forty or fifty years after the former, and was one of the emperor Julian's chief favourites, as appears from the ſeveral letters he wrote to him (35). Theſe two philoſophers bore the ſame name, lived in the ſame country, and had each of them a diſciple named Sopater; no wonder, therefore, that moſt writers have confounded them. A third philoſopher, of the ſame name, lived under the emperor M. Aurelius. Several works have reached our times, under the name of Iamblichus; but which of theſe three was the true author of them, we will not take upon us to determine: the works are, the hiſtory of the life and ſect of Pythagoras, with an exhortation to the ſtudy of philoſophy, containing an explication of the proverbs and maxims of that philoſopher (36); an explication of the arithmetic of Nicomachus; a treatiſe on mathematics in general; an anſwer to the letter of Porphyrius to Anebo, on the myſteries of the Egyptians; a collection of

(27) Idem, π. p. 405. (28) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 18. p. 486. (29) Phot. c. 279. (30) Idem, p. 1592. (31) Idem, c. 145. p. 317. (32) Eunap. c. 2. p. 23. (33) Idem ibid. (34) Idem, c. 3. p. 28. (35) Julian. epiſt. 40. & p. 186, &c. (36) Iam. vit. Pyth. p. 25.

of the tenets of the Pythagoreans; and a ſhort treatiſe on the ſun. The firſt of theſe works was tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed in 1598, by one Johannes Arcerius, a native of Friſia; but he is thought not to have taken the true meaning of the author in ſeveral paſſages, and, beſides, his ſtyle is both obſcure and improper. Samuel Tennulius publiſhed in 1668. Iamblichus's explication of the arithmetic of Nicomachus, promiſing at the ſame time to publiſh ſoon after his treatiſe on mathematics; but whether or no he was as good as his word, we cannot tell, not having ever heard of that work's being publiſhed. Iamblichus, in his anſwer to the letter of Porphyrius, endeavours, under the name of Abammon, to confute his arguments againſt the power of magic. Holſtenius deſigned to publiſh all the works of Iamblichus, together with obſervations; but he was prevented by death from executing his deſign. Iamblichus's life of Pythagoras was in great part copied from that of the ſame philoſopher, written by Porphyrius (37). St. Jerom tells us, that the philoſopher Iamblichus wrote copious comments on the precepts of Pythagoras, commonly called the golden maxims (38). The emperor Julian equals Iamblichus of Chalcis to Plato himſelf. Gothofredus is of opinion, that Gregorius and Hermogenes, or rather Hermogenianus, the authors of the two different, but like codes, flouriſhed under Conſtantine and his children. They both begin with the laws of Adrian, and ſeem to end with thoſe of Dioclefian, not caring, as is conjectured, to meddle with the laws of Conſtantine, by reaſon of the many changes that prince had introduced into the Roman juriſprudence (39). Tho' they were both pagans, yet they might have inſerted ſuch laws of Conſtantine as no ways related to religion. In compiling their reſpective works, they followed the order of time; which was afterwards obſerved in the codes of Theodoſius and Juſtinian. The codes of Gregorius and Hermogenianus are thought to be the moſt antient of all; and were both abridged by thoſe who abridged the Theodoſian code (40). Only ſome fragments of them now remain to be found in different books of juriſprudence. Gregorius is commonly believed to have been the moſt antient of the two. The ſtyle of Hermogenianus is very uncouth, and often obſcure. Publius Optatianus Porphyrius flouriſhed under Conſtantine, and is thought to have publiſhed the poem, which has reached us, about the middle of the year 326, on occaſion of the ſolemnity of the emperor's twentieth year, and the tenth of the two Cæſars, Criſpus and Conſtantine, his children. He had before that time inſcribed another poem to Conſtantine; which being well received by the prince, Optatianus returned him thanks by a letter, which is ſtill extant, (37) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 16. p. 293, 294. (38) Hier. in Ruf. l. iii. c. 10. p. 246. (39) Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 185. (40) Idem, p. 184.

extant, for the kind reception he had given it; adding to the letter a ſecond poem, addreſſed likewiſe to Conſtantine. Theſe two poems have been long ſince loſt; but the letter, which the emperor wrote to him, thanking him for one of them, has reached our times. Conſtantine calls him in his letter his dearly beloved, and Optatianus ſtyles Conſtantine emperor of the whole earth; whence we may conclude it to have been written after the year 323. Not long after, Optatianus was, upon ſeveral charges brought againſt him, baniſhed. He owns ſome of them to have been true; but pretends not to have been guilty of the crime for which chiefly he was ſent into exile. He wrote the poem, which is ſtill extant, to beg of Conſtantine, that he would recal him from baniſhment, and allow him to ſee again his ſon and family. The poem is a panegyric on Conſtantine, filled with acroſtics, and other trifling conceits of that nature, which betray want of judgment and true taſte in the writer (41). St. Jerom aſſures us, that the emperor, pleaſed with this poem, recalled the author (42). Several epigrams in the anthology are aſcribed to the ſame author; and Fulgentius, the grammarian, quotes ſome of his verſes (43): Robanus Maurus and venerable Bede ſpeak of his poem as an elegant performance (44); but the modern critics, with a great deal of reaſon, deſpiſe all compoſitions, and difficiles nugas, as Martial ſtyles them, of that nature, agreeing therein with the antient Latin poets, whoſe writings ought to be our ſtandard. Some authors are of opinion, that ſeveral of the pieces which paſs under the name of Petronius Arbiter, were written by Optatianus. Sopater, the diſciple of Iamblichus, flouriſhed under Conſtantine, and, after the death of that philoſopher, became the head of the Platonic ſect that followed Plotinus. He was a native of Apamea in Syria, and both ſpoke and wrote with great elegance and propriety; whence he was ſtyled a ſophiſt, as well as a philoſopher (45). After the death of Iamblichus, not deigning to converſe with other philoſophers, ſays Eunapius his admirer, he repaired to the court of Conſtantine, to try whether he could prevent the downfal and utter ruin of the antient religion of the Romans. He gained, adds the ſame writer, a great aſcendant over the emperor, who frequently conferred with him, and yielded to him in public the moſt honourable place. But this we can hardly believe, upon the bare word of his panegyriſt Eunapius; for no other writer takes the leaſt notice of Sopater's great credit with Conſtantine. Sozomen tells us, that Conſtantine had recourſe to him to know in what manner he might atone for the death of his ſon Criſpus; and that both the philoſopher, and the pagan pontiffs, anſwered, that, in the religion of the Greeks, there was no atonement for

ſo

(41) P. Opt. prol. c. 11. apud. Velſ. (42) Hier. ann. 329.
(43) Jonſ. l. iii. c. 15. p. 290. (44) Optat. prol. p. 2.
(45) Eunap. p. 23. Sozom. l. i. c. 5. p. 406. Suid. p. 781.

ſo heinous a crime (46). Hereupon he began to hearken to the chriſtians, ſays Zoſimus (47), who aſſured him, that the virtue of their baptiſm was capable of waſhing off any wickedneſs, however enormous. We can ſcarce believe, that the pagans owned there was no atonement in their religion for an emperor. Beſides, it is certain, that Conſtantine had hearkened to the chriſtians, and embraced their religion, before the death of Criſpus. While Sopater was with the emperor at Conſtantinople, there being great ſcarcity of proviſions in that city, by reaſon the veſſels that brought corn were detained by contrary winds, the people aſſembled in the theatre broke one day on a ſudden into bitter invectives againſt Sopater, as a magician, who ſtopt the favourable winds, and prevented the arrival of the ſo long expected veſſels. Hereupon Conſtantine abandoned him to the fury of the enraged populace, who being underhand ſtirred up by the prefect Ablavius, and other courtiers, jealous of his too great credit with the emperor, tore him in pieces. Thus is his death related by Eunapius (48); and from him Zoſimus copied what he wrote on this ſubject (49). It is ſurpriſing, that Conſtantine ſhould have treated in this manner, without the leaſt provocation, ſo great a favourite, as Eunapius, and after him Zoſimus, pretend Sopater to have been. Suidas writes, that Conſtantine put him to death, to give the world a ſignal inſtance of his hatred and averſion to paganiſm (50). Sopater left a treatiſe on providence, and on thoſe who had been undeſervedly happy or miſerable (51). Voſſius ſeems to confound Sopater of Apamea with another philoſopher of the ſame name, who was a native of Alexandria, and abridged the works of ſeveral hiſtorians and other authors. Theſe abridgments are greatly eſteemed by Photius, though interwoven with ſeveral fables. They were divided into twelve books (52). Julian ſpeaks of one Sopater of Apamea, who lived in his time (53), and conſequently muſt be diſtinguiſhed from the diſciple of Iamblichus. To the other writers, who flouriſhed under Conſtantine, we may add the two chriſtian poets Commodianus and Juvencus. The former wrote, according to Rigault, who publiſhed his work with thoſe of St. Cyprian in 1666, in the time of Sylveſter, biſhop of Rome; was a native of Gaza, or at leaſt bore the name of Gazeus; he was deſcended of pagan parents, but in reading the holy ſcripture, diſcovered and embraced the truth. He wrote a kind of poem, in hexameter verſe, commonly ſtyled inſtructions, but without any regard to quantities. It is divided into ſeveral articles, and the initial letters of each article make up its title. In this poem, if we may beſtow upon it that name, (46) Sozom. l. i. c. 5, p. 406. (47) Zoſ. l. ii. p. 685. (48) Eunap. c. 4. p. 34, 37. (49) Zoſ. l. ii. p. 692. (50) Suid. s. p. 782. (51) Idem ibid. (52) Phot. c. 161 p. 344. (53) Julian. epiſt. 40, 53. p. 185, 186.

THE news of Conſtantine's death no ſooner reached the armies, than they all agreed to acknowledge no other emperors but the ſons of Conſtantine, whom they accordingly proclaimed emperors, as did, ſoon after, the ſenate of Rome, without taking the leaſt notice of their two couſins, Dalmatius Cæſar and Annibalianus king of Pontus, the two ſons of their uncle Conſtantius Dalmatius, tho' Conſtantine had, in the above-mentioned diviſion of the empire, allotted to each of them their ſhare. However, the three brothers did not, for what reaſon we are no-where told, take upon them the title of Auguſti till the ninth of September of this year 337, that is, near four months after the deceaſe of their father [a]. Soon after the ſoldiery, under colour of preventing diſturbances in the empire, flew to arms, and cut in pieces Julius Conſtantius, the deceaſed emperor's brother, Dalmatius Cæſar, Annibalianus king of Pontus, the patrician Optatus, who had, as is commonly ſuppoſed, married Anaſtatia, the late emperor's ſiſter, five of his nephews, among whom was the eldeſt ſon of Julius Conſtantius, the prefect name, he impugns the errors of the pagans, but ſeems not to have been yet well inſtructed himſelf in the truths of the chriſtian religion (54). Juvencus, frequently mentioned by St. Jerom, flouriſhed under Conſtantine: he was by birth a Spaniard, ſprung from an illuſtrious family, and not only a chriſtian, but in holy orders. However he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of poetry, and wrote a poem, compriſing the four goſpels in as many books. He kept cloſe to the text, chuſing rather to preſerve the truth of the hiſtory, than to diſplay his genius. This poem was compoſed when Conſtantine had ſettled both the church and empire in peace (55), that is, after the defeat of Licinius. Some of his verſes are quoted by the venerable Bede (56). The council of Rome held in the time of Gelaſius, biſhop of that city, approved of this work, ſtyling it a laborious and excellent performance (57). He wrote another poem on the order of the ſacraments, of which the abbot Tritenham (58) aſſures us he had ſeen and peruſed two books; but they have not reached our times. Crinitus aſcribes to him ſome hymns (59), of which no mention is made by any other writer.

The armies acknowledge Conſtantine's three children.

But put Dalmatius and Annibalianus to death.

[a] Euſeb. vit. Conſt. l. iv. c. 68. p. 560.

(54) Comm. p. 23. c. 33. Gennad. c. 15. (55) Juvenc. l. iv. p. 657. ver. 1, 2. (56) Vide Labb. de ſcript. eccleſiaſt. (57) Concil. tom. iv. p, 1264. (58) Trit. de ſcript. eccleſ. p. 14. (59) Bib. pat. t. viii. p. 657.

prefect Ablavius, and moſt of the great Conſtantine's miniſters, ſuppoſing them attached to the intereſt of his nephews [b]. Thus was the numerous family of Conſtantine reduced at once to his three ſons, and two nephews Gallus and Julian, the ſons of Julius Conſtantius; of whom the former owed his life to a malady, from which no one believed he could recover; and the other to his infancy, he being then at moſt but ſeven years old [c]. Gregory of Nazianzus writes, that Julian was privately conveyed away, and concealed by one Marcus of Arethuſa, whom he afterwards put to a cruel death [d]. All authors agree, that neither young Conſtantine, nor Conſtans, had any hand in the maſſacre of the imperial family: as for Conſtantius, Eutropius and Socrates [f] write, that he rather permitted than commanded it. Julian [g], St. Jerom [h], and Zoſimus [i], tell us in plain terms, that he was the author of that cruel maſſacre; and St. Athanaſius openly reproaches him as the murderer of his uncles and couſins [k].

Their dominions divided among the three brothers.

The three brothers met in Pannonia in the beginning of the enſuing year 338, when Urſus and Polemius were conſuls, to divide among them the dominions of the two deceaſed princes, Dalmatius and Annibalianus; but all we know of this diviſion is, that Conſtantine had Thrace (for he is ſaid to have reigned at Conſtantinople) [l]; and Conſtans, Greece and Macedon; for Corinth and ſome places in Macedon are ſaid to have belonged to him [m]. Each of them kept the dominions allotted to them by Conſtantine in his life-time, that partition being confirmed by his laſt will, viz. Conſtantine, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; Conſtantius, Aſia, Syria, and Egypt; and Conſtans, Illyricum, Italy, and Africa. Conſtantine ſeems to have yielded this very year Thrace to Conſtantius, and Conſtans Africa to Conſtantine. While Conſtantius was abſent in Pannonia, the Perſians, finding the frontiers unguarded, entered Meſopotamia, committing every-where dreadful ravages. At the ſame time, the Armenians revolted, drove out their king, who was a friend to the Romans, and joined the Perſians, who being thus ſtrengthened, laid ſiege to Niſibis; but, after having continued before it ſixty-three days, they were obliged to drop that enterprize, and retire. The preſervation

The Perſians invade the Roman dominions.

Raiſe the ſiege of Niſibis and retire.

[b] Euſeb. ibid. p. 541. Zoſ. l. 2. p. 692. Julian. epiſt. ad Athenieſ. p. 497, 498. [c] Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 164. Ammian. p. 298. [d] Nazian orat. 3. p 90. [e] Eutrop. p. 558. [f] Socrat. p. 115. [g] Julian. ad Athen. p. 497. [h] Hier. chron. . [i] Zoſ. p. 692. [k] Athan. ſolit. p. 856. [l] Chron. Alex. p. 670. [m] Liban. orat. 9. p. 212.

preſervation of that important place is aſcribed by Theodoret to the prayers of the holy biſhop James, during whoſe life and reſidence there, all the attempts of the enemy againſt it proved ineffectual [n]. Conſtantius, in the mean time, taking leave of his brothers, left Pannonia, and returned into the eaſt, where he aſſembled all his forces, with a deſign to relieve Niſibis; but finding the Perſians had retired of their own accord, he turned his arms againſt the Armenians, obliged them to receive again the king whom they had driven out, and drew over to his party the robbers of Arabia, no doubt the Saracens, who, by frequent inroads into the Perſian dominions, made a powerful diverſion, and greatly annoyed the enemy [o]. The war, however, continued during the whole time of his reign: many battles were fought, ſome gained by the Romans, and ſome by the Perſians: the cities of Meſopotamia were often taken and retaken; and that of Niſibis three times beſieged by the enemy, without their ever being able to reduce it. Ammianus Marcellinus obſerves, that the Romans gained great advantages when commanded by the emperor's lieutenants, but were conſtantly defeated when headed by the emperor in perſon [p]. The following year, 339, when Conſtantius was conſul, the ſecond time, with his brother Conſtans, ſeveral laws were enacted in the name of the three emperors; and among the reſt one forbidding, under no leſs a penalty than that of death, marriages between uncles and nieces, which had been allowed by a decree of the ſenate, iſſued in favour of the marriage of Claudius and the celebrated Agrippina. Notwithſtanding this decree, ſuch marriages were ever looked upon by the Romans as inceſtuous, but frequently practiſed by other nations, eſpecially the Phœnicians, to whom the law forbidding them, dated the thirty-firſt of March of this year, is addreſſed [q]. The next conſuls were Acyndinus and Proculus. This year, Conſtantine, diſſatisfied with the late partition of the provinces, after having ſolicited in vain his brother Conſtans to yield to him Italy, or at leaſt part of that country, raiſed a conſiderable army, and, under pretence of marching to the aſſiſtance of Conſtantius, who was at war with the Perſians, left Gaul, and, entering the dominions of Conſtans, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places. Hereupon Conſtans, who was then in Dacia, detached part of Conſtantine invades the dominions of Conſtans and is killed.

[n] Theodor. in vit. patrum, c. 1. p. 770. [o] Liban. p. 122. Julian. orat. 1. p. 37. [p] Ammian. l. xx. p. 177. [q] Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 11. p. 294.

of his forces againſt him, who, having drawn him into an ambuſcade near Aquileia, cut both him and his army in pieces. His body was thrown into the river Anſa, at a ſmall diſtance from Aquileia; but being afterwards diſcovered, it was ſent to Conſtantinople, and interred there near the tomb of his father [r]. Such was the end of the great Conſtantine's eldeſt ſon. He was born at Arles, as is commonly believed, on the ſeventh of Auguſt, 316, created Cæſar the firſt of March, 317, and ſaluted Auguſtus on the ninth of September, 337, ſo that he did not enjoy the imperial dignity three whole years. His panegyriſt paints him as a prince endowed with great accompliſhments both of body and mind; and adds, that he ſtudied the ſcriptures, and, to the utmoſt of his power, practiſed what they required [s]. But his invading his brother's dominions, without the leaſt provocation, can by no means be juſtified. He received and treated with great kindneſs the great Athanaſius, when he was baniſhed by his father into Gaul; which province he then governed [t]. By his death, Conſtans remained ſole maſter of the weſtern provinces, Conſtantius voluntarily yielding to him the whole ſhare of the deceaſed prince [u]. Conſtans, ſoon after the death of his brother, arrived at Aquileia, where he was on the ninth of April, and on the twenty-fifth of June at Milan [w]. All we find of Conſtantius this year is, that on the fifth of Auguſt he was at Beſſus in Thrace, and on the ninth of September at Antioch [x]. The next year, when Marcellinus and Probinus were conſuls, many cities in the eaſt were overturned by a violent and dreadful earthquake [y]; and the Franks in the weſt, having croſſed the Rhine, made an irruption into Gaul, committing every-where great ravages. Conſtans marched againſt them, and gave them battle; but as he gained no great advantage over them, the war was not ended till the enſuing year [z]. On occaſion of this war, Libanius ſpeaks much at length of the turbulent and reſtleſs temper of the Franks [a]. This year a law was enacted in the name of the two emperors, forbidding, under the ſevereſt penalties, all manner of idolatrous worſhip [b]. Firmicus Maternus writes, that Conſtans ordered ſeveral temples to be demoliſhed,

The Franks invade Gaul.

[r] Zonar. p. 11. Vict. epit. p. 544. Eutrop. p. 588. [s] Monodia, ſeu orat. in Conſtantin. junior. mort. p. 7—8—14. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Soz. l. iii. p. 499. Jul. orat. 2. p. 175. [w] Cod. Theodoſ. p. 97. chronol. p. 41. [x] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 42. [y] Socrat. p. 88. Soz. p. 504. Theophan. p. 30. [z] Socrat. p. 88. Soz. p. 504. [a] Liban. orat. 3. p. 138. [b] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xi. tit. 3. leg. 1. p. 2.

moliſhed, and likewiſe the celebrated altar of Victory in the ſenate at Rome [c]. Conſtantius built this year, and fortified, the city of Amida upon the Tigris in Meſopotamia. Stephanus the geographer takes no notice of this city: however, it is certain, that it ſuſtained a long ſiege in the latter end of the preſent reign, and became afterwards the metropolis of Meſopotamia, properly ſo called, as Edeſſa was the metropolis of that part, which was known by the name of Oſrhoene. The Arabians, the preſent inhabitants, call it Hemit or Ameth, and the Turks Caramit [d]. The following year, Conſtantius entered upon his third, and Conſtans upon his ſecond, conſulſhip. The latter either conquered or appeaſed the Franks, to uſe the expreſſion of Idatius; and that warlike people ſubmitted to the princes of their own nation, whom he was pleaſed to appoint over them [e]. Conſtans, being thus diſengaged, paſſed over into Britain the following year, 343, when Placidus and Romulus were conſuls, to oppoſe the Scots, who made frequent inroads into the Roman dominions; but the ſilence of Libanius with reſpect to this expedition, is a manifeſt proof, that he performed no great exploits againſt that brave and gallant nation. He was at Boulogne on the twenty-fifth of January on his way to Britain, and returned to Treves on the thirtieth of June [f]. As for Conſtantius, he was, on the fifth of April, and the eleventh of May of the preceding year, at Antioch [g]; and this year, on the eighteenth of February, at Antioch, and on the twenty-ſeventh of June, and fourth of July, at Hierapolis in Euphrateſiana [h]. By a law enacted this year on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, and commonly aſcribed to him, the eccleſiaſtics and their domeſtics are exempted from all new impoſitions, and an entire immunity from all cuſtoms granted to ſuch of them as were by their poverty obliged to earn a livelihood by trading [i]. When the church acquired ſufficient wealth to ſupport her miniſters, they were forbidden by the canons to merchandiſe, or follow any trade. Theophanes tells us, that Conſtantius triumphed this year over the Perſians; for, as we obſerved above, he was at war with them during the whole time of his reign [k]; but he often triumphed, when he had been overcome, to conceal the ſhame of his defeat. The following year, when Leontius and Salluſtius were conſuls, is remarkable for a dreadful earthquake, which entirely ruined the city of Neocæſarea in Pontus, no one edifice having withſtood the violence of the ſhock, except the church, and the habitation of the biſhop, who was ſaved, with the clergy, and ſome other pious perſons, while the other inhabitants were all buried in the ruins [m]. Theophanes ſpeaks of a battle this year between the Romans and Perſians, in which the latter were defeated with great loſs [n]. The year enſuing, when Amentius and Albinus were conſuls, the city of Duras on the coaſt of Greece was ſwallowed up with all its inhabitants in an earthquake, and twelve cities in Campania overturned. The above-mentioned conſuls were ſucceeded by Conſtantius the fourth time, and Conſtans the third time, conſuls. The latter was at Ceſena in Italy on the twenty-third of May, at Milan on the twenty-firſt of June, from whence he paſſed into Macedon, and was at Theſſalonica on the ſixth of December; from Macedon he ſeems to have returned to Gaul; for he ſent from thence Athanaſius and Oſius to the council of Sardica, held the following year 347 [o]. As for Conſtantius, he was, on the ſeventh and twenty-ſixth of May, and the twenty-third of Auguſt, at Conſtantinople [p]. The law dated the twenty-ſixth of May, and addreſſed to the biſhops, confirms to them, and the inferior clergy, to their wives, children and domeſtics, ſeveral immunities and exemptions [q]. This year Conſtantius cauſed an harbour to be made at Seleucia, at an immenſe charge, for the convenience of the city of Antioch, which ſtood on the Orontes, at a ſmall diſtance from thence. This work coſt him, according to Libanius and the emperor Julian [r], incredible ſums, the mouth of the Orontes, where the port was made, being full of rocks and ſands. He likewiſe rebuilt the cities of Seleucia in Syria, and Antaradus in Phœnicia; whence the latter, in the acts of ſome councils, is called from him Conſtantia [s]. The ſame year, Sapor, king of Perſia, beſieged Niſibis a ſecond time; but was obliged to retire with diſgrace, after having continued before it three months, as we read

But are quieted by Conſtans.

[c] Firm. Mat. p. 57. [d] Vide Baudr. p. 35. [e] Idat. p. 85. Socrat. l. ii. c. 13. p. 90. [f] Cod. Theodoſ. chronol. p. 44. [g] Idem, p. 43. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xvi. tit. 2. l. viii. p. 32. [k] Theoph. p. 30.

Neocæſarea ruined by an earthquake.

The port of Antioch at Seleucia.

Niſibis beſieged in vain by the Perſians the ſecond time.

[l] Liban. orat. 12. p. 309. [m] Greg. Nyſſ. in vit. Greg. Thaumat. [n] Theoph. p. 31. [o] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 46. Ath. apol. 1. p. 676. [p] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 46. [q] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 10. p. 34. [r] Liban. orat. 13. p. 386. Julian. orat. 1, p. 74. [s] Theoph. p. 31. Baudr. p. 45.

read in St. Jerom, or ſeventy-eight days, as Theophanes will have it. The following year, when Rufinus and Euſebius were conſuls, the emperor Conſtantius pretended to have gained a conſiderable victory over the Perſians [n]: he was at Ancyra on the eighth of March, and at Hierapolis on the eleventh of May [o]. The next conſuls were Flavius Philippus, a great ſtickler for the doctrine of Arius, and Flavius Sallea or Salia, a zealous defender of the faith of the council of Nice. This year, Conſtans filled with indignation againſt the Arians, and aſhamed of the weakneſs of his brother, who ſuffered himſelf to be impoſed upon and deluded by thoſe ſubtle heretics, threatened to reſtore by force of arms the orthodox biſhops, whom he had baniſhed at their inſtigation, unleſs he recalled them of his own accord. Conſtantius was, either by fear, or the reaſons alledged by Conſtans in behalf of the exiled biſhops, prevailed upon to give his conſent to their return [p]. The ſame year, Conſtans ſent Macarius and Paulus, two officers of diſtinction, into Africa, with large ſums to be diſtributed among the poor of that province. They were likewiſe enjoined by that moſt religious prince, as he is ſtyled by a council [q], to uſe their utmoſt endeavours in reclaiming the Donatiſts, and re-uniting them to the church. Their endeavours were crowned with ſucceſs; for the moſt obſtinate and ſtubborn among theſe ſectaries being driven out of the province, the reſt yielded to reaſon, and were received again into the church; ſo that the chriſtians there enjoyed a profound tranquillity, till thoſe who were baniſhed were recalled by the emperor Julian [r]. But this year is chiefly remarkable for a great battle between the Perſians and Romans, fought in the neighbourhood of Singarus, a city of Meſopotamia. The Perſians had poſted themſelves there, and fortified their camp with a deep ditch and ramparts; on which, as well as on the neighbouring hills, they had placed an incredible number of archers: their army was very numerous, and compoſed almoſt of all the nations of the eaſt, Sapor their king being determined to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, and end, if poſſible, by a ſingle victory, ſo tedious and expenſive a war. He did not doubt but the Romans would attack him in his camp, and therefore had fortified it with extraordinary care, and placed bodies of archers on all the eminences which commanded the avenues leading to it. Accordingly the Romans, finding they could by no means entice the enemy into the open field, forced Conſtantius to lead them up to the very ramparts of their camp, which they attacked with a fury hardly to be expreſſed, and forced, in ſpite of the ſhowers of arrows that were diſcharged upon them from the eminences, and the vigorous reſiſtance they met with from thoſe in the camp. Great numbers of the Perſians were cut in pieces, and the reſt either put to flight, or taken priſoners: amongſt the latter was the king's ſon, whom the Romans are ſaid to have put to death, after having cauſed him to be publicly beaten with rods [s]. Thus the Romans made themſelves maſters of the enemy's camp, baggage, and treaſures: but while they were, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger, quenching their drought with the freſh water, of which they found great plenty in the camp, the Perſian archers rallying, fell upon them unexpectedly, and ſnatched the victory, to uſe the expreſſion of Libanius [t], out of their hands. In this attack, which happened in the night-time, great havock was made of the Romans; but nevertheleſs the Perſians, as ſoon as day began to appear, withdrew beyond the Tigris, and broke down the bridges, which they had laid over that river, that the Romans might not purſue them [u]. The loſs was great on both ſides; but the Romans, by remaining maſters of the field, claimed the victory [w]. The following year, when Ulpius Limenius and Aconius Catulinus were conſuls, the city of Berytus was in great part overturned by an earthquake; which ſo frightened the inhabitants, that ſuch of them as had not yet embraced the chriſtian religion, crouded to the churches to be baptized: but the lives of ſuch converts, not inſtructed in the holy myſteries, and the duties of their profeſſion, did no great honour to the religion they pretended to embrace [x]. Conſtans, in the beginning of this year, was in Gaul [y]: there Athanaſius took leave of him, upon his ſetting out for his ſee in Egypt. From Gaul he paſſed into Illyricum, and was on the twenty-ſeventh of May at Sirmium [z]; whence he returned to Gaul before winter. As for Conſtantius, he was on the firſt of April at Antioch, and ſome time after at Edeſſa in Meſopotamia; whence he wrote

The Donatiſts ſuppreſſed in Africa.

The battle of Singarus.

[n] Athan. ſolit. p. 819. [o] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p 46, 47. [p] Theodoret. vit. patrum, l. ii. c. 8. p. 13. [q] Concil. tom. ii. p. 713. [r] Philoſtorg. l. iii. c. 12. p. 45. Socrat. l. ii. c. 23. p. 107.

The Romans force the Perſian camp.

But ſuſtain a great loſs.

A dreadful earthquake at Berytus.

[s] Lib. p. 13. Eutrop. p. 588. Julian. p. 43. [t] Lib. p. 133. [u] Lib. ibid. Julian orat. 1. p. 45. [w] Ammian. p. 122. [x] Theoph. p. 32. Cedren. p. 299. [y] Athan. apol. 2. p. 774. [z] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 48.

wrote to Athanaſius, preſſing him to haſten his return to the eaſt. He was at Conſtantinople on the third of October [a]. The law enacted this year on the eleventh of April, exempting the eccleſiaſtics from all civil functions and employments, is commonly aſcribed to him.

THE following year 350, when Sergius and Nigrinianus were conſuls, is remarkable for many great events. The Perſians, notwithſtanding the loſs they had ſuſtained in 348, returned this year with a mighty army, an incredible number of elephants, and warlike engines of all kinds, and, after ravaging Meſopotamia, and taking ſeveral ſtrong holds there, ſat down before Niſibis the third time, and left nothing unattempted to reduce that important place. Conſtantius was then at a great diſtance, the diſturbances which happened this year in the weſt, requiring his preſence there. But the city was defended by Lucilianus, father-in-law to Jovian afterwards emperor, an officer of great courage and experience, and by the holy biſhop James, in whoſe prayers the garriſon and inhabitants confided more than in their own valour and arms [b]. The Perſians battered the walls for ſeveral days together, with the many engines which they had brought with them for that purpoſe, and at the ſame time endeavoured to undermine them; but all their efforts proving ineffectual, Sapor cauſed the river Mygdonus, flowing through the city, to be turned into a new chanel, hoping by that means to diſtreſs the inhabitants for want of water; but finding them ſufficiently ſupplied with wells and ſprings within the walls, he cauſed the courſe of the river to be ſtopped, and by that means laid the whole country round the town under water; inſomuch, that it ſeemed an iſland in the midſt of the ſea. His deſign was to overflow the town; but as it ſtood on a riſing ground, the waters did not quite reach the top of the walls. He therefore ordered them to be battered with all kinds of warlike engines from ſhips and boats, of which he aſſembled an incredible number for that purpoſe. This attack laſted ſeveral days; but proving in the end ineffectual, Sapor cauſed the river to be ſtopped above the city by a wall or mole of an extraordinary breadth and height; which being ſuddenly broken down, the waters ruſhed with ſuch violence againſt the wall of the city, that it was overturned, and laid level with the ground for the ſpace of an hundred cubits. Hereupon the enemy, believing themſelves now maſters of the place, advanced with loud ſhouts to the attack; but, to their great ſurprize, met with ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, the garriſon and inhabitants being encouraged and animated by their holy biſhop, that they were obliged to retire, after having loſt a great many men, horſes, and elephants, as the reader will find related at length by the emperor Julian [c]. Heaven itſelf ſeemed to eſpouſe the cauſe of the inhabitants of Niſibis; for the Perſians, during the attack, were ſo terrified with dreadful flaſhes of lightning, winds, and rain, that they were not in a condition either of defending themſelves, or offending the enemy [d]. They are ſaid to have loſt in this one attack above ten thouſand men [e]. Sapor did all that lay in his power to prevent the inhabitants from repairing the breach, annoying them with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows, but to no effect; for the very next morning he ſaw, to his great ſurprize, a new wall raiſed, and the garriſon ready to receive him. He continued, however, the ſiege; but was, as often as he attacked the place, repulſed with great loſs. Beſides, his army was annoyed with ſwarms of ſmall flies; which entering the noſtrils of the horſes, and the trunks of the elephants, rendered them quite wild and ungovernable; inſomuch, that great numbers of the Perſians were by them troden under foot, and cruſhed to pieces. To theſe evils was added a dreadful famine, and ſoon after a plague, which made a terrible havock in the Perſian camp, and in the end obliged Sapor, deſpairing of ſucceſs, to raiſe the ſiege, after it had laſted near four months, and retire with the loſs of twenty thouſand men and upwards [f]. The many evils and calamities which afflicted the Perſians during this memorable ſiege, are aſcribed by Theodoret and Sozomen to the prayers of James, biſhop of the place. Be that as it will, Sapor was forced to abandon the enterprize, after having, in the tranſports of his rage, put ſome of his chief commanders to death, and all thoſe who had adviſed him to this war. He gave no further trouble to the Romans till the year 359, when the war was rekindled, as we ſhall relate in a more proper place. The hiſtory of the ſiege of Niſibis was written by Vologeſes biſhop of the place [g], who probably ſucceeded James in that ſee; but that work has not reached our times.

Niſibis beſieged a third time.

All the efforts of Sapor againſt it rendered ineffectual.

[a] Idem ibid. [b] Philoſtorg. l. iii. c. 23. Theodor.

The vigorous reſiſtance of the garriſon and inhabitants.

The ſiege raiſed.

We ſhall now give a ſuccinct account of the diſturbances in the weſt, which encouraged the Perſians to invade the Roman [c] Jul. orat. ii. p. 116. [d] Theoph. p. 33. [e] Idem ibid. & chron. Alexand. [f] Julian. Theophan. ibid. Theodor. p. 633. [g] Chron. Alex. p. 674.

Roman dominions, and lay ſiege to Niſibis. Magnentius, the ſon of one Magnus, a native of Germany, and commander of ſome troops appointed to guard the banks of the Rhine, finding Conſtans univerſally deſpiſed by the army, on account of his indolence and inactivity, reſolved to diſpatch him, and ſet up for himſelf. Accordingly, having imparted his deſign to Marcellinus, receiver of the revenues in Gaul, to Chreſtus, and ſome other officers, and gained them over to his intereſt, on the day appointed for the execution of the plot, Marcellinus, under pretence of celebrating his ſon's birth-day, invited Magnentius, and the chief officers of the army, to an entertainment, which laſted till the night was far ſpent, when Magnentius withdrew, and ſoon after returned in the imperial robes, and with all the enſigns of ſovereignty. Such of the company as were privy to the deſign, immediately ſaluted him with the title of Auguſtus. The reſt, who looked upon it at firſt as a jeſt, (and for ſuch it had paſſed, had the plot miſcarried) were eaſily prevailed upon, as they were heated with wine, to follow the example of the conſpirators; ſo that Magnentius was, by all who were preſent, acknowledged emperor. This happened in the city of Autun, on the eighteenth of January, while Sergius and Nigrinianus were conſuls, four years after the council of Sardica, and ten after the death of young Conſtantine [h]. The uſurper immediately ſeized on the imperial palace at Autun, and diſtributed among the populace what ſums he found there; which induced, not only the city, but the neighbouring country, to eſpouſe his cauſe. Their example was followed by a body of cavalry detached from the army in Illyricum, to reinforce that in Gaul. Magnentius, upon his firſt aſſuming the title of emperor, diſpatched one Gaïſo, a principal commander in the army, with orders to put Conſtans to death. The unhappy prince, being informed of what had paſſed, notwithſtanding Magnentius had ordered the gates of Autun to be kept ſhut a whole day, and placed guards on all the roads, had thrown off the imperial robes, and fled towards Spain. But Gaïſo, informed of the rout he had taken, followed him cloſe with a choſen body of troops, and overtaking him at Helena, a ſmall village at the foot of the Pyrenees, diſpatched him there with many wounds [i]. St. Chryſoſtom writes, that the unfortunate prince, finding it impoſſible to make his eſcape, firſt ſlew his children, and then himſelf Magnentius revolts.

Conſtans murdered.

[h] Zoſ. p. 692. Zonar. p. 12. Jul. orat. ii. p. 106, 107. Hier. chron. [i] Zonar. p. 13. Zoſ. p. 693.

ſelf [k]. But this is not vouched by any antient hiſtorian; nay, we are no-where told, that he had any children. Such was the end of Conſtans, the great Conſtantine's youngeſt ſon, in the thirtieth year of his age, and thirteenth of his reign. He was created Cæſar on the twenty-fifth of December 333, and aſſumed the title of emperor on the ninth of September 337. He was a zealous defender of the chriſtian religion, and the orthodox faith, a declared enemy to the Arians, Donatiſts, and all ſectaries. He filled the churches with gifts and offerings, and had nothing ſo much at heart as the propagation of the goſpel, the aboliſhing of idolatry, and the unity of the church [l]. Thus Athanaſius, who never ſpeaks of him but with the greateſt reſpect and veneration, giving him conſtantly the title of Bleſſed. The ſame writer aſſures us, that he had received the ſacrament of baptiſm, and ſeems to rank him among the martyrs [m]. On the other hand, the pagan writers lay ſeveral things to his charge. Aurelius Victor writes, that after he had reigned ſome years with great applauſe, he abandoned himſelf to cruelty and avarice [n]. Libanius charges him with ſuffering one Eugenius, and his other favourites, to oppreſs the people, and fill their own coffers at their expence [o]. Victor the younger complains of his preferring to the moſt profitable employments ſuch as were able to lay down moſt money for them, without any regard to merit [p]. Eutropius likewiſe finds fault with his miniſters, and adds, that the many vices which began to appear in the prince, joined to the rapaciouſneſs of his miniſters, rendered him odious to the ſoldiery, and inſupportable to the people [q]. Zoſimus, an avowed enemy to all princes who profeſſed the chriſtian religion, ſpeaks of him as the moſt cruel and inhuman tyrant that ever wore and diſgraced a diadem, and paints him as one addicted to all manner of lewdneſs, and guilty of ſuch crimes as are moſt repugnant to nature [r]. Aurelius Victor [s] and Zonaras [t] ſeem to confirm this charge. But, had it been true, we cannot think the great Athanaſius, who could not be unacquainted with it, would have commended him on account of his piety, as he frequently does. Libanius, in an oration which he pronounced not long before his death, extols his continence and averſion to unlawful pleaſures; which would have been rather deriding deriding than commending him, had he been guilty of the above-mentioned crimes.

His character.

[k] Chryſ. in Phil. hom. 15. p. 143. [l] Athan. apol. i. p. 678, 679. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Aur. Vict. p. 527. [o] Liban. orat. iii. p. 212. [p] Vict. epit. p. 544. [q] Eutrop. p. 588. [r] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 692. [s] Aur. Vict. p. 527. [t] Zonar. p. 13.

ZONARAS writes, that, before the death of Conſtans was publicly known, Magnentius ſent in his name for all the officers, whom he thought attached to the deceaſed prince's intereſt, and capable of defeating his own deſigns, and cauſed them to be murdered on the road [u]. But whether the death of Conſtans, and the uſurpation of Magnentius, could be ſo long kept concealed, we leave the reader to judge. Be that as it will, Magnentius, by the death of Conſtans, became maſter of all the countries beyond the Alps, and ſoon after of Italy, Sicily, and Africa [w]. To ſtrengthen his intereſt, he declared his brother Deſiderius, and Decentius, according to ſome, his other brother, according to others, only his couſin, Cæſars. The latter took alſo the names of Magnentius and Magnus, and is diſtinguiſhed on his medals with the uncommon title of Fortiſſimus, or moſt valiant [x]. The news of the death of Conſtans, and the revolt of Gaul, no ſooner reached Illyricum, than Veteranio, general of the foot in Pannonia, aſſumed the imperial robes, and cauſed himſelf to be ſaluted with the title of Auguſtus by the legions under his command. This happened at Sirmium, on the firſt of May, according to Idatius, or on the firſt of March, as we read in the chronicle of Alexandria. He was a native of Upper Mœſia, and ſtricken in years when he uſurped the ſovereignty; but ſo illiterate, that he then firſt learnt to read [y]. Aurelius Victor ſpeaks of him as a man of no parts [z]. But the emperor Julian writes, that he was no deſpicable man [a]; and Eutropius commends him on account of his probity and affability, and adds, that as he had ſerved in the army from his infancy, and had been always attended with ſucceſs, he was univerſally beloved by the ſoldiery [b]. It appears both from the chronicle of Alexandria [c] and from his medals [d], that he was a chriſtian [e]. Philoſtorgius [f] and Theophanes [g] write, that he was inveſted with the purple by Conſtantia, the eldeſt ſiſter of Conſtantius, and widow of Annibalianus, who claimed that right, as having been declared empreſs by her brother Conſtantine. The emperor Julian does not ſpeak of him as

The cruelty of Magnentius.

He declares Deſiderius and Decentius Cæſars.

Veteranio aſſumes the title of Auguſtus.

[u] Zonar. p. 13. [w] Julian. orat. i. p. 47. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 693. [x] Birag. p. 483, 485. [y] Zoſ p. 693. [z] Aur. Vict. p. 527. [a] Julian. p. 59. [b] Eutrop. p 588. [c] Chron. Alexand. p. 678. [d] Spanh. l. ii. p. 91. Birag. p. 486. [e] Chron. Alex. 676. [f] Philoſtorg. p. 22. [g] Theoph. p.

as an uſurper; and Zonaras tells us, that, in aſſuming the imperial dignity, he wrote to Conſtantius, aſſuring him, that he had nothing in view but to oppoſe the uſurper Magnentius; and that he ſhould always look upon himſelf rather as his lieutenant, than an emperor or ſovereign [h]. Philoſtorgius adds, that Conſtantius confirmed to him the title of emperor, and ſent him the diadem [i]. Beſides Magnentius and Veteranio, a third pretender to the empire, ſtarted up, viz. Flavius Popilius Nepotianus, the ſon of Eutropia, ſiſter to Conſtantine the Great; who, having aſſembled a company of gladiators and ſeveral others of deſperate fortunes, aſſumed the purple on the third of June, and in that attire preſented himſelf before the gates of Rome. The prefect Anicetus, who commanded there for Magnentius, ſallied out againſt him with a body of Romans, who were ſoon repulſed, and driven back into the city; which Nepotianus took not long after, and filled with blood and ſlaughter, putting to death among the reſt the prefect Anicetus. Magnentius was no ſooner informed of what had happened, than he ſent Marcellinus, his chief favourite and prime miniſter, againſt this new competitor. Nepotianus received him with great reſolution; whereupon a bloody battle enſued between the ſoldiers of Magnentius and the Romans who had eſpouſed the cauſe of Nepotianus; but the latter being betrayed by a ſenator, named Heraclitus, his men were put to flight, and he himſelf killed, after having enjoyed the ſovereignty twenty-eight days [k]. Marcellinus ordered his head to be carried on the point of a lance through the chief ſtreets of the city, put all thoſe to death who had declared for him, and, under pretence of preventing future diſturbances, commanded a general maſſacre of ſuch as were any-ways related to Conſtantine. On this occaſion many perſons of great diſtinction were inhumanly murdered, and among the reſt Eutropia, the mother of Nepotianus [l]. Soon after, Magnentius himſelf came to Rome, to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying on the war againſt Conſtantius, who was making great preparations to attack him, and revenge the murder of his brother. The tyrant, during his ſtay at Rome, put many perſons of diſtinction to death, whom Marcellinus had ſpared, in order to ſeize their eſtates, and oppreſſed the reſt in a moſt tyrannical manner, obliging them, under pain of death, to contribute half what they Nepotianus aſſumes the title of emperor, and ſeizes Rome.

He is ſlain.

Rome tyrannically oppreſſed by Magnentius.

[h] Zonar. p. 14. [i] Philoſtorg. p. 55. [k] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 693. Eutrop. p. 588. Aur. Vict. p. 527. Ammian. p. 316, 319.
[l] Themiſt. orat. iii. p. 43. Julian. orat. iii. p. 106, 107.

they were worth towards the expences of the approaching war. Having by this means raiſed great ſums, he aſſembled a mighty army, conſiſting of Romans, Germans, Gauls, Franks, Britons, Spaniards, &c. but at the ſame time dreading the uncertain iſſues of war, he diſpatched embaſſadors to Conſtantius, with offers of an accommodation *. That prince was then at Antioch, where, upon the firſt advice of his brother's death, he had cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged emperor of the weſt, and to ſupport that title, had aſſembled all the troops diſperſed in the ſeveral provinces of the eaſt, and a more powerful fleet, if the emperor Julian is to be credited, than that with which Xerxes formerly invaded Greece [m]. Theodoret writes, that Conſtantius, before he ſet out on his march to Europe, exhorted all his ſoldiers to receive the ſacrament of baptiſm, and diſmiſſed ſuch as refuſed to be baptized, declaring, that he could not prevail upon himſelf to expoſe to the dangers of a war perſons not initiated in the holy myſteries [n]. This ſeems to us ſomewhat ſtrange, ſince Conſtantius himſelf was not yet baptized. Be that as it will, Conſtantius ſet out from Antioch about the beginning of autumn, and paſſing through Conſtantinople, arrived at Heraclea, where he was met by deputies from Magnentius and Veteranio, who had agreed to ſupport each other, in caſe Conſtantius would not hearken to an accommodation. The terms propoſed by their deputies were, That they were ready to aſſiſt him with all their forces againſt the Perſians and other barbarians, and to acknowledge him as the firſt emperor, provided he ſuffered them to enjoy the ſame title. The deputies of Magnentius propoſed in his name a match between him and Conſtantia, or rather Conſtantina, the ſiſter of Conſtantius, and widow of Annibalianus, offering at the ſame time to Conſtantius the ſiſter of Magnentius [o]. We are told, that while Conſtantius was deliberating with himſelf whether or no he ſhould yield to theſe terms, and come to an agreement with the two pretended emperors, his father Conſtantine appeared to him in a dream the night following, and preſenting Conſtans to him, commanded him to revenge his death, and aſſured him of ſucceſs in ſo commendable an undertaking. Hereupon Conſtantius, reſolved to hearken to no terms, ordered the deputies, both of Magnentius and Veteranio, to be committed to cuſtody; and purſuing his march with Conſtantius marches againſt him.

Conſtantius rejects the terms of an accommodation propoſed by Magnentius.

* Ammian. l. xvi. p. 64. Socrat. l. i. c. 32. p. 127. [m] Jul. orat. i. p. 77, 78. [n] Theodoret. l. iii. c. i. p. 638. [o] Zonar. p. 14. Themiſt. orat. iii. iv. p. 42. 56. Jul. orat. ii. p. 55 with incredible expedition, arrived at Sardica, before Veteranio knew of his departure from Heraclea. However, he aſſembled in haſte what troops he could, reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle; which Conſtantius wiſely declined, offering to conclude a ſeparate treaty with Veteranio, that he might not have two enemies to contend with at once. Veteranio hearkened to the propoſal, and, being acknowledged emperor by Conſtantius, joined him with all his forces. The two princes, after the conjunction of their forces, mounted the tribunal together to harangue their troops. Conſtantius, who ſpoke the firſt, reminded the ſoldiers, in a very elegant and artful ſpeech, of their obligations to his father; of the bounties they had received at his hands; of the oaths of allegiance which they had taken to his ſons, &c. and concluded with exhorting them not to ſuffer the inhuman murder of his brother, the ſon of ſo great a prince, to paſs unrevenged: and declaring, that he only demanded what was in juſtice due to him, it being agreeable to all the laws of equity, that to a brother ſhould ſucceed a brother, and not a ſtranger, much leſs an open enemy to the whole imperial family [p]. Tho' this ſpeech was levelled againſt Magnentius alone, yet the ſoldiers, applying it to Veteranio, cried out aloud, That they acknowledged no other emperor but Conſtantius, pulled Veteranio down from the tribunal, and obliged him to quit the purple and diadem; who thereupon threw himſelf at Conſtantius's feet, and implored his mercy. The emperor received him with great kindneſs, embraced him, ſtyled him father, entertained him at his table, and afterwards ſent him to Pruſia in Bithynia, where he allowed him a maintenance ſuitable to his quality. This happened, according to ſome, at Sirmium, according to others, at Naiſſus, on the twenty-fifth of December 350. Veteranio ſpent the reſidue of his life, which was ſix years, in works of piety, in aſſiſting daily at the holy myſteries, in relieving the diſtreſſed, &c. without ever intermeddling with affairs of ſtate; nay, he is ſaid to have written frequently to Conſtantius, returning him thanks for having delivered him from the anxiety and cares attending the ſovereignty, and by that means procured him the happineſs he enjoyed [q].

Veteranio depoſed by the ſoldiery.

THE following year, Magnentius entered upon his firſt conſulſhip, and took Gaïſo for his collegue, rewarding him with that dignity for the murder of Conſtans; but as neither of [p] Jul. orat. ii. p. 143. Zoſ. p. 694. Athan. ſolit. p. 844.

[q] Zonar. p. 14. Socrat. l. ii. c. 28. p. 120. Zoſ. p. 695.

of them was acknowledged in the countries ſubject to Conſtantius, the preſent year is in all the faſti dated thus, the year after the conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus [r]. Conſtantius, now maſter of all Illyricum, which was held by Veteranio, and of the army he commanded, conſiſting of an incredible number of foot and twenty thouſand horſe, reſolved to march againſt Magnentius, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would allow him to take the field, and attack the tyrant in his own dominions. In the mean time, upon advice that the Perſians were preparing to invade the eaſtern provinces, he married his ſiſter Conſtantina, the widow of Annibalianus, to Gallus his couſin-german, the ſon of his uncle Julius Conſtantius; created him Cæſar on the fifteenth of March; allotted him for his ſhare not only all the eaſt, but Thrace too and Conſtantinople; and ſent him to Antioch to oppoſe the Perſians, in caſe of an invaſion [s]. Philoſtorgius writes, that, before the two princes parted, they took a ſolemn oath in the preſence of Theophilus and the other biſhops then at court, to maintain an inviolable fidelity to each other [t]. The Perſians contented themſelves with only making ſome inroads into the Roman dominions; but were conſtantly repulſed by Gallus [u]. Theſe inroads and incurſions are the war mentioned by Philoſtorgius [w] and Theophanes [x], and ſaid to have been finiſhed with great glory by Gallus Cæſar. About the ſame time that Gallus was created Cæſar by Conſtantius, Magnentius, who was then at Milan, gave the ſame title, according to Zonaras, to his brother Decentius, whom he diſpatched into Gaul, to defend that country againſt the barbarians, who had invaded it; for Conſtantius had not only ſtirred up the Franks and Saxons to break into that province, by promiſing to relinquiſh to them all the places they ſhould reduce, but had ſent them large ſupplies of money and arms for that purpoſe [y]. The barbarians, upon this encouragement, invaded Gaul with a mighty army, overthrew Decentius in a pitched battle, committed every-where dreadful ravages, and reduced the country in the deplorable condition in which Julian found it, as he himſelf relates at length, in the year 356 [z]. In the mean time, Magnentius, having aſſembled a numerous and formidable army, conſiſting chiefly of Gauls, Franks, and Saxons,

Gallus marries Conſtantina, and is created Cæſar.

The Franks and Saxons invade Gaul.

[r] Buch. cycl. 240. Socrat. l. ii. c. 29. p. 120. [s] Aur. Vict. p. 427. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 695. Ammian. l. xiv. p. 13. [t] Philoſtorg. l. iv. c. 1. p. 63. [u] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 7. 8. [w] Philoſtorg. p. 60. [x] Theoph. p. 34. [y] Liban. orat. xii. p. 269. [z] Jul. epiſt. ad Athen. p. 511. 512.

Saxons, left Italy, and croſſing the Alps that part it from Noricum, advanced into the plains of Pannonia, where Conſtantius, whoſe main ſtrength conſiſted in cavalry, was waiting for him. Magnentius, hearing that his competitor was encamped at a ſmall diſtance, diſpatched a meſſenger to him, inviting him into the extenſive plains of Sciſcia on the Save, to decide there which of them had the beſt title to the empire. Conſtantius accepted the challenge with great joy, and ordered his troops to file off towards Sciſcia; but as they marched in diſorder, they fell into an ambuſcade, and were put to flight with great ſlaughter [a]. Magnentius, puffed up with this ſucceſs, quickened his march towards Sciſcia, without hearkening to the terms propoſed to him by Philip in Conſtantius's name, who, dreading the evil conſequences of a civil war, offered to yield to him the prefecture of Gaul; that is, Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and to acknowledge him emperor, upon condition that he relinquiſhed Italy. Philip being diſmiſſed, Magnentius attempted to paſs the Save in the neighbourhood of Sciſcia; but the garriſon ſallying out, and Conſtantius, who was at a ſmall diſtance, haſtening with a ſtrong detachment to ſupport them, Magnentius's men were put to flight, and great numbers of them cut in pieces. But the uſurper, notwithſtanding this defeat, ſent a few days after one Titianus, a Roman ſenator, with the character of embaſſador, to Conſtantius, adviſing him, if he tendered his life, to relinquiſh the empire, and paſs the reſidue of his days in retirement. To this haughty meſſage, and the bitter invectives uttered by Titianus againſt the great Conſtantine and his children, which Zoſimus himſelf ſtyles outrageous inſults [b], Conſtantius anſwered with great temper, That he did not doubt, but heaven would eſpouſe his cauſe, and revenge the blood of his brother on the author of his death [c]. While the two armies lay at a ſmall diſtance from each other, Sylvanus, of whom hereafter, abandoning Magnentius, fled over to Conſtantius, with a conſiderable body of cavalry under his command. Magnentius, no-ways diſheartened at his defection, attacked Sciſcia; and having taken it by aſſault, and levelled it with the ground, he laid waſte the whole country lying on the Save, and then ſat down before Sirmium, the metropolis of Illyricum; but not being able to reduce it, he removed from thence, and laid cloſe ſiege to Murſa; which obliged Conſtantius to quit his camp at Cibale, where his father Magnentius rejects all terms of peace.

Sciſcia taken by Magnentius, and levelled with the ground.

[a] Zoſ. p. 695. Jul. orat. i. & ii. p. 64, 181. [b] Zoſ. p. 698. [c] Idem ibid. & Jul. orat. l. ii. p. 88, 181.

ther had formerly defeated Licinius, and haſten to the relief of the place. Magnentius, informed of his approach, placed four thouſand Gauls in a neighbouring wood, with orders to fall upon the enemy's rear, when they found both armies engaged. But Conſtantius, receiving timely notice of the ambuſcade, ſeized all the avenues leading to the wood, by which means the party was cut off [d]. After this, Conſtantius approached Murſa, and drew up his army in the adjoining plain along the Drave or Draw, on which Murſa ſtood, the river being on his right, and Magnentius's left. Both armies, thus ranged in battle-array, continued in the preſence of each other till the cloſe of the day, during which time Magnentius, though he profeſſed the chriſtian religion, is ſaid to have ſacrificed, by the advice of a magician, a virgin, and to have obliged his men to drink of her blood mixed with wine [e]. At length the ſignal was given, and the two armies advanced againſt each other with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. Magnentius's centre, according to the account of the emperor Julian [f], was, at the firſt onſet, put in diſorder by Conſtantius's left wing and cavalry; which Magnentius, who had drawn them up unſkilfully, as being altogether ignorant of the art of war, no ſooner obſerved, than he abandoned them, and betook himſelf to a ſhameful flight. His men, eſpecially the Gauls and barbarians, aſhamed to follow the example of their leader, though broken and in the utmoſt confuſion, often rallied in platoons, and, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the victorious army, ſtood their ground till the night was far ſpent, having no reſource but in victory, and being animated by their commanders, who were men of great valour and experience. Thus the emperor Julian. But Zoſimus [g] and Zonaras [h] write, that Magnentius did not retire till his army was entirely routed; and Eutropius, that he narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands. Zonaras adds, that, to avoid being taken, he turned his horſe looſe, adorned as he was with the imperial ornaments, that the enemy, imagining the rider to have been ſlain, might not purſue him [i]. As for the battle, Zonaras tells us, that fortune favoured ſometimes one ſide, and ſometimes the other [k]; and Zoſimus, that the victory was long doubtful; and that Conſtantius, grieved to ſee ſee ſo much blood ſhed for a few provinces, ſent, even in the heat of the combat, deputies to Magnentius, with terms for an accommodation; but that the ſoldiers and officers of the tyrant, rejecting them with the utmoſt indignation, fought like men in deſpair, till the night was far ſpent, when they were at length put to flight by Conſtantius's cavalry, armed cap-á-pé, and purſued to their camp, which was taken and pillaged [l]. Some, favoured by the darkneſs of the night, made their eſcape; but the far greater part were either cut in pieces, or puſhed into the river and drowned [m]. Such was the iſſue of the memorable battle of Murſa, fought, according to the emperor Julian [n], about the end of Autumn; but, according to Idatius, on the twenty-eighth of September. Zonaras writes, that Magnentius loſt on this occaſion twenty-four thouſand men, and Conſtantius thirty thouſand; which we can hardly believe. However that be, it is certain, that the empire was greatly weakened by this blow, and that the battle of Murſa is generally reckoned by the antients one of the moſt dreadful calamities that ever happened to Rome [o]. Moſt of the officers on both ſides were killed, and among the reſt Menelaus, who commanded the Armenian archers under Conſtantius, and had ſignalized himſelf during the engagement in a very eminent manner. He was ſlain by Romulus the enemy's general, who being mortally wounded by him, would not retire till he had killed the perſon, who had given him the wound. We are told, that Menelaus was famous for his ſkill in archery; that he uſed to ſhoot three arrows at a time, which did execution in three different places; and that this greatly contributed to the victory [p]. Marcellinus, the chief author of this war, and all the evils attending it, ſignalized his courage in the battle, but was never afterwards heard of, nor could his body be found; whence he was believed to have been drowned in the river [q]. Though we are not told in expreſs terms by any writer, that Conſtantius was in perſon at the battle of Murſa, yet we can ſcarce believe what we read in Sulpicius Severus, viz. that not daring to appear in the field, he waited the iſſue of the combat in a neighbouring church [r]. As ſoon as it was day, (for the battle continued almoſt all night) the emperor, beholding from an adjoining eminence the plain covered, and the river choaked up, with dead bodies, dies, could not refrain from tears at so melancholy a sight, and being more grieved at the slaughter of so many men, than rejoiced at the victory, he ordered all the slain to be buried without distinction, and such as were wounded to be attended with care. At the same time, he caused a general pardon to be proclaimed for all those who had borne arms against him; those only were excepted who had been concerned in the death of his brother Constans [s]. Magnentius, abandoning Pannonia, fled with the remains of his shattered army into Italy, there to recruit his broken forces, and try the fortune of another battle [t]. Constantius did not pursue him, because the winter approached, says Julian [u], and likewise, without all doubt, because his army was greatly fatigued, weakened, and consequently not in a condition to undertake any new expedition.

The battle of Murſa.

Magnentius overthrown

[d] Jul. ibid. Ammian. l. xv. p. 44. Zonar. p. 15. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 698. [e] Zonar. p. 15. [f] Jul. orat. l. ii. p. 65, 106. [g] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 700. [h] Zonar. p. 15. [i] Idem ibid. [k] Idem ibid.

The battle of Murſa fatal to the empire.

[l] Zoſ. p. 699. [m] Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 67, 110. [n] Idem, orat. i. p. 69. [o] Vict. epit. Hier. chron. Eutrop. &c. [p] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 700. [q] Julian. orat. ii. p. 106. [r] Sulp. Sever. l. ii. p. 158.

An instance of Constantius's good nature.

Magnentius retires to Italy.

The following year, Decentius Cæsar and Paulus were acknowledged consuls at Rome, and Constantius the fifth time, with Gallus Cæsar, at Constantinople. Constantius passed the winter at Sirmium, as appears from the dates of several of his constitutions. By one dated the twenty-sixth of February of this year 352, and addressed to the prefect Rufinus, he granted to eunuchs the liberty of making testaments [w]; whence it is evident, that, till his time, they had been excluded from that privilege. Constantius was a great favourer of eunuchs, and entirely governed by them, and his other domestics [x]. Magnentius having, after the battle of Mursa, fortified the passes of the Alps, and left a sufficient number of troops to defend them, remained the whole winter at Aquileia, passing his time, if Julian is to be credited [y], in feasting and debaucheries, as if no danger threatened him. But Constantius, as soon as the season was proper for action, assembled his troops: and having, without the loss of one man, surprised and taken a castle on the Alps, in which Magnentius had left a strong garrison, advanced in order to force the rest. His sudden approach struck the tyrant with such terror, that he immediately abandoned Aquileia, and ordered the troops that guarded the other passes on the Alps to follow him. By this means Constantius, entering Italy without opposition, made himself master of Aquileia, and the neighbouring country. From thence he advanced to Pavia, where Constantius passes the Julian Alps.

[s] Jul. or. i. ii. p. 69, 107. [t] Zos. l. ii. p. 700. Jul. orat. i. p. 69. [u] Jul. ibid. [w] Cod. Just. l. vi. tit. 22. leg. 5. p. 544. [x] Vide Baron. ann. 352. [y] Jul. ibid. p. 132.

where Magnentius gained a conſiderable advantage over him; which, however, did not prevent him from reducing the whole country bordering on the Po, Magnentius's men abandoning him in whole troops, and delivering to the enemy the places they garriſoned. This ſo diſheartened the tyrant, that in the end he left Italy, and retired with all his forces into Gaul [z]. Zoſimus writes, that he abandoned Italy, becauſe he found the city of Rome greatly attached to Conſtantius [a]; and Socrates, that before he withdrew into Gaul, he came to Rome, and there put a multitude of perſons of all ranks to death [b]. Conſtantius was maſter of Rome and Italy before the third of November; for we find a law bearing that date, addreſſed to the Roman people, wherein the emperor declares void ſome of the acts of Magnentius [c]. But, not ſatisfied with driving him from Italy, he ſent a powerful fleet to ſeize on Africa and Carthage; which immediately ſubmitted, as did ſoon after Sicily and Spain [d]. At the ſame time, ſeveral cities in Gaul revolted from the tyrant, and among the reſt Treves, the inhabitants of which important place ſhutting their gates againſt Decentius Cæſar, the tyrant's brother, declared for Conſtantius, and choſe one Pemenes to govern them in his name [e]. Magnentius, apprehending his affairs to be now in a deſperate condition, diſpatched to Conſtantius a ſenator, and after him ſome biſhops, to treat of a peace, offering to reſign the ſovereignty, upon condition that the emperor would grant him his life, and ſome honourable employment. But the emperor treated the ſenator as a ſpy, and diſmiſſed the biſhops, without deigning to return them any anſwer [f]. Hereupon Magnentius, perceiving there was no room left for pardon, recruited his army in the beſt manner he could, and diſpatched an aſſaſſin into the eaſt to murder Gallus Cæſar, hoping that his death would oblige the emperor to withdraw his forces from Gaul, and march in perſon to the defence of the eaſtern provinces, threatened by the Perſians. The aſſaſſin had already gained ſome of Gallus's guards; but the plot being diſcovered before it could be put in execution, they were all ſeized, and executed as traitors [g]. Some diſturbances however happened this year in the eaſt, raiſed, in all likelihood, and fomented by the emiſſaries of Magnentius;

Magnentius abandons Italy, and retires into Gaul.

Africa, Sicily and Spain declare for Conſtantius.

[z] Idem, or. ii. p. 133, 134. Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 457.
[a] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 700. [b] Socrat. l. ii. c. 32. p. 127. [c] Cod. Theodoſ. tit. 5. p. 408. [d] Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 73, 74, 137.
[e] Ammian. l. xv. p. 45. [f] Zonar. p. 15. [g] Idem, p. 15, 16.

Magnentius; for in Paleſtine the Jews took arms, and cutting the throats of the ſoldiers in the night, ſet up one Patricius for their prince; and over-running all Paleſtine, and the neighbouring places, committed every-where dreadful diſorders, exerting their cruelty chiefly upon the Samaritans. But Gallus, who was then at Antioch, marching againſt them upon the firſt news of their revolt, cut great numbers of them in pieces, without ſparing either their women or children, laid waſte their country, and burnt ſeveral of their cities; among the reſt Tiberias, Dioſpolis, and Diocæſarea. The laſt city he razed to the ground, and put all the Jews he found in it to the ſword, becauſe the revolt had begun there [h]. The Jews committed likewiſe ſome diſorders in Gaul, where they ſtabbed a man of great diſtinction, who, after having governed Egypt, had been ſent by Conſtantius into Gaul, and would, in all likelihood, had he not been thus ſuddenly taken off, prevailed upon the inhabitants to declare for Conſtantius. His tomb and epitaph were diſcovered many ages after in the village of Peyruis on the Durance [i]. Towards the cloſe of this, or the beginning of the following, year 353, Conſtantius married Euſebia, a native of Theſſalonica, the metropolis of Macedon, and the daughter of a conſular, and of a lady who is greatly commended for her chaſtity, and the extraordinary care ſhe took in educating her children after the death of her huſband [k]. She had two brothers, Euſebius and Hypatius, whom we ſhall ſee conſuls in 359. The emperor ſent for her out of Macedon, married her with great ſolemnity, loved her to the laſt more than he had done any of his other wives, (for he had had ſeveral) and, to perpetuate the memory of her name, made a new dioceſe, comprehending Bithynia, and ſome other provinces, to which he gave the name of Pietas, or Piety, the import of the Greek word Euſebia [l]. She is greatly commended by Ammianus [m], Zoſimus [n], and above all by Julian, who wrote her panegyric about the year 357 [o], for her beauty, virtue, obliging behaviour, ſkill in polite learning, prudence, &c. Julian was indebted to her both for his life, and the dignity of Cæſar [p]. She was no ſooner inveſted with power,

The Jews revolt; but are ſeverely puniſhed.

Conſtantius marries Euſebia.

Her character.

[h] Socrat. l. iv. c. 7. p. 545. Soz. l. ii. c. 33. p. 128. Hier. chron. [i] Spon. miſcel. antiq. p. 202. [k] Julian. orat. iii. p. 205. [l] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 185. Cang. Byzant. fam. p. 48. Julian. p. 206. Vict. epit. [m] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 185. [n] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 702. [o] Julian. orat. iii. p. 190. [p] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 185.

than ſhe raiſed to the firſt employments all her relations, and the friends of her family [q]. On the other hand, Victor the younger charges her with not imitating the example of the empreſs Plotina, who adviſed her huſband Trajan to prefer the intereſt of his people to that of the exchequer [r]. Baronius ſpeaks of her as a profeſſed enemy to the catholic church, and a zealous favourer of the Arians, probably induced thereunto by what he had read in Athanaſius and Theodoret, of whom the former ſays in general terms, that the Arians were ſupported by the credit of women [s]; and the latter, that the empreſs having ſent money to Liberius, biſhop of Rome, to be diſtributed among the indigent chriſtians, he could not be prevailed upon to accept it, ſaying, Let the empreſs employ as her almoners her Arian biſhops, Auxentius and Epictetus [t]. Suidas tells us, that Leontius biſhop of Tripoli in Lydia, refuſing to wait upon the empreſs, becauſe ſhe had received other biſhops with great haughtineſs, ſhe ſent for him; but he, inſtead of complying immediately with her meſſage, acquainted her, that he thought himſelf obliged to avoid appearing before her, unleſs ſhe promiſed to receive him with that reſpect which was due to his character; that is, to deſcend from her throne, as ſoon as he appeared, to meet him near the door; to receive his bleſſing in an humble poſture; and ſtand till he had taken his place, and given her leave to ſit down. The empreſs, tranſported with rage, ſays the hiſtorian, at this anſwer, and ſwelled with pride, uttered, in the height of her fury, dreadful menaces againſt the biſhop; and complaining to Conſtantius of his unreaſonable pretenſions, endeavoured to inſpire him with her own rage. But the emperor, giving no ear to her complaints, commended the biſhop for thus maintaining his ſacred dignity and character, and deſired the empreſs to retire to her apartment till her anger was allayed [u]. Both Suidas and Philoſtorgius [w] beſtow mighty encomiums on Leontius, and paint him as a man of extraordinary merit; but to us he ſeems to have been, at leaſt, deſtitute of prudence and diſcretion. The prelates of the church ought not to flatter princes with a mean complaiſance; but neither are they allowed, in admoniſhing them of their faults, to be wanting to that reſpect which is due to their high ſtation. Euſebia proved barren; whence either out of jealouſy, or for for ſome reaſons of ſtate unknown to us, ſhe obliged her ſiſter-in-law Helena, whom Julian had, by her intereſt, obtained in marriage of Conſtantius, to take a potion, which made her miſcarry as often as ſhe proved with child [x]. Julian married her about the end of the year 355, and this potion was given her, as Ammianus aſſures us, at Rome in 357. Before that time ſhe had been delivered in Gaul of a ſon, the only child ſhe could yet have; but he was diſpatched by the midwife, not without private orders from Euſebia, uneaſy at Julian's having any iſſue. Euſebia was ſtill living in the year 359, but dead ſome time before the end of the year 360 [y]. We are told, that ſhe died of a diſtemper occaſioned by her barrenneſs; and that her death was haſtened by a remedy with which unſkilful women pretended to remove it [z]. Conſtantius was this year, as appears from the dates of his laws, on the twenty-ſixth of February and fifth of March at Sirmium; on the eighth of April at Sabaria in Pannonia; on the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame month, the thirteenth of May, and the twenty-fourth of June, at Sirmium; on the third of November at Milan; and on the firſt of December again at Sirmium [a].

[q] Jul. ibid. p. 116, 117. [r] Vict. epit. p. 545. [s] Athan. ſolit. 813. [t] Theodoret. l. ii. c. 13. p. 609. [u] Suid. A. p. 20. [w] Philoſtorg. l. vii. c. 6. p. 504. Suid. ibid.

THE following year, when Conſtantius was conſul the ſixth time, and Gallus Cæſar the ſecond, the war againſt Magnentius was carried on with more vigour than ever, and happily ended by a third battle, ſays Julian [b], fought by the emperor's generals in the Cottian Alps, that is, in the Higher Dauphiné, near a caſtle called Mons Seleucus, or Mons Seleuci, which ſtood between Die and Gap, not far from the place where the preſent borough of Aſpres ſtands [c]. Magnentius's forces being in this battle likewiſe routed and broken, the tyrant took ſhelter in Lions; but the few ſoldiers who attended him, deſpairing now of any further ſucceſs, reſolved to purchaſe the emperor's favour by delivering up to him his rival, the author of the preſent calamitous war; and accordingly ſurrounded the houſe where he lodged, to prevent his eſcape. It was probably on this occaſion that Magnentius addreſſing himſelf to his men, they, inſtead of liſtening to him, cried out, with one voice, Long live Conſtantius Auguſtus. This at leaſt to us ſeems more probable than what we read in Socrates [d] and Sozomen [e], viz. that Magnentius, endeavouring in a ſet ſpeech to encourage his men, whoſe ſpirits began to ſink under their ill fortune, they, forced by a ſuperior impulſe, inſtead of Long live Magnentius Auguſtus, cried out with one voice, Long live Conſtantius Auguſtus. From this miracle, add theſe two authors, Magnentius concluded, that his rival was favoured by heaven; and therefore, from that time forward, laying all other thoughts aſide, ſtudied only how to make his eſcape. The tyrant, well appriſed with the intention of his men, and thereupon tranſported with rage and deſpair, firſt ſlew with his own hand, his mother, his brother Deſiderius, whom he had created Cæſar, and ſuch of his relations and friends as were with him; and then, fixing his ſword in a wall, threw himſelf upon it, to avoid by that means a more ſhameful death, which he well deſerved, and had juſt reaſon to apprehend, if he fell alive into the hands of Conſtantius [f]. Such was the deſerved end of the tyrant and uſurper Magnentius, the firſt, ſay ſome writers, who brought a ſcandal upon chriſtianity, of which he made an outward profeſſion, by the murder of his lawful ſovereign. But we have ſhewn pretty plain in the reign of the emperor Philip, that he was the firſt chriſtian who imbrued his hands in the blood of his ſovereign. All authors agree, that Magnentius died this year 353, about the middle of Auguſt, ſays Socrates, after he had held the ſupreme power three years, and near ſeven months, being, at the time of his death, about fifty years old. His head was, by the emperor's orders, cut off, and carried through moſt of the provinces of the empire [g]. His brother Decentius Cæſar, who was marching to his aſſiſtance, and had already reached Sens, hearing of his death, and finding himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy's forces, choſe rather to ſtrangle himſelf, than to fall alive into the emperor's hands. His death happened on the eighteenth of Auguſt [h]. On ſome of his medals he is ſtyled Auguſtus; and both on his, and thoſe of Magnentius, mention is made of a victory gained by the two Auguſti, and by Cæſar [i]. This victory is perhaps the advantage they gained over Conſtantius at Pavia, as we have related above; after which Magnentius probably gave Decentius the title of emperor.

Magnentius defeated in Gaul.

[x] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 72. [y] Idem, l. xviii. p. 118. l. xxi. p. 185. [z] Zonar. p. 20. Chryſ. in Philip. hom. 5. p. 144. [a] Cod. Juſt. l. vi. tit. 22. leg. 5. p. 544. [b] Jul. orat. ii. p. 137. [c] Burdigal. itin. p. 39. Itin. Anton. p. 22. Baud. p. 493.

He lays violent hands on himſelf.

Decentius Cæſar ſtrangles himſelf.

[d] Socrat. l. ii. c. 32. p. 127. [e] Soz. l. iv. c. 7. p. 544.
[f] Zonar. p. 16. Zoſ. l. ii. p. 701. Jul. orat. i. p. 73. Vict. epit.
[g] Vict. epit. p. 544. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 227. [h] Vict. ibid. Zoſ. p. 701. Socrat. p. 128. Zonar. p. 16. [i] Birag. p. 483–485.

emperor. Zonaras writes, that Deſiderius was not killed by Magnentius, but dangerouſly wounded; and that, upon his recovery, he yielded himſelf up to Conſtantius [k]. That author does not tell us what reception he met with; but Julian ſays in general terms, that Conſtantius, after the victory, ſheathed his ſword, and ſpared thoſe who were ſuſpected of the greateſt crimes, the tyrant's favourites and confidents, and ſuch as taking upon them to diſcharge his embaſſies, had abuſed their prince in a moſt outrageous manner. The writer means, no doubt, Titianus, of whoſe embaſſy to Conſtantius, and inſolent behaviour, we have ſpoken above; as does likewiſe Themiſtius, where he tells us, that the emperor having got into his power the perſon, with whoſe outrages he had been moſt affected, he not only forgave him, but requited his invectives with innumerable favours, the ſenſe of which kindneſs from the hands of a prince whom he had ſo inſolently abuſed, broke his heart [l]. Thus the panegyriſts. But hiſtorians do not ſpeak ſo favourably of Conſtantius; for Zoſimus tells us, that, not able to bear his good fortune, he grew proud, haughty, and imperious [m]; and Libanius, that thoſe who had ſerved under Magnentius, dreading the ſeverity of Conſtantius, and not daring to ſhew themſelves, turned public robbers, and infeſted the high-ways, till they were again taken into the ſervice by Julian [n]. Ammianus aſſures us, that the emperor ſpared none, who had, or were ſuſpected to have, rendered the uſurper any conſiderable ſervice; and that many officers, both civil and military, were under that pretence loaded with chains, and dragged to the tribunal of the emperor, who ſentenced them to death, or ſeized their eſtates, and confined them to deſert iſlands, upon the depoſition of their known enemies, or perſons altogether unworthy of credit; nay, frequently upon bare ſuſpicions, when no one appeared againſt them [o]. Many innocent perſons, ſays the ſame writer, were put to death, or baniſhed; among the latter he names one Gerontius, who had been honoured by Magnentius with the title of comes or count, and was therefore firſt racked, by Conſtantius's order, in a moſt inhuman manner, and then ſent into exile [p]. As the emperor gave ear to informations, informers multiplied without number; but the moſt miſchievous of that infamous tribe was one Paulus, a Spaniard, who had the character of ſecretary, and was nick-

Conſtantius's clemency extolled by the panegyriſts;

From whom hiſtorians differ

And give us ſeveral inſtances of his cruelty.

named

[k] Zon. p. 16. [l] Themiſt. orat. vi. p. 80. [m] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 701. [n] Liban. orat. xii. p. 285, 286. [o] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 9. [p] Idem ibid.

named Catena; that is, Chain, being remarkable for making accuſations ariſe from one another, and linking them together, as it were, in a chain. He was ſent into Britain, to bring from thence the tribunes and other officers, who had ſided with Magnentius; that is, who had obeyed the uſurper, when they were not in a condition to oppoſe him. He diſcharged this commiſſion with ſuch cruelty and injuſtice, that Martinus, a man of known integrity, and at that time vicar of the iſland, generouſly interpoſing in behalf of the innocent, declared, that, unleſs Paulus altered his meaſures, he would withdraw from his government, not being able to ſee the innocent thus tyrannically oppreſſed, and confounded with the guilty. This Paulus highly reſented, and even threatened to treat him as a traitor, and ſend him loaded with chains to the emperor. Hereupon Martinus drawing his ſword, attempted to kill the informer; but he, dexterouſly avoiding the puſh, received only a ſlight wound; and the brave Martinus buried his ſword in his own breaſt [q]. Notwithſtanding the odium which the death of ſo deſerving a man caſt upon the reign of Conſtantius, all thoſe, whom Paulus brought to him, were ſtripped of their eſtates, and either proſcribed, baniſhed, or put to death [r]. The name of Paulus is frequently mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, who relates ſeveral inſtances of his cruelty. Libanius likewiſe ſpeaks of one Ariſtophanes, whom that inhuman miniſter cauſed to be beaten with balls of lead till he was ready to expire [s]. The emperor was this year, on the ſixth of September, at Lions, as appears from a law bearing that date, which declares void all the public acts of the uſurper, and promiſes indemnity and pardon to all concerned in his revolt, excepting thoſe who were guilty of five crimes, which the laws puniſhed with death. Gothofredus endeavours to explain this law [t]. By another law of this year, the date of which is much diſputed, he granted many valuable privileges and exemptions to the clergy, to their wives, children and domeſtics [u]. From Lions the emperor removed to Arles, where he paſſed the winter, and ſolemnized with great pomp and rejoicings the end of the thirtieth year of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæſar; that is, from the eighth of November 323 [w]. Some modern writers pretend, that on occaſion

Paulus Catena, a noted informer, ſent into Britain.

His cruelty.

[q] Idem, p. 9, 10. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Liban. orat. ix. p. 214. [t] Cod. Theodoſ. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 2. p. 270. [u] Cod. Theodo. tit. 6. p. 34, 35. [w] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 8, 9. Nor. dec. c. 1. p. 78, 79.

ſion of this ſolemnity was erected at Arles the obeliſk, which was not long ſince diſcovered there [x]. But this is a mere conjecture; for we have no poſitive proof even of its having been raiſed in honour of Conſtantius. Before the emperor left Arles, he ſummoned a council there, and on that occaſion gave many inſtances of his irreconcileable hatred to the orthodox, whom he had already begun to perſecute, and to the biſhops, who ſtood up in defence of the faith of the council of Nice, eſpecially to the great Athanaſius, and the holy biſhop Paulinus, who was driven from Treves, and ſent into exile [y]. Gaul was this year miſerably ravaged by the barbarians beyond the Rhine, and the diſbanded troops of Magnentius. At Rome the populace roſe on account of the ſcarcity of proviſions, and committed great diſorders. In Aſia the Iſaurian robbers over-ran Lycaonia and Pamphylia, and even laid ſiege to Seleucia, a great and populous city, and the capital of Iſauria. Count Caſtricius defended the place with three legions, ſays Ammianus; which ſhews, that the legions were not at this time near ſo numerous as formerly, but much the ſame with our regiments. Gallus Cæſar no ſooner received news of the ſiege of Seleucia, than he diſpatched Nibridius, count of the eaſt, to the relief of the place, who obliged the Iſaurians to abandon the enterprize, and take refuge in their inacceſſible mountains [z]. At the ſame time the Saracens committed dreadful ravages in Meſopotamia; and the Perſians, under the command of Nohadarus, attempted to ſurprize the city of Batne in the province of Anthemuſia on the Euphrates, on occaſion of a great fair which was annually held there for the vent of Indian and Chineſe commodities [a]. But the eaſtern provinces were not ſo much haraſſed by the barbarians as by Gallus himſelf, who commanded there with the title of Cæſar, and governed more like a tyrant and madman, than a prince. His unexpected advancement at the age of twenty-four or twenty-five, his great quality, (for he was the nephew of Conſtantine, the couſin and brother-in-law of Conſtantius) ſome ſlight advantages obtained over the Jews, Perſians, and Iſaurians, and the flattering panegyrics of Libanius and others, pronounced before him, inſpired him with ſuch pride and arrogance, that he became altogether inſupportable, and abandoned himſelf to every act of violence and oppreſſion. He is even ſaid to have entertained thoughts of revolting from Conſtantius, and ſetting Conſtantius perſecutes the orthodox.

The Iſaurians over-run ſeveral provinces.

The extravagant behaviour of Gallus.

[x] P. Pagi. p. 353. [y] Zonar. p. 16. [z] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 10 - 15. [a] Idem ibid.

ſetting up for himſelf [b]. He was naturally inclined to cruelty; and his wife Conſtantina, inſtead of ſoftening his ſavage temper, took pains to encourage him in his cruelty, and to exaſperate him againſt ſuch as did not yield to her the moſt ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion, being puffed up beyond meaſure with the thought that ſhe was the daughter and ſiſter of an emperor, the widow of a king, and the wife of Cæſar. Ammianus ſtyles her the Megæra or fury of her ſex, and adds, that her cruelty was equal to her ambition [c]. Gallus, being thus egged on by his natural cruelty, and the reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit of his wife, broke out into all acts of violence imaginable. Some were murdered upon bare ſuſpicions; others deprived of their eſtates, and baniſhed. The prince entertained an incredible number of informers and ſpies, who, inſinuating themſelves into all companies, related to Gallus and his wife, and exaggerated, what they had heard of them; and the perſons thus accuſed were, without ſo much as being heard, hurried to execution, or privately diſpatched. Gallus himſelf, in order to make diſcoveries, uſed to walk the ſtreets in the night-time in diſguiſe, and to mix with the populace in public-houſes; but he did not long continue ſo ſhameful a practice, having been often known, by reaſon the ſtreets of Antioch, where he reſided, were illuminated the whole night with a great number of lights. His ſuſpicious and cruel temper being once diſcovered, ſuch as had private enemies laid hold of the prince's foible to gratify their own hatred, nothing being more eaſy than to deſtroy the moſt innocent perſons, and procure the confiſcation of their eſtates; for under Gallus it was one and the ſame thing to be accuſed or ſuſpected, and condemned. By this means all the cities and provinces were filled with blood and ſlaughter, and no man, ſays Ammianus, however free from guilt, was ſure to live or enjoy his eſtate a whole day. Among the many innocent perſons, whom Gallus unjuſtly deprived of their lives, liberty, or eſtates, authors particularly mention one Clematius, a nobleman of Alexandria, who refuſing to comply with the luſtful deſires of his wife's mother, ſhe turning her love into hatred, applied to Conſtantina, and preſenting her with a necklace of great value, obtained a warrant to Honoratus, count of the eaſt, to put him to death, which he did accordingly [d]. Thalaſſus, at that time prefect of the eaſt, was greatly concerned at the conduct of Gallus; and, had he been a man of prudence

His cruelty and ſuſpicious temper.

Thalaſſus's imprudent behaviour.

[b] Idem, p. 31. Socrat. l. ii. c. 34. p. 128. Liban. vit. p. 34.
[c] Ammian. p. 2, 3. [d] Idem, p. 27.

dence and diſcretion, might have eaſily corrected it, and prevented many diſorders; but being himſelf of a haughty and imperious temper, inſtead of admoniſhing Gallus of his faults with the reſpect that was due to his rank, he oppoſed him with too much heat, and checked him with a great deal of roughneſs and ill-nature; and not ſatisfied with that, he informed the emperor of all his actions, exaggerating every thing to a great degree, not privately, but in public, with a deſign Gallus ſhould know he had done it; which, inſtead of reclaiming him, prompted him to ſtill greater exceſſes, that he might not ſeem to yield to his inferior [e].

THE following year, Conſtantius was conſul the ſeventh time, and Gallus the third. The emperor, having paſſed the winter at Arles, went early in the ſpring to Valence, with a deſign to march againſt Gondomadus and Vadomorus, two brothers, and both kings of the Alemans, who had made frequent inroads into that part of Gaul, which lay next to their territories. The rendezvous of the troops deſigned for this expedition was at Challon, on the Sône, where they began to mutiny for want of proviſions, the heavy rains that had fallen preventing the arrival of the corn that was expected from Aquitaine. Conſtantius was inclined to ſend to the mutinous army Rufinus, prefect of Gaul, with a deſign, as was ſuppoſed, to expoſe him to the fury of the incenſed ſoldiery, he being very powerful, and by the mother's ſide uncle to Gallus, on whoſe ruin the emperor had already reſolved. But Rufinus's friends at court prevailed upon the emperor to change his mind; and Euſebius, Conſtantius's great chamberlain, gained over the moſt mutinous and refractory by diſtributing money among them underhand. The emperor ſtaid ſome time at Valence, and there received certain advice of what Gallus had done; that is, as we conjecture, of the murder of Domitian, of which we ſhall ſpeak anon. The mutiny being appeaſed, and the expected convoys arriving ſoon after, the army marched chearfully towards Rauracum on the Rhine, a little above the preſent city of Baſle, where the emperor attempted to lay a bridge over that river; but the Germans from the other ſide of the Rhine plied the workmen ſo warmly with inceſſant ſhowers of darts and arrows, that the deſign was laid aſide as altogether impracticable. This reduced the emperor to great ſtreights: but while he was at a loſs what courſe to take, a perſon well acquainted with the country, ſhewed him a place where the river Conſtantius marches againſt the Alemans.

Attempts in vain to lay a bridge over the Rhine.

[e] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 3. [f] Idem, p. 23.

river was fordable. They were, however, prevented from croſſing it, by the unexpected arrival of deputies from the enemy's camp to ſue for peace; which the emperor, by the advice of his council, and approbation of the army, readily granted, that he might be at leiſure to conſult what meaſures might be taken with reſpect to his couſin Gallus Cæſar, of whoſe extravagant conduct new complaints were daily laid before him. With this view he left Gaul, as ſoon as the treaty was concluded, and repaired to Milan [g]. He was on the twenty-ſecond of June at Ceſena in Romagna, and on the twenty-firſt of July at Ravenna; whence he went to Milan, the uſual place of his reſidence, and there paſſed the winter [h]. We ſhall now give a ſuccinct account of the affairs of the eaſt, and the ſtrange conduct of Gallus there, which gave juſt occaſion to the complaints of the people, and induced the emperor to reſolve upon his ruin. What happened there the preceding year, we have related above. In the beginning of the preſent year, great diſturbances were raiſed at Antioch, on account of the ſcarcity of proviſions. For Gallus commanding the magiſtrates to lower the prices, and they repreſenting, that this, inſtead of mitigating, would encreaſe the evil, he cauſed ſome of them to be publicly executed, and others to be dragged to priſon. But Honoratus, who was ſtill count of the eaſt, oppoſed this wild decree, and, in ſpite of Gallus, ſet the priſoners at liberty [i]. Some time after Gallus being to ſet out for Hierapolis, the people of Antioch beſeeching him to give orders before his departure for the conveying of corn to their city from other countries, he anſwered, that if they were not ſupplied, it was the fault of Theophilus, governor of Syria. This anſwer the people remembered, and the price of proviſions riſing, four or five mean perſons threw themſelves upon Theophilus in the circus; and the mob immediately riſing, they not only murdered him, but tranſported with rage, dragged his body about the ſtreets; a treatment which he no-ways deſerved, having diſcharged his employment with great mildneſs and integrity. They attempted to treat Eubulus, one of the chief men in the city, and his ſon, in the ſame manner; but they found means to eſcape the fury of the populace, who nevertheleſs burnt their houſes [k]. The death of Theophilus, thus abandoned by Gallus

Grants a peace to the Alemans.

Theophilus, governor of Syria, abandoned by Gallus to the rage of the populace [g] Idem ibid. p. 23—25. [h] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 52.

[i] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 25. Liban. vit. [k] Ammian. p. 16. Julian. p. 111. Liban. or. xiv. p. 399.

Gallus to the rage of the multitude, and his protecting one Serianus, who was univerſally hated by all good men, and had even aſpired at the empire, greatly prejudiced Conſtantius againſt him. The emperor, however, wrote ſeveral obliging letters to him; but at the ſame time, under various pretences, drew the flower of his troops into the weſt. About this time Thalaſſus, prefect of the eaſt, dying, Conſtantius named in his room one Domitian; and in giving him his inſtructions at his departure, told him among other things, he had been informed that Gallus was deſirous of coming to Italy, and paying him a viſit; adding, If you think it proper, you may conduct him to my preſence; but let it be done with all the duty and reſpect owing to his birth and ſtation. Domitian underſtood the emperor's meaning; but as he was the ſon of a tradeſman, he wanted politeneſs and addreſs to execute his tacit orders, agreeable to the prince's intention. For on his arrival at Antioch, he went directly to the houſe where the prefects lodged, without paying his reſpects to Cæſar, though he paſſed before his palace; and, under colour of being indiſpoſed, kept ſeveral days at home, informing himſelf of the conduct of Gallus, and ſending to the emperor an exaggerated account of all he heard. At length Gallus ſending him word that he ſhould be glad to ſee him, he went to court; and coming up to the prince, You muſt go, ſaid he abruptly, to Italy; for ſuch is the emperor's will and pleaſure; which, if you refuſe to comply with, I ſhall ſtop the neceſſary appointments for the maintenance of your houſhold. Having thus ſpoken, he withdrew without uttering a ſingle word more, or waiting the prince's anſwer, who called him back, and afterwards often ſent for him; but could never prevail upon him to appear again at court. Gallus, highly provoked, and not without reaſon, at the conduct of the prefect, ordered him to be put under arreſt. Montius, or, as others call him, Magnus, then quæſtor, foreſeeing the evil conſequences that muſt inevitably attend the execution of this order, thought himſelf obliged to prevent them, and with great frankneſs told Gallus, that he ought to pull down the ſtatues of Conſtantius before he thought of arreſting or putting to death a prefect [1]. Others ſay, that addreſſing himſelf to Gallus, he ſpoke the following words with an air of contempt; The emperor has not thought fit to truſt you with the power of creating a ſingle magiſtrate, and you talk of putting putting a prefect to death [m]! Gallus, offended at the liberty which the quæſtor had taken, complained of it to his guards, who immediately ſeizing Montius, and faſtening cords to his feet, dragged him to the houſe of Domitian, whom they threw down ſtairs, and dragged with Montius through the chief ſtreets of Antioch, caſting, after many inſults, both their bodies into the river [n]. This bold attempt, in which Conſtantina is ſaid to have had a great ſhare, was followed by many other cruelties and murders, committed in all the provinces of the eaſt, at the inſtigation of Gallus and his wife Conſtantina, whoſe thirſt after blood was as great as that of her huſband. The reader will find in Ammianus Marcellinus [o], a detail of thoſe cruel and inhuman executions. It being diſcovered, that a purple garment was making privately at Tyre, the two Apollinares, father and ſon, the former governor of Phœnicia, and the latter ſon-in-law to the prefect Domitian, were by Gallus's orders arreſted, as if they aſpired at the ſovereignty, and, without any farther enquiry, condemned to baniſhment. But thoſe who conducted them, at ſome diſtance from Antioch, purſuant to their private orders, broke their thighs, and then put them to death [p]. Urſicinus, general of the horſe, was obliged to abandon the defence of Niſibis, and haſten to Antioch, to preſide at the enquiry which the emperor ordered to be made in this affair; but the other judges being named, and well inſtructed before-hand by Gallus and Conſtantina, he could not proceed as he would have otherwiſe done; for Ammianus Marcellinus, who ſerved under him, ſpeaks every-where of him as a man of an unblemiſhed character. As this commiſſion gave him an opportunity of diſcovering many things till then not known, he acquainted the emperor with the ſtate of affairs in the eaſt, and preſſed him to redreſs the many evils which afflicted thoſe provinces [q]. Beſides the informations the emperor received of Gallus's male-adminiſtration and cruelties, he was told, that, not ſatisfied with the dignity of Cæſar, he aſpired at the ſovereignty, and harboured evil deſigns againſt the emperor. This charge was believed by Socrates [r], and is not denied by Ammianus [s]. But other writers will have theſe to have been mere inventions of Dynamus and Picentius, two mean and infamous informers [t]. To whom Zoſimus adds the prefect

The imprudent conduct of the prefect Domitian.

[1] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 16, 17. Zonar. p. 16.

He and Montius murdered.

And many others.

Gallus accuſed of aſpiring at the ſovereignty.

[m] Philoſtorg. l. iii. p. 61. [n] Socr. l. ii. c. 34. p. 128. Ammian. p. 17. Zon. p. 17. [o] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 18—23.
[p] Idem, p. 21, 22. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Socrat. l, ii. c. 34. p. 128. [s] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 1. [t] Zoſ. l. ii. p. 701,

fect Lampridius, a man of great ambition, and the eunuchs of the court, who had a great aſcendant over the emperor, eſpecially his chief chamberlain Euſebius. Conſtantius, giving credit to their accuſations, whether true or falſe, reſolved upon the ruin and death of Gallus, tho' his couſin-german and brother-in-law; but leſt he ſhould openly revolt, he carefully concealed his intention, and wrote a very friendly and obliging letter to Gallus, inviting him to Italy, that he might adviſe with him on certain affairs of great importance. At the ſame time, he wrote to Urſicinus, at that time magiſter equitum, or general of the horſe in the eaſt, to come with all ſpeed to Milan, in order to deliberate about the moſt proper meaſures that might be taken with reſpect to the Perſians, who were aſſembling their forces, as was pretended, with a deſign to invade Syria. This was likewiſe a pretext, which the emperor made uſe of to remove Urſicinus, leſt he ſhould raiſe diſturbances in the eaſt during the abſence of Galus. For the eunuchs and courtiers, dreading the merit and abilities of that worthy man and great warrior, filled the emperor's mind with ſuch fears and jealouſies, in order to compaſs his ruin. One Proſper, a comes or count, was ſent to ſucceed him, but only with the title and character of his deputy, to remove from him all apprehenſions of his being ſuſpected [u]. Urſicinus, on the receipt of the emperor's letter, ſet out immediately, accompanied by Ammianus the hiſtorian, and arrived at Milan much ſooner than he was expected, to the great joy of the emperor, who now thought of nothing but getting Gallus into his power. In order to this, beſides the above-mentioned letter to Gallus, he wrote ſeveral others to Conſtantina, expreſſing a great deſire to ſee her, and inviting her to court, with the moſt tender inſinuations imaginable; for he thought that the readieſt way to draw Gallus thither. They were both too ſenſible of their evil conduct not to apprehend the worſt from the emperor; however, Conſtantina, who was well acquainted with her brother's temper, hoped by her artful inſinuations to diſarm his rage; and, without any farther deliberation, ſet out on her journey, leaving Gallus at Antioch: but ſhe had ſcarce entered the province of Bithynia, when ſhe was ſeized with a fever at a place called Cœni Gallicani, of which ſhe died, leaving behind her one daughter, of whom no farther mention is made in hiſtory. Her body was carried to Rome, and buried on the Nomentan

Gallus and Urſicinus invited into Italy;

And likewiſe Conſtantina.

Conſtantina dies on her journey.

[u] Ammian. xiv. p. 26.

mentan way, where ſtood the church of the martyr Agnes, which ſhe had founded [w]. Her death threw Gallus into the utmoſt perplexity; as he had now loſt his only advocate with the emperor, he deſpaired of being able to appeaſe him; and therefore began to think of aſſuming the title of Auguſtus, which he had done, had he met with the leaſt encouragement; but moſt of his friends deſerting him on account of his inconſtant temper, and the reſt hating him for his cruelty, and dreading the power of Conſtantius, he was obliged to lay aſide all thoughts of openly revolting. In the mean time, the emperor, with frequent letters and repeated meſſages, importuned him to come with all ſpeed to court. Among the reſt, he ſent one Scudilo to him, a crafty inſinuating man, who, by giving him all imaginable aſſurances on the emperor's part, prevailed upon him to leave Antioch, and begin his journey to Italy. He ſtopt ſome time at Conſtantinople, where, like a man who apprehended no danger, he exhibited public ſhews, and diverted himſelf and the people with the circenſian ſports. This confident behaviour encreaſed the emperor's fears and jealouſies, who thereupon ordered all the garriſons to be removed out of the cities and towns through which he was to paſs, leſt he ſhould debauch them; and at the ſame time diſpatched ſeveral officers to him, who, under colour of attending him, were to keep a watchful eye over him; which they did with ſuch ſtrictneſs, that, though the Thebean legions encamped in Thrace, upon his arrival at Adrianople, ſent deputies to him, aſſuring him, that they were ready to ſtand by him, and aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power, yet during the twelve days he ſtaid in that city, the deputies could never have an opportunity of ſpeaking with him. In the mean time, he received freſh letters from the emperor, requiring him to make what haſte he could, and public carriages were provided for his equipage; but the officers ſent to him by Conſtantius adviſing him to leave his court at Adrianople, he ſet out with a ſmall retinue for Milan, where the emperor then was; but upon his arrival at Petavium in Noricum, he was there met by Barbatio, who, entering the ſame evening the houſe where he lodged with a company of ſoldiers, ſtript him of all the enſigns of his dignity, and diſpatched one Apodemus with his purple ſhoes to the emperor, aſſuring him, in the mean time, by repeated oaths, that nothing elſe was intended by the emperor againſt him; but nevertheleſs, putting him into a cloſe litter, he hurried him away to Flanona, now

Gallus ſets out from Antioch.

Is carefully watched by the officers of Conſtantius.

Is arreſted at Petavium, and ſtript of the enſigns of his dignity

[w] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 27. Philoſtorg. p. 62.

now Fianone, in Dalmatia, not far from Pola, where Criſpus Cæſar, the ſon of Conſtantine, had been put to death twenty-eight years before. Thither the emperor ſent his two moſt inveterate enemies, Euſebius the eunuch and Pentades his ſecretary, to examine him about the death of the prefect Domitian, and others, to hear what plea he could make[x]. Julian[y] and Libanus[z] write, that he was condemned without ſo much as being heard; and truly a prince, who hears only with the ears of his favourites, may be ſaid not to hear at all. Gallus owned moſt of the crimes that were laid to his charge; but alledged, that they proceeded chiefly from the inſtigation and evil counſels of his wife Conſtantina. The emperor, provoked at this plea, which reflected in ſo high a meaſure on his ſiſter, and conſequently on himſelf, and egged on by the enemies of Gallus, perſuading him, that his ſafety depended upon the deſtruction of ſo dangerous a rival, reſolved to put an end to his own fears, and the other's life, and accordingly ſigned a warrant for his execution[a]. Some authors write, that the emperor, ſoon after, changing his mind, countermanded the execution; but that Euſebius, and the other enemies of Gallus, pretended that it came too late[b]. Be that as it will, it is certain that Gallus was beheaded, and atoned with his own blood for the blood of many innocent perſons, which he had ſhed. Thus fell Gallus Cæſar, in the twenty-ninth year of his age, after having reigned near four years. His death was chiefly owing to his own tyrannical conduct, but in great meaſure to the malice of Euſebius, Scudilo, and Barbatio, his avowed enemies, who charged him with more crimes than he had really committed[c]. All thoſe who had been any-ways concerned with him in the death of the prefect Domitian, the quæſtor Montius, and his other crimes, felt the weight of the emperor's diſpleaſure. Multitudes of people of all ranks were brought out of the eaſt in chains to Aquileia, where they were tryed by Euſebius and one Arbora, men deſtitute of all mercy and compaſſion, and on that very account charged by Conſtantius with that commiſſion. Theſe mercileſs judges, without making any diſtinction between the guilty and innocent, ſentenced ſome to the rack, and after that to baniſhment, others to ſervile offices in the army, and great numbers to death, ſparing none but ſuch as could redeem deem themſelves with large ſums. Luſcus, the firſt magiſtrate of Antioch, was burnt alive. But Gorgonius, Gallus's great chamberlain, the moſt guilty of all, eſcaped by bribing his judges, and the eunuchs of the court. Julian, the brother of Gallus, though no-ways concerned in his crimes, was kept ſeven months under cloſe confinement, and would have been put to death, had he not been ſaved by the favour of the empreſs Euſebia [d]. By the death of Gallus, the Roman empire became united under one prince, after it had continued divided for the ſpace of near ſeventy years, that is, from the year 285, or 286, when Diocleſian took Maximian for his colleague; for ever ſince that time there had been either ſeveral emperors, or one Cæſar. Ammianus obſerves, that Conſtantius, ſwelled with pride upon ſeeing himſelf ſole maſter of the empire, aſſumed the title of eternal, ſtyled himſelf lord of the univerſe, and gave ear to the flatteries of his ambitious and inſinuating courtiers [e]. As for Urſicinus, general of the horſe in the eaſt, of whom we have ſpoken above, he was accuſed of having put Gallus upon all the wrong meaſures he had taken, in order to render him obnoxious to the people, and make the empire fall to his own children. But Ammianus, his faithful friend and inſeparable companion, aſſures us, that his only crime was the umbrage which the eunuchs, and other courtiers, took at his great power and extraordinary abilities. However, after the death of Gallus, it was reſolved in a council, which was held privately in the emperor's apartment, that the following night he ſhould be conveyed out of the city, and executed without any farther trial. But the emperor changing his mind, Urſicinus eſcaped, and Conſtantius was ſoon after obliged to have recourſe to the valour and addreſs of ſo brave and experienced a commander, as we ſhall ſee anon [d].

And put to death.

[x] Ammian. l. xxi. p 178. & l. xiv. p. 27.—29. [y] Julian. ad Athen. p. 500. [z] Liban. or. xii. p. 266. [a] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 29. & 31. [b] Idem. p. 30. [c] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 31.

The next conſuls were Arbetio and Lollianus. During their adminiſtration, the emperor enacted two remarkable laws; the one addreſſed to Voluſianus, vicar of Rome, and dated the thirtieth of April, forbidding the marriage of a brother or ſiſter-in-law, and declaring the children born of ſuch a marriage illegitimate: the other dated the twenty-third of September, and addreſſed to one Severus, ordaining biſhops to be judged by biſhops, and not by the civil magiſtrates [e]. In the he beginning of this year, Conſtantius ſummoned a council of biſhops at Milan, and baniſhed Liberius, biſhop of Rome, into Thrace, becauſe he would not conſent to the ſentence paſſed by the council againſt the great Athanaſius [f]. Before the emperor left Milan, Africanus, governor of Pannonia Secunda, was brought priſoner to that city, with ſeveral others, who, after being tortured in a moſt cruel manner, were thrown into priſon, becauſe they had at an entertainment expreſſed themſelves with great freedom on matters of ſtate; whence it was concluded, that they were carrying on ſome plot, and that Africanus aſpired at the ſovereignty. A tribune, by name Marinus, who was preſent at this entertainment, choſe rather to lay violent hands on himſelf at Aquileia, than to endure the torture [g]. Ammianus, who relates this, does not tell us in this place what became of Africanus and the other priſoners; but ſeems elſewhere [h] to inſinuate, that they were all put to death. The emperor ſoon after left Milan to march againſt the Germans, who made frequent inroads into the empire towards the Brigantine lake, now the lake of Conſtance. The emperor himſelf remained in the plains of the country now belonging to the Griſons in the neighbourhood of the preſent city of Coira, and detached Arbetio with the flower of the army againſt the enemy. Arbetio fell into an ambuſcade, and loſt great numbers of his men; but this loſs was ſoon retrieved by the valour of Arintheus, who became famous under the emperor Valens, and of two other officers, who falling upon the Germans, without waiting the orders of their general, put them to flight, and obliged them to abandon the Roman territories. The emperor, ſatisfied with this, returned to Milan, and there took up his winter-quarters [i]. From Milan, he wrote a long letter to the ſenate of Conſtantinople in commendation of the philoſopher Themiſtius, whom he had created ſenator of that city. Themiſtius anſwered this letter ſoon after by a panegyric on Conſtantius, wherein he endeavours to prove, that he was the greateſt philoſopher in the whole empire [k]. The emperor's letter and the oration of Themiſtius are ſtill extant [l].

[d] Idem. l. xiv. p. 18. l. xv. p. 34. Julian. ad Athen. p. 501.
[e] Ammian. l. xv. p. 32. 33. [d] Idem, l. xiv. p. 26. 33, 34.
[e] Cod. Theodoſ. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 2. p. 296. & l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 12. p. 37.

Africanus and ſeveral others cruelly tortured upon bare ſuſpicions.

The Germans defeated.

The tranquillity which Conſtantius enjoyed at this time was ſoon interrupted by the apprehenſion of a pretended conſpiracy, which produced a true one. Sylvanus, the ſon of Bonitus, a leading man among the Franks, commanded in Gaul, and Sylvanus falſely accuſed of aſpiring at the empire.

[f] Hilar. or. in Conſt. [g] Ammian. l. xv. p. 34—36. [h] Idem. l. xvi. p. 67. [i] Idem, l. xv. p. 36, 37. [k] Themiſt. or. Conſ. p. 18. & or. ii. p. 24—40. [l] Idem ibid.

and had performed there great exploits againſt the barbarians. He owed his preferment to the artifices of rival courtiers, eſpecially of Arbetio, the conſul of this year, who, jealous of his extraordinary merit, had propoſed him to the emperor as the beſt qualified perſon in the empire for driving the barbarians out of Gaul, and reſtoring that province, diſtreſſed by their frequent inroads, to its former condition. And truly Sylvanus well deſerved the character which Arbetio gave him; but the conſul's main deſign in commending him, and extolling his military talents, was to remove him from the emperor's preſence, in order to compaſs his ruin, which he did in the following manner: One Dynames, keeper of the emperor's mules, leaving Gaul, begged of Sylvanus letters of recommendation to his friends at court; which being granted, the traitor eraſed all but the ſubſcription; and having inſerted directions to the friends of Sylvanus for the carrying on of a conſpiracy, delivered the letters to the prefect Lampridius, who being privy, as was ſuppoſed, to this wicked contrivance, ſhewed them to the emperor. Hereupon orders were immediately iſſued for the apprehending of ſuch perſons as were named in the letters. As there were at that time great numbers of Franks of diſtinction at court, they all interpoſed in favour of their country-man; among the reſt, Malaricus, their chief, well appriſed that the whole was mere calumny, offered to go into Gaul, and bring the ſuppoſed criminal before the emperor; adding, that if perſons, whom Sylvanus miſtruſted, ſhould be ſent for that purpoſe, he might be prompted by fear, to attempt what he was falſly accuſed of having already attempted. But Conſtantius, without hearkening to the juſt and reaſonable propoſal of Malaricus, was perſuaded by Arbetio to name Apodemus, a declared enemy to all men of probity, to enquire into this affair. He immediately ſet out for Gaul; but inſtead of preſenting to Sylvanus as ſoon as he arrived, purſuant to his inſtructions, the emperor's letter commanding him to repair forthwith to court, he ſeized on his eſtate, and cauſed his friends in Gaul to be apprehended and put to the torture. This comeing to the ears of Sylvanus, who was then at Cologn, and too well acquainted with the emperor's ſuſpicious temper, and the aſcendant his enemies at court had over him, to ſuffer himſelf to be arreſted, he reſolved at firſt to take ſhelter among the Franks his countrymen; but being perſuaded by his friends not to truſt a people ſo remarkable for their fickleneſs and treachery, he determined for his own preſervation,

to

to do what otherwiſe he would never have thought of; and accordingly aſſumed the purple, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command [l]. Some of his coins have reached us, on which he bears the title of Auguſtus, and the prænomen of Flavius, common, ſince Conſtantine's time, to ſuch as had none of their own, eſpecially foreigners [m]. While theſe things paſſed in Gaul, Dynames, to ſtrengthen his accuſation againſt Sylvanus, forged a letter in the name of that general, and of Malaricus, to a tribune, deſiring him to get every thing ready, without explaining himſelf further. The tribune, being at a loſs about the meaning of it, ſent it to Malaricus, who, knowing it to be forged, complained aloud of the treachery, and, with the other Franks, demanded vengeance on thoſe who were by ſuch malicious contrivances endeavouring to prejudice the emperor againſt thoſe of their nation. This occaſioned an enquiry, and unravelled the whole ſcene of iniquity. The emperor, well appriſed of the innocence of Sylvanus and the malice of his accuſers, depoſed the prefect Lampridius, and even ordered him, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, to be put to the torture, on which ſome of them owned the whole to be a mere calumny. They were, however, in the end all abſolved, ſo great was the power of their faction at court; and Dynames was even preferred to the government of Hetruria. As Sylvanus was declared innocent, they were all greatly ſurpriſed by the arrival of a meſſenger from Gaul, diſpatched to acquaint the emperor, that Sylvanus had actually aſſumed the title of emperor. The meſſenger arrived at Milan about the cloſe of the evening, and the emperor, thunder-ſtruck at the unexpected tidings, ſummoned a council the ſame night, the reſult of which was, that Urſicinus, of whom we have ſpoken above, ſhould be ſent forthwith into Gaul, the courtiers, who dreaded Urſicinus no leſs than Sylvanus, hoping by that means to get rid of one whom they hated, and perhaps of both. Urſicinus made what haſte he could to reach Cologn, that Sylvanus, ſuppoſing his revolt not to be yet known at court, might the more readily comply with the emperor's injunctions. For Urſicinus was charged with letters from the emperor to Sylvanus, confirming him in his poſt of general, enjoining him to repair to court, and in the mean time deliver up the command of the army to Urſicinus. But Urſicinus, notwithſtanding the haſte he made,

Is forced to aſſume it in his own defence.

He is declared innocent.

Urſicinus ſent againſt him.

[l] Ammian. p. 39, 76. Julian. ad Athen. p. 503. & or. ii. p. 183. [m] Goltz. p. 131.

came too late, the news of Sylvanus's revolt being known at court having got to Cologn before him; which obliged him to change his meaſures, and pretend, that he had deſerted Conſtantius, and was come to ſhare with Sylvanus his ſucceſſes or misfortunes, waiting in the mean time a favourable opportunity of diſpatching him. This was a dangerous expedient, and altogether unworthy of that greatneſs of ſoul which Ammianus ſo much admires in his hero. Sylvanus received him with extraordinary demonſtrations of kindneſs, freely opened all his thoughts to him, adviſed with him about the meaſures that were to be taken for their mutual ſecurity, and repoſed in him an entire confidence; which gave Urſicinus an opportunity of gaining over ſome of his guards with large promiſes, who early one morning forced unexpectedly the gates of the palace, and entering ſword in hand, met Sylvanus, while he was attempting to make his eſcape, and take ſanctuary in a neighbouring church, and cut him in pieces, after he had enjoyed the title of emperor only twenty-eight days [n]. Thus fell one of the braveſt and moſt deſerving officers of the empire, whom the crafty malice of jealous courtiers, and the credulity of the emperor, had obliged in his own defence to aſſume the purple. He had ſerved under Magnentius; but deſerting him with a numerous body of cavalry under his command before the battle of Murſa, had ever after diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars of Conſtantius, who, in regard of his eminent ſervices, had raiſed him to the poſt of magiſter peditum, or general of the foot. But no merit or ſervices, however great, are a ſufficient antidote againſt the poiſonous tongues of artful and inſinuating courtiers, when they have once gained the confidence, and engroſſed the favour, of a jealous, weak, and timorous prince. Conſtantius expreſſed an extraordinary joy at the news of Sylvanus's death; but though he owned, that he had nothing more to fear, yet he proceeded with great rigour againſt ſuch as had been any-ways concerned in his revolt. Pemenes, who had defended Treves againſt Decentius, and many other perſons of diſtinction, were condemned and executed. The courtiers were for putting all the friends of Sylvanus to death, without diſtinction; but were therein oppoſed by the emperor, alledging that friendſhip ought not to be puniſhed as a crime; nay, he ordered the effects and eſtate of the unhappy Sylvanus to be reſerved for his ſon, who was then very young, and had been left by his father as an hoſtage at court, perceiving, Sylvanus ſlain by the treachery of Urſicinus.

[n] Ammian. l. xv. p 38—42. Zonar. p. 17.

ceiving, when it was too late, that the malice of his enemies, and not his ambition, had prompted, and in a manner forced, him to revolt [o].

The empire in great danger.

THE barbarians, whom the brave Sylvanus had driven out of Gaul, that is, the Franks, Alemans, and Saxons, no ſooner heard the news of his death, than they broke into that province with greater fury than ever, and took and pillaged above forty cities, and among the reſt Cologn, which they levelled with the ground [p]. At the ſame time, the Quadi and Sarmatians, entering Pannonia, laid all waſte before them [q]; and the Perſians over-ran without oppoſition Meſopotamia and Armenia, Proſper, who had ſucceeded Urſicinus, and the prefect Mauſonianus, being more intent upon pillaging than defending the countries committed to their care [r]. Conſtantius, appriſed of the danger that threatened the empire, but not thinking it adviſeable to ſtir out of Italy himſelf, after various conſultations, reſolved in the end to raiſe his couſin Julian, the brother of Gallus, to the dignity of Cæſar. This deſign was oppoſed by all the ſycophants at court, who, extolling the emperor's prudence, conduct, and courage, told him, that he was capable of ſuſtaining the burden of the empire alone, inſinuating at the ſame time, that it was no-ways ſafe for him to raiſe Julian to that high ſtation. But the empreſs Euſebia, interpoſing in favour of Julian, prevailed upon her huſband to purſue his intentions. The emperor therefore, being returned to Milan before the thirty-firſt of October from a ſhort progreſs, ordered Julian to quit his philoſophical cloak, and gave him an apartment in the palace; and on the ſixth of November having aſſembled the army, he aſcended the tribunal, and placing Julian on his right hand, he acquainted the ſoldiers with his deſign of dignifying his couſin with the title and authority of Cæſar, and aſked their conſent. The army with one voice approved of his reſolution; whereupon the emperor cloathed him with a purple robe, ſaluted him with the title of Cæſar, and of moſt loving brother; appointed him governor of Gaul, and, in committing that province to his care, told him, that he placed him over a ſtout army, not doubting but upon occaſion he would ſignalize at their head his own courage, and be witneſs of theirs. This ceremony and ſpeech were followed by loud acclamations, and great encomiums beſtowed Julian created Cæſar.

by

[o] Ammian. p. 44. & Julian. or. i. & ii. p. 89, 183, 184.
[p] Ammian. l. xv. p. 47. [q] Zoſ. p. 702. [r] Ammian ibid. p. 57.

by the whole army on the emperor and the new Cæſar. A few days after Conſtantius gave him his ſiſter Helena in marriage; and this new favour and mark of diſtinction was likewiſe owing to Euſebia, who, beſides many other things of great value, preſented the young prince on this occaſion with a large and well-choſen library [s]. But at the ſame time his whole houſe was changed, the emperor pretending thereby to do him honour; but his real deſign was to remove all in whom he had any confidence: guards were placed at his apartment, not ſo much to defend as to watch him; all his letters were opened before they came to his hands, inſomuch, that he thought it adviſeable to deſire his beſt friends to forbear viſiting him, leſt they ſhould expoſe themſelves or him to danger [t]. Before he ſet out for Gaul, the emperor gave him inſtructions under his own hand, regulating his whole conduct, even the expences of his table, as if he had been a child, ſays Ammianus [u], ſent to ſchool. At the ſame time, he greatly reſtrained and curtailed his authority, enjoining the generals who ſerved under him, to watch his actions with no leſs care than thoſe of the enemy, and inveſting one Marcellus with the command of the army, who was ſent to ſucceed Urſicinus, though the latter was ordered to continue in Gaul till the war was ended, with the title of general, but without any command, the emperor being ſtill in ſome degree prejudiced againſt him [w]. Julian was, above all, ſtrictly enjoined not to give any largeſſes to the army; and authors obſerve that Conſtantius himſelf, contrary to cuſtom, gave none upon his promotion [x]. Several writers tell us, that the emperor ſent Julian into Gaul on purpoſe to deſtroy him [y]. But what others write ſeems to us more probable, viz. that he treated him thus on account of his youth, and want of experience, and to deprive him of all means of revolting, and ſetting up for himſelf. Julian ſet out from Milan on the firſt of December, the emperor himſelf accompanying him as far as Pavia, from whence he purſued his journey to the Alps, attended only by three hundred and ſixty ſoldiers. On his arrival at Turin, he was firſt acquainted with the loſs of Cologn, which had been kept concealed from the emperor. He arrived at Vienne before the end of the year, and was received

He marries Helena, the emperor's ſiſter.

His power gives the emperor jealouſy.

He is ſent into Gaul.

[s] Ammian. p. 47—49. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 709. Julian, ad Athen. p. 274. Socr. l. ii. c. 34. [t] Julian. ad. Athen. p. 509. [u] Ammian. l. xx. p. 168. [w] Idem, l. xvi. p 60. [x] Idem, l. xxii. p. 206. [y] Eunap. c. 5. p. 76. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. Sozom. l. v. c. 2. p. 596.

ceived by the people of that city and the neighbourhood, with extraordinary marks of joy [z]. While he was entering the city, an old woman, who had been long blind, cried out, if Ammianus is to be credited, that he would one day reſtore the temples of the gods [a].

THE following year, 356, Conſtantius took upon him his eighth conſulſhip, and choſe Julian for his collegue. The latter paſſed the winter at Vienne, deliberating about the operations of the enſuing campaign. During his ſtay there, he received intelligence, that the city of Autun was beſieged by the barbarians, but defended with great bravery by the veterans, who had repulſed the enemy when they were already ſcaling the walls, which had encouraged the other troops to make a vigorous ſally. However Julian, having aſſembled what forces he could, marched to the relief of the place; but finding the ſiege raiſed, from Autun he went in purſuit of the barbarians to Auxerre, croſſing with no ſmall danger thick woods, and from Auxerre to Troies. On his march he found himſelf ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemy, who moved about the country in great bodies; but he put them to flight with a handful of men, killed great numbers of them, and took ſome priſoners. From Troies he haſtened to Rheims, where the main body of the army, commanded by Marcellus, waited his arrival. Leaving Rheims, he took his rout towards Decempagi, now Dieuze, on the Seille in Lorrain, with a deſign to fall upon the Germans, who were buſied in ravaging that country. But the enemy, taking advantage of a dark and wet night, attacked his rear unexpectedly, and would have cut off two legions, had not the reſt of the army, alarmed at the ſudden noiſe, turned back to their aſſiſtance. The Germans themſelves were defeated a few days after, though not with great loſs, in the neighbourhood of Brocromagus, now Brumt, in Alſace, between Straſbourg and Haguenau [b]. This ſmall victory opened him a way to Cologn, which he found abandoned by the enemy, and entered, after it had been ten months in their hands. The barbarians had neglected to fortify it; but Julian ordered the antient fortifications to be with all ſpeed repaired, and the houſes rebuilt [c]. Libanius adds, that he re-eſtabliſhed another great city in that country, perhaps Tongres or Treves, which had been often attacked by the barbarians, and was reduced Autun beſieged by the barbarians; who raiſe the ſiege.

Cologn retaken by Julian, and rebuilt.

[z] Ammian. l. xv. p. 50. Liban. or. xii. p. 270. [a] Ammian. l. xv. p. 50. [b] Idem. p. 59. Liban. or. ix. p. 237. & or. xii. p. 271. [c] Ammian. p. 40. Julian. p. 512.

duced to a miſerable condition. During his ſtay at Cologn, one of the kings of the Franks, dreading his arms, ſent deputies to him to ſue for a peace; but Julian granted him only a ſhort truce. Having repaired the city and fortifications of Cologn, he removed to Baſle to ſupport the emperor, who was making war upon the Germans in Rhætia, and to prevent their eſcaping from him into Gaul. He continued there till winter, when he retired to the city of Sens, and there took up his quarters [d]. This campaign proved, according to the account which Ammianus gives us of it, very glorious for Julian. But the many advantages which he is ſaid to have gained, muſt either have been leſs conſiderable than they are repreſented by that writer, or counter-balanced by equal loſſes, ſince Julian himſelf writes, that his firſt campaign proved unſucceſsful, and that during this ſummer he performed nothing worthy of notice *. Beſides, we ſhall ſee him next winter beſieged in Sens by the barbarians, and obliged to fly before them, which he himſelf owns [e]; but Ammianus has paſſed it over in ſilence. Libanius ſays, that the greateſt victory he gained this year was over himſelf, in reſtraining his courage, and bearing with patience the evil offices of thoſe about him, who, inſtead of ſeconding his great deſigns, made it their whole buſineſs to thwart them, in compliance with their private inſtructions, and to humour the jealous temper of Conſtantius [f]. The ſame writer adds, ſpeaking, we ſuppoſe, like an orator, that Julian was allowed not to act, but only to ſhew himſelf [g]. As for Conſtantius, it appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, that he did not ſtir from Milan till after the eleventh of April [h], and then took a progreſs into Illyricum [i]. He was returned to Milan on the twenty-ninth of October, as appears from a law bearing that date, which confirms to the clergy of the city of Rome all their privileges [k]. He left Milan ſoon after to make war upon the Germans, who had for their kings the two brothers Gondomadus and Vadomarus. He paſſed the Rhine, entered their dominions on the ſide of Rhætia, and meeting with no oppoſition, laid waſte their country far and wide. This obliged them to ſue for peace, which the emperor readily granted, and then returned to Milan, the uſual place

Authors diſagree about his firſt campaign.

Conſtantius obliges the Germans to ſue for peace.

[d] Ammian. p. 61, 72. * Julian. ad Athen. p. 510. [e] Idem ibid. [f] Liban. or. ix. p. 237. [g] Idem, or. xii. p. 271. [h] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 55. [i] Athanaſ. ſolit. p. 841. [k] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 13. p. 39.

place of his reſidence [l]. While the emperor was abroad on this expedition, the empreſs Euſebia viſited the city of Rome, and was received there by the ſenate, who went out to meet her, with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. During her ſtay in that metropolis, ſhe gave great largeſſes to the people, and upon her departure made rich preſents to the heads of the tribes [m]. The ſame year, Conſtantius, exerting his zeal for the doctrine of Arius, drove Athanaſius from his ſee at Alexandria; and put Georgius, an Arian in his room. He likewiſe baniſhed the orthodox biſhops, Hilarius of Poitiers, and Rhodanes of Toulouſe. But as for Athanaſius, he perſecuted him even beyond the limits of the empire, writing letters againſt him to the princes of Auximus in Ethiopia, where he imagined the perſecuted biſhop had taken ſhelter. The ſame year, the emperor enacted two remarkable laws, the one, dated the twentieth of February, condemning thoſe to death who ſhould for the future ſacrifice, or pay any manner of worſhip, to idols [n]; the other, dated the eighth of March, declaring the effects of condemned perſons, except in caſes of magic or treaſon, to belong to their children and relations within the third degree [o]. But this law the emperor himſelf revoked in two years after [p].

Forbids, upon pain of death the worſhipping of idols.

THE next conſuls were, Conſtantius the ninth time, and Julian the ſecond. The latter had taken up his winter-quarters at Sens, as we have related above, and had kept with him but a ſmall number of troops, the reſt being diſperſed about the country for the convenience of their quarters in a province ſo often ravaged and laid waſte. The barbarians, appriſed of this, came in great numbers, and laid ſiege to the place, hoping to take Julian himſelf priſoner. But he, with the few forces he had, made ſo vigorous a defence, that the enemy, deſpairing of ever being able to reduce the town, drew off their forces, and retired, after they had lain a whole month before it. All this while Marcellus, the commander in chief, never ſtirred to reſcue Julian, or relieve the place, though he was quartered in the neighbourhood [q]. Ammianus tells us, that for this neglect he was by the emperor deprived of his command, and confined to Sardica, the place of his nativity [r]. But Julian ſays only, that Conſtantius began to Julian beſieged in Sens.

[l] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 77, &c. Julian. or. iii. p. 240. [m] Julian. or. iii. p. 240, 241. [n] Cod. Theod. l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 6. p 266. [o] Ibid l. ix. tit. 42. leg. 2. p. 329. [p] Ibid. leg. 4. p. 331. [q] Julian. p. 510. Ammian. p. 61. [r] Ammian. ibid. p. 64, 66.

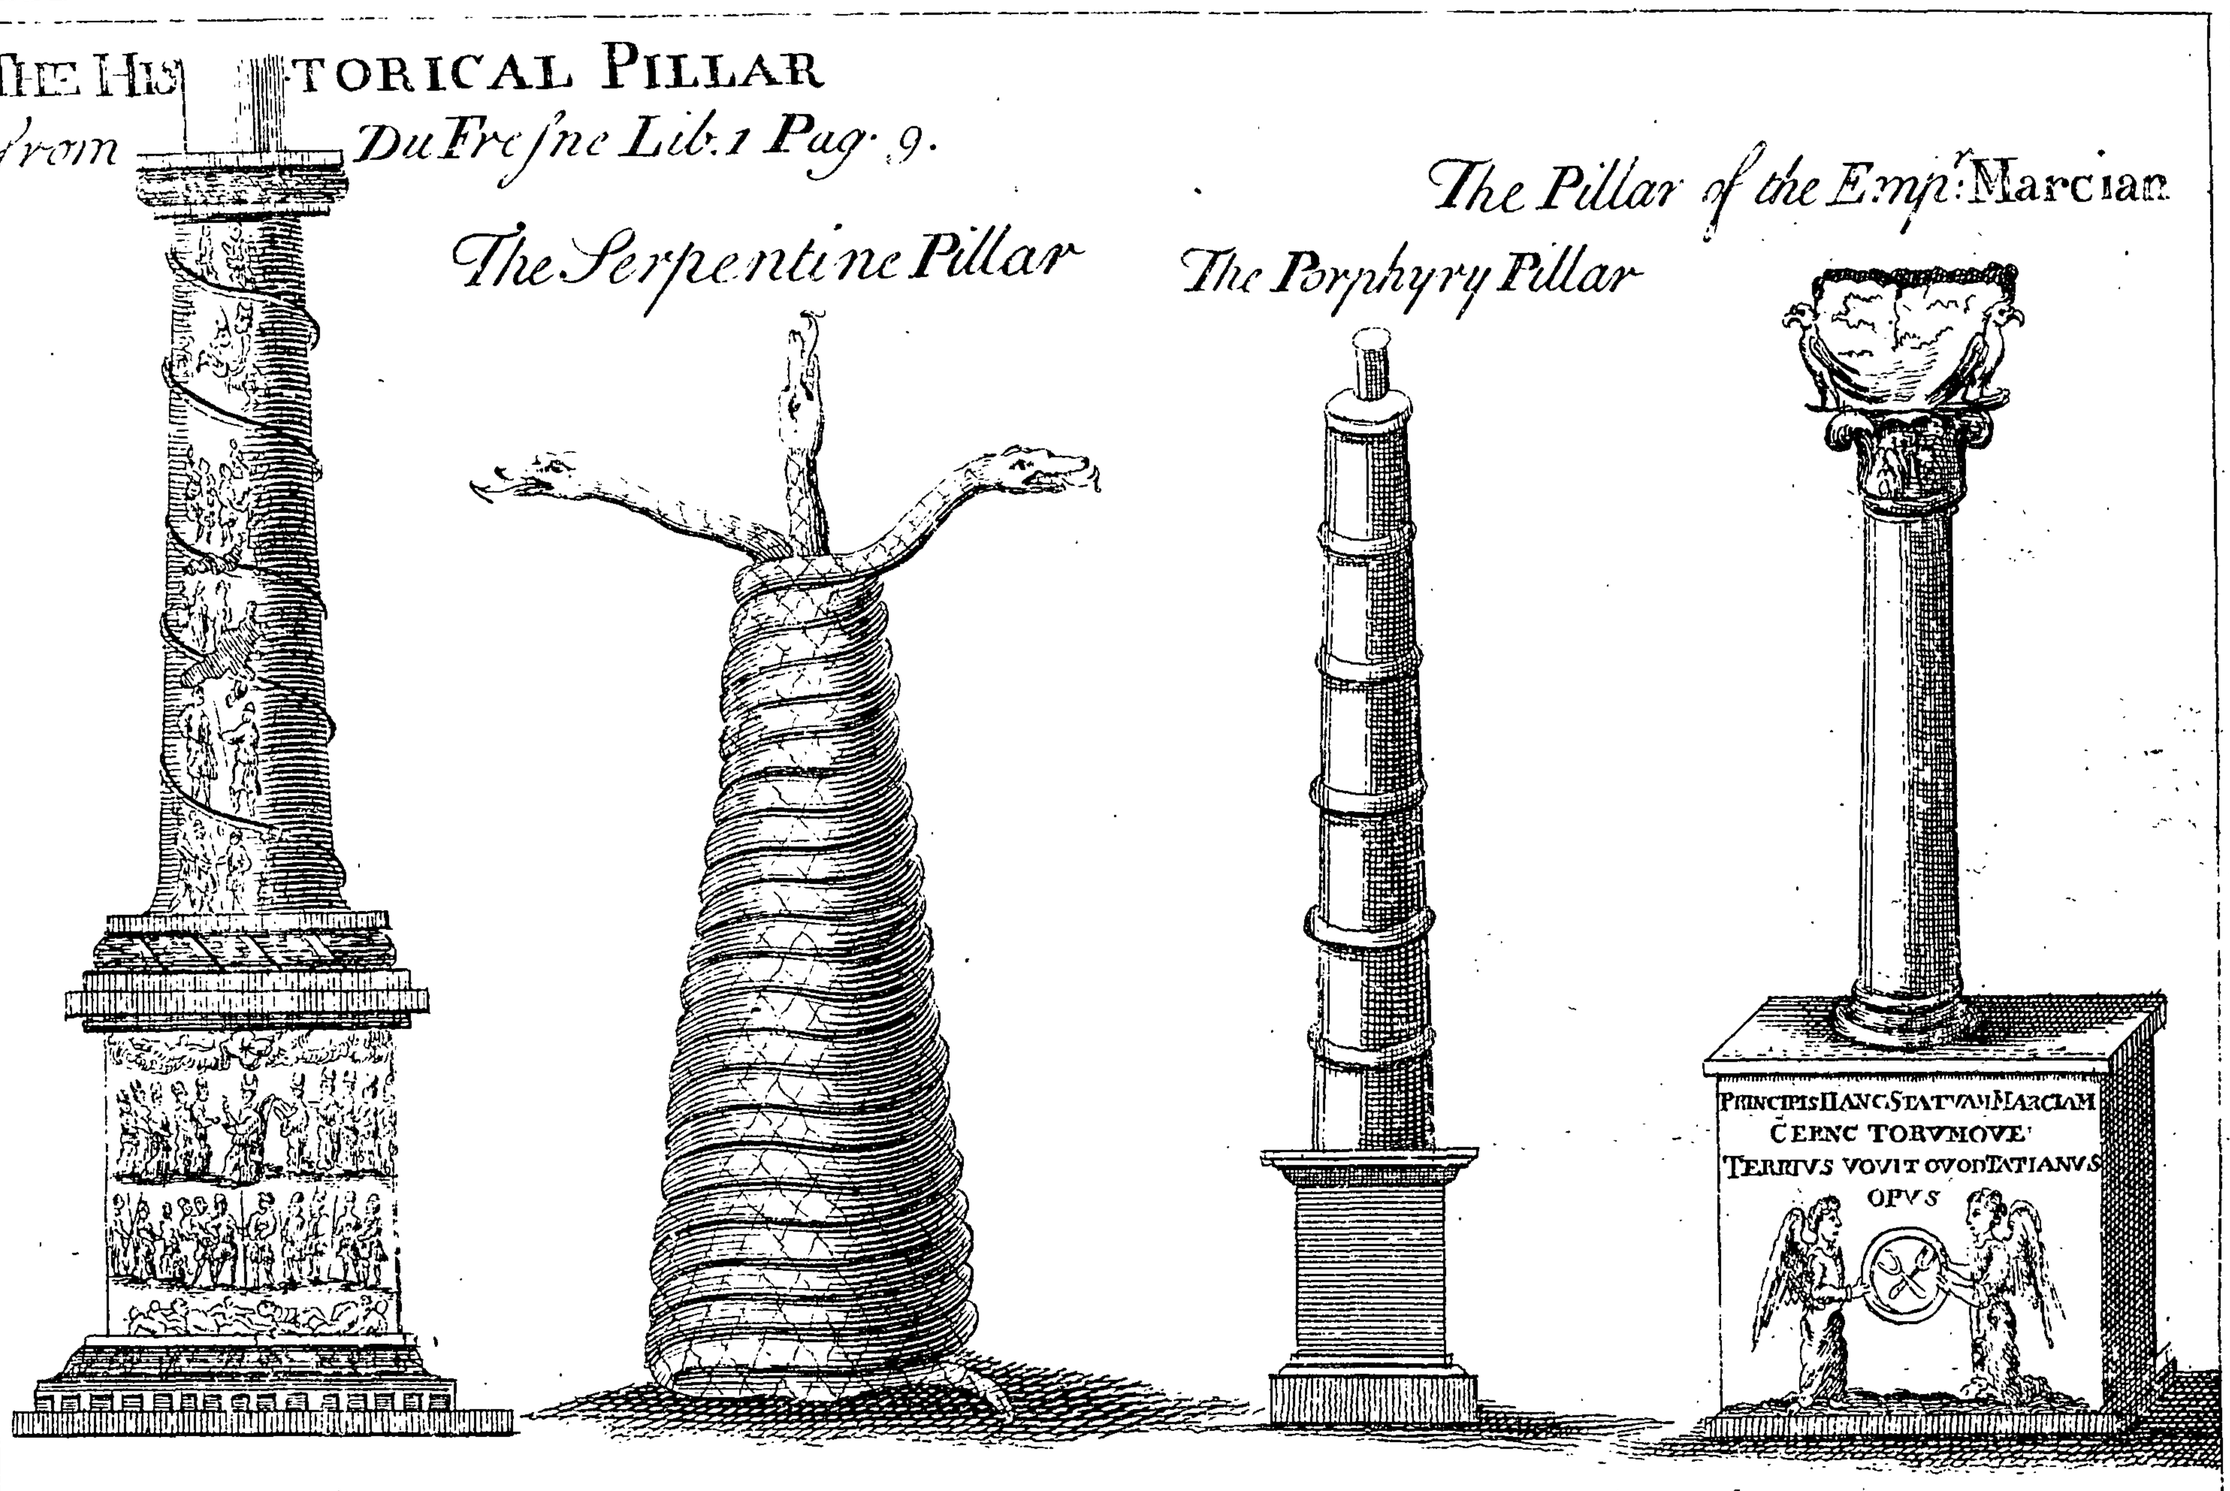
to ſuſpect him, and look upon him as unequal to the command with which he was inveſted [s]. Libanius writes, that he dreaded the barbarians, oppreſſed the ſubjects of the empire, treated Julian himſelf with great haughtineſs, thwarted all his deſigns, and upon his removal repaired to Milan to diſcredit him with the emperor. But Julian, well acquainted with the malice of the one, and the jealouſy and credulity of the other, ſent the eunuch Eutherius, his great chamberlain, to anſwer ſuch things as might be alledged againſt him; which he did ſo effectually, that the emperor remained fully ſatisfied with the conduct of Julian [t]. Ammian beſtows great encomiums upon this eunuch. Not long after Conſtantius declared Julian commander in chief of all the forces in Gaul, being perſuaded to it either by the empreſs, or the eunuch Eutherius, or probably by both [u]. At the ſame time he appointed Severus, an officer of great experience, and of a quite different temper from Marcellus, to command under him. Upon his arrival in Gaul, Julian, who received him with great joy, raiſed new troops, and ſupplied them with arms, which he luckily found in an old arſenal [w]. This year Conſtantius ſentenced to death a great many perſons convicted of having conſulted the magicians, and publiſhed a law forbidding, on pain of death, any one to have recourſe to the augurs, aruſpices, or any other diviners whatſoever [x]. By another law, dated the fourth of December, he condemned all magicians to be devoured by the wild beaſts [y]. This year, the emperor took a progreſs to Rome, which he had never yet ſeen, with the empreſs Euſebia, and his ſiſter Helena, the wife of Julian. He entered the metropolis of the empire on the twenty-eighth of April, in a gilt chariot, adorned with an incredible number of precious ſtones, being attended by the ſenate, and the whole noblity, who came out in their robes and richeſt apparel to meet him. The reader will find a very particular account of his triumphal entry in Ammianus, who deſcribes it at length [z]. He was wonderfully taken with the grandeur and magnificence of the place, with the multitude of the people, with the loftineſs of the buildings; but chiefly admired the temple of Jupiter Tarpeius, the public baths, the amphitheatre, Pompey's theatre, and the ſquare of Trajan. He is ſaid to have complained of fame, far exceeding truth

He is created commander in chief of all the forces in Gaul.

Conſtantius takes a progreſs to Rome.

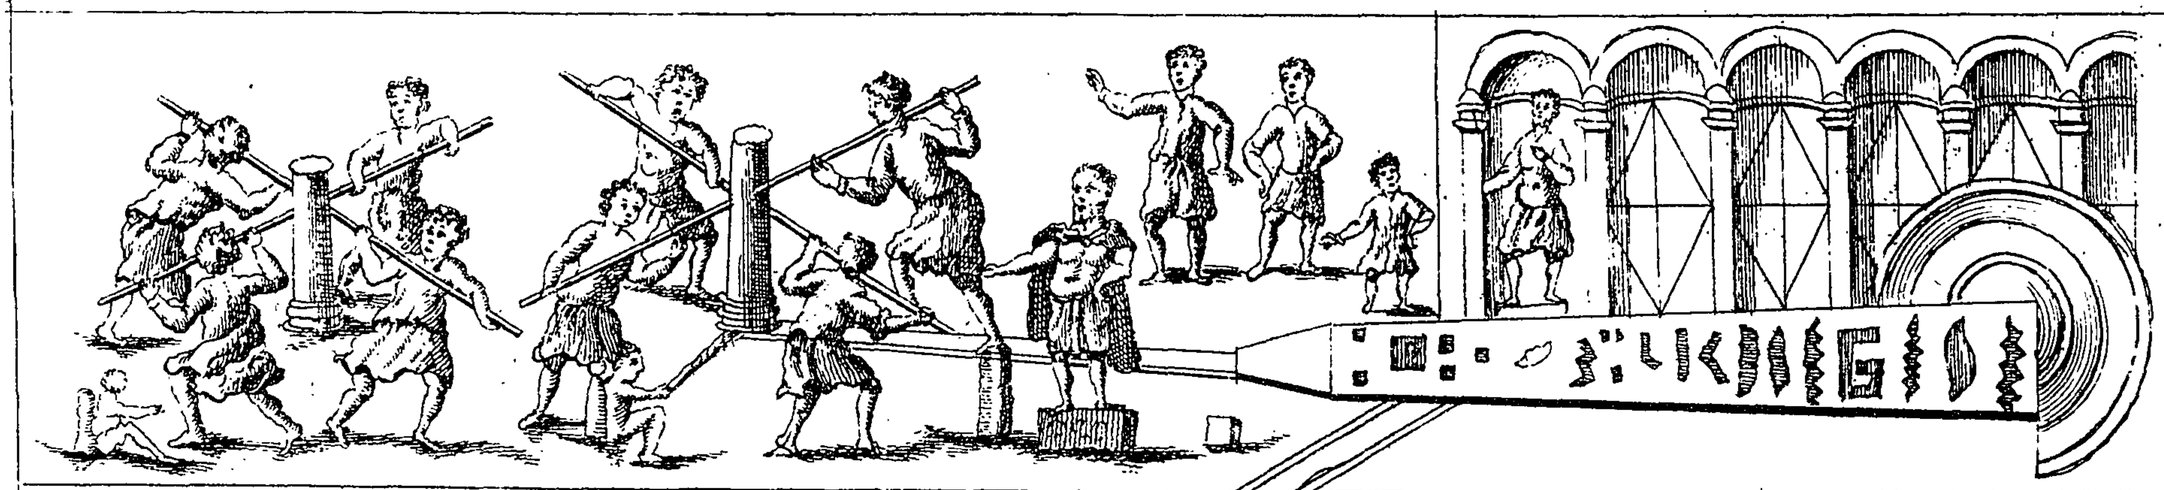
Is taken with the grandeur and magnificence of the city.

[s] Julian. p. 511. [t] Ammian. p. 64, 65. [u] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 703. Ammian. l. xvi. p. 72. [w] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 704. [x] Cod. Theodoſ. ix. tit. 16. l. iv. p. 119. [y] Ibid. leg. p. 121, 122. [z] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 71, &c.

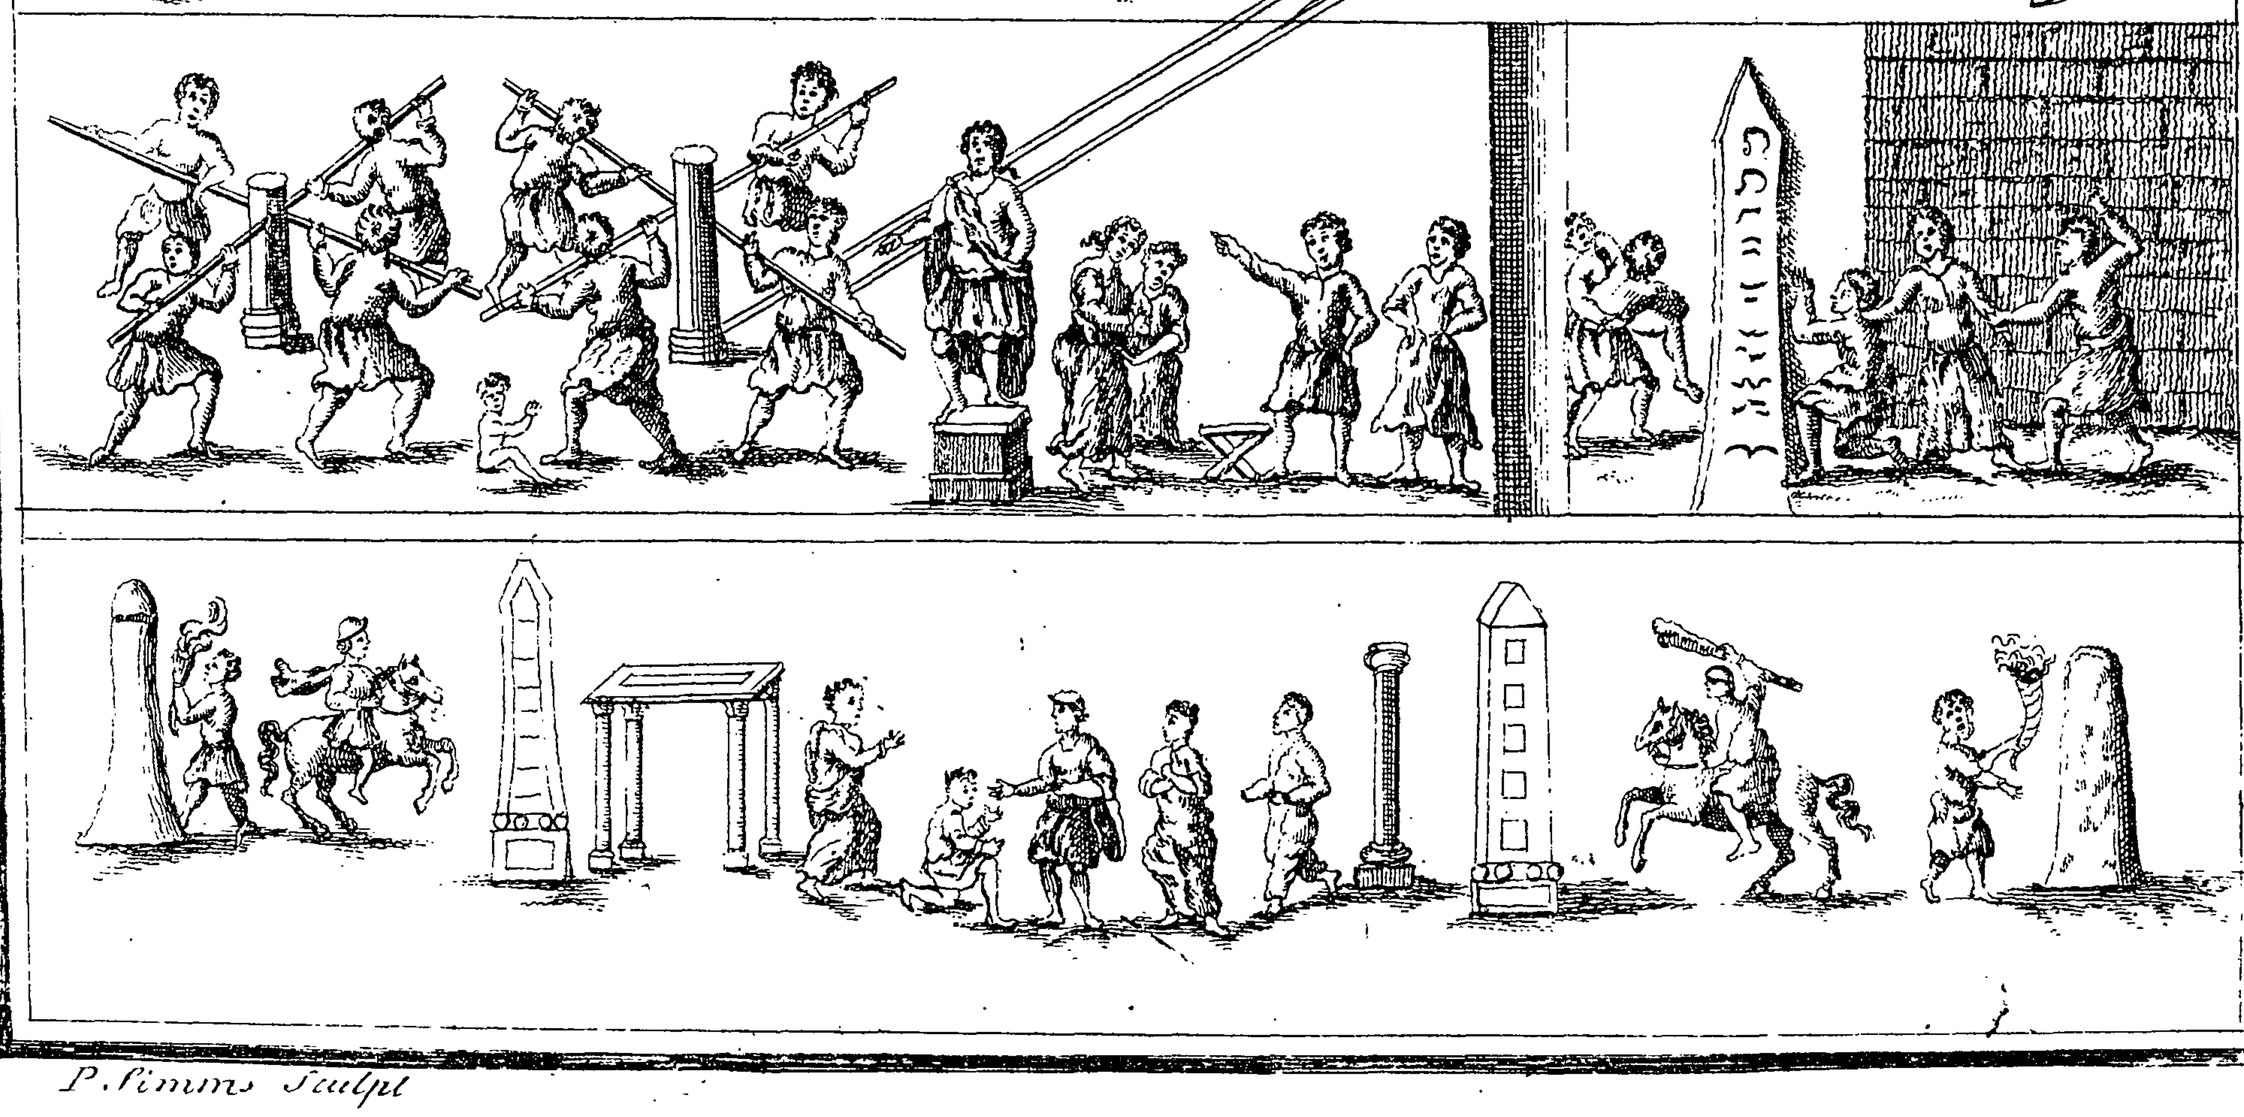


THE HISTORICAL PILLAR

from Du Fresne Lib. 1 Pag. 9.



The Serpentine Pillar



The Porphyry Pillar

The Pillar of the Emp.r Marcian

The Hippodrom with the Thebean Obelisk and Engines by which it was erected

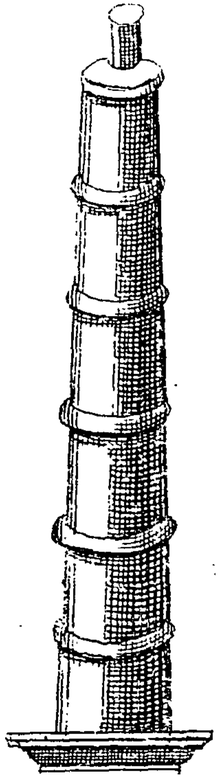
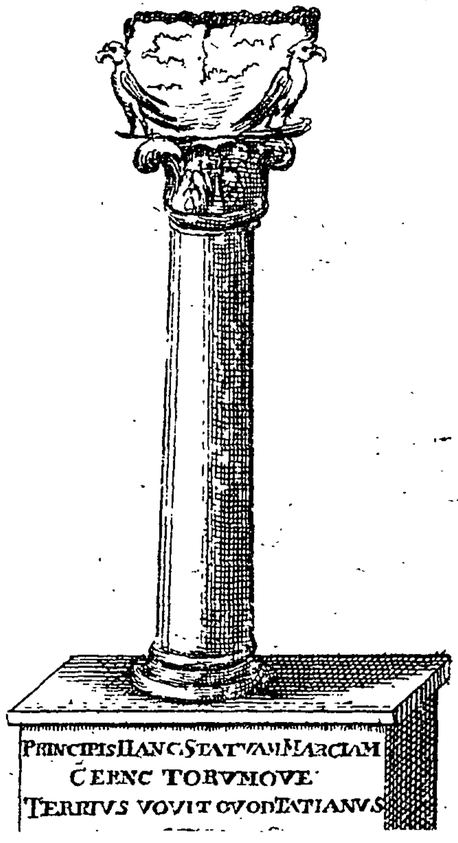
P. Simms Sculpt

THE HISTORICAL PILLAR



from Du Fresne Lib. 1 Pag. 9.



The Serpentine Pillar

The Porphyry Pillar

The Pillar of the Emp.r Marcian

truth in other things, but coming ſhort of it in what related to Rome. He harangued both the people and the ſenate, the former from the roſtra, and the latter in the ſenate-houſe. He is thought to have celebrated in that great metropolis the thirty-fifth year of his reign, reckoning from 323, when he was created Cæſar; and it was perhaps on occaſion of that ſolemnity that he ordered public ſports to be exhibited, not only in Rome, but in all the other cities of Italy [a]. During his ſtay at Rome, he was preſented with golden crowns of an extraordinary weight by ſeveral cities, and among the reſt by the city of Conſtantinople, which had appointed Themiſtius to preſent it; but he falling ſick, the diſcourſe, which he had compoſed for the occaſion, was ſent to the emperor, who was ſo well pleaſed with it, that he ordered a ſtatue to be erected in honour of the orator; which prompted him to write a ſecond diſcourſe or panegyric [b]. The emperor, deſiring to add ſomething of his own to the ornaments of the city, gave orders for the conveying of an obeliſk thither, which had been removed by his father Conſtantine from Heliopolis in Egypt with that deſign, and had been carried as far as Alexandria. But, that prince dying in the mean time, it ſtill remained there. Conſtantius therefore ordered it to be brought to Rome, where it was with much difficulty ſet up in the Circus Maximus about the beginning of the following year [c]. This is the obeliſk which was erected in Rome in the pontificate of Sextus V [d]. Conſtantius would not enter the place, where the ſenate aſſembled, till the antient altar of Victory was removed from thence, leſt he ſhould defile his eyes, ſays St. Ambroſe [e], with the unhallowed ſight of an altar conſecrated to the infernal ſpirits. He was greatly taken with the pleaſures and diverſions of Rome, ſays Ammianus [f]; but was ſoon obliged to abandon them, upon intelligence that the Suevians had entered Rhætia, the Quadians Valeria, and the Sarmatians Lower Pannonia and Upper Mœſia. He therefore left Rome on the twenty-ninth of May, after he had been there about a month, and was at Milan, if no miſtake has crept into the code, on the third of June, and likewiſe on the thirteenth of July [g]; whence we may conclude, that the barbarians withdrew of their own accord. While Conſtantius was at Milan, he received letters from

He returns to Milan.

[a] Ammian. ibid. [b] Themiſt. or. iv. p. 53—57. [c] Ammian. l. xvii. p. 92. [d] Baron. ann. 357. [e] Ambroſ. rel. ſym. p. 196. [f] Ammian. p. 72. [g] Cod. Theodoſ. chr. p. 56, 57.

from Muſonianus, prefect of the eaſt, informing him, that Sapor, king of Perſia, was engaged on the moſt remote frontiers of his kingdom in a mighty war with the Chionitæ and other people; that he had ſuffered great loſſes, and conſequently would, in all likelihood, hearken to a treaty of peace and amity with the Romans, which Muſonianus had taken care to propoſe to Tamſapor, the Perſian general on the frontiers of Meſopotamia, who had written on that ſubject to his maſter. Theſe negotiations came to nothing, as will appear anon. However, the emperor ſent for Urſicinus, who was ſtill in Gaul, in order to adviſe with him about the moſt proper method of dealing with the Perſians. In the mean time, Conſtantius, leaving Milan about the middle of July, went to Trent, and from thence into Illyricum, viſited the frontiers of the empire towards the Danube, and conferred with the chiefs of the Quadians and other neighbouring nations, who aſſured him of their friendſhip. Urſicinus found him at Sirmium, and was, after ſeveral conferences, ſent by him into the eaſt, with the character of general, and the ſame power with which he had been inveſted before his diſgrace [h]. The emperor was at Milan on the fourth and ſixth of December; but returned to Sirmium before the eighteenth of December [i], and, according to Ammianus [k], paſſed the winter there.

Urſicinus recalled from Gaul, and ſent into the eaſt.

To return to Gaul: The emperor, reſolved by all means to put an end to the dreadful devaſtations committed there chiefly by the Alemans, wrote to Julian, to march with all his forces againſt them, and at the ſame time ſent Barbatio, who had been created general of the foot in the room of Sylvanus, out of Italy, with a body of twenty-five or thirty thouſand men, in order to ſurpriſe and encloſe the enemy between the two armies. Barbatio was generally eſteemed a good officer [l]; but all his bravery conſiſted, according to Ammianus [m], only in words. He had betrayed Gallus, under whom he ſerved, and ſtudied how to check the progreſs of Julian; who no ſooner heard of his arrival at Baſle, than he took the field, having with him only thirteen thouſand men: but the Leti, a German nation, paſſing between the two armies, advanced as far as Lions, with a deſign to ſurpriſe and pillage that wealthy city. As they met with a warmer reception from the inhabitants than they expected, they gave Barbatio ſent into Gaul.

The Germans attack Lions in vain, and are cut in pieces by Julian.

[h] Ammian. ibid. p. 72. Julian. ad Athen. p. 513. [i] Cod. Theod. p. 57. [k] Ammian. l. xvii. p. 103. [l] Liban. orat. xii. p. 272. [m] Ammian. p. 73.

gave over all thoughts of taking the place, and contented themſelves with ravaging the country all round it. Julian, upon the firſt notice of what had happened, detached ſtrong parties to guard the paſſes, through which he knew they muſt return; by this means they were all cut off, except thoſe who marched near the camp of Barbatio, who was ſo far from cutting off their retreat, that he complained by a letter to Conſtantius of ſome officers for attempting it, who thereupon ordered them to be caſhiered. One of theſe was Valentinian, afterwards emperor [n]. The other barbarians either fortified themſelves in the countries which they had ſeized, ſtopping up all the avenues with huge trees, or took ſhelter in the iſlands formed by the Rhine. Julian reſolved, firſt to attack the latter, and with this view ſent to demand ſome boats of Barbatio, who, inſtead of complying with his juſt requeſt, immediately burnt all his boats, as he did on another occaſion the proviſions which had been ſent for both armies, after he had plentifully ſupplied his own. It is uncertain whether he behaved thus out of pique to Julian, or in compliance with private inſtructions from the emperor to thwart all his enterprizes [o]. Be that as it will, Julian, not in the leaſt ruffled or diſheartened at the unaccountable conduct of Barbatio, perſuaded ſome of the moſt reſolute among his men to wade over to one of the iſlands, where they killed all the Germans who had taken ſhelter there; and ſeizing their boats, purſued the ſlaughter in ſeveral other iſlands, till the enemy, abandoning them all, retired with their wives, and what booty they could carry, to their reſpective countries [p]. After this, he undertook the rebuilding of the Tres-tabernæ, a fort near Straſbourgh in Alſace, now known by the name of Saverne, which the enemy had demoliſhed. As it was ſo ſituated as to curb the nations beyond the Rhine, and prevent their irruptions into Gaul, Julian not only repaired the antient fortifications, but added new works to them, ſtored the place with proviſions for a whole year, and left a numerous garriſon in it, to keep the neighbouring country in awe [q]. While Julian was buſied in this work, Barbatio was employed in laying a bridge of boats over the Rhine: but the enemy, appriſed of this, threw a great number of huge trees into the river, which, being carried by the ſtream againſt the boats, ſunk ſeveral of them, and parted the reſt. Barbatio, ſeeing his work ruined

Barbatio endeavours to thwart his deſigns.

Julian rebuilds Saverne.

Barbatio put to flight by the barbarians.

[n] Idem. ibid. Liban. orat. xii p. 273.
[o] Idem. p. 73, 74.
[p] Idem ibid. & Julian p. 512. Liban. p. 273.
[q]

ed, thought it adviſeable to retire; but the enemy falling unexpectedly upon him in his retreat, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, took moſt of his baggage, laid waſte the neighbouring country, and returned in triumph, loaded with booty. Hereupon Barbatio, putting his troops into winter-quarters, as if the campaign had been over, though it was then but harveſt-time, returned to court, to make war there upon Julian with his calumnies and ill offices [r]. The barbarians, elated with this ſucceſs, aſſembled in great numbers, under the banners of Chnodomarius, a prince of great renown among them, and of ſix other kings, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Straſbourgh. Being informed there by a deſerter, that Julian had only thirteen thouſand men with him, Chnodomarius ſent him an haughty and menacing meſſage, commanding him to abandon forthwith the country which the Germans had conquered by their courage and valour [s]. Libanius adds, that the meſſenger produced to him the letters of Conſtantius, promiſing to relinquiſh to them what countries or cities they ſhould ſeize in Gaul [t]. By ſuch promiſes Conſtantius is ſuppoſed to have ſtirred them up againſt the tyrant Magnentius. But Julian, paying no regard to them, detained the meſſenger as a ſpy, and purſued the works he had begun at Saverne, till he recived intelligence, that the enemy were advanced within twenty miles of his camp. Hereupon, leaving Saverne, he marched directly againſt them. When he was about half way, he halted, with a deſign to reſt his men, and put off the battle to the next day; but both officers and ſoldiers demanding to be led without delay againſt the enemy, he purſued his march, and found the Germans who had been informed of his approach, ready to receive him. They were thirty-five thouſand ſtrong, headed by ſeven kings, ten princes, and many other lords of great diſtinction. Both armies engaged with great reſolution and intrepidity, and the victory continued long doubtful; the Roman cavalry even gave way, nor could Julian, with all his oratory, prevail upon them to rally and return to the charge: but the vigorous reſiſtance made by the foot ſo diſheartened the enemy, that, after having attempted ſeveral times in vain to break them, they began to abate much of their impetuoſity; which the Romans perceiving, they made a laſt effort; and charging the barbarians, already quite ſpent, put them to flight, and purſued them

Julian marches againſt them.

The battle of Argentoratum or Straſbourg.

[r] Ammian, p. 75. [s] Idem, l. xvi. p. 75, 76. [t] Liban. orat. xii. p. 269.

them with great ſlaughter. Great numbers of them threw themſelves into the Rhine, which was in their rear, and were drowned. Chnodomarius himſelf was taken in a wood, and preſented to Julian in ſight of the whole army, who thereupon ſaluted him with the title of Auguſtus; which he rejected with great indignation, telling his ſoldiers, That the glory of the action was chiefly owing to Conſtantius, under whoſe auſpices they had fought [u]. He loſt in the battle only four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three private men. Of the Germans ſix, or, as others will have it, eight, thouſand men were killed in the field; but a great number of dead bodies were ſeen floating on the river [w]. Zoſimus writes, that ſixty thouſand of the enemy were killed on the ſpot, and an equal number drowned; but he muſt have been miſled by bad memoirs, which make us queſtion the truth of what he adds, viz. that, after the battle, Julian obliged ſix hundred of his horſemen, who had fled, to appear before the whole army in the apparel of women [x]. The battle of Straſbourgh is famous in hiſtory. Julian himſelf ſtyles it a ſucceſsful action, which reſtored Gaul to its antient liberty [y]. Mamertinus ſays, that, by this ſingle battle, the war was ended, and Germany ruined. It is at leaſt certain, that the barbarians were entirely driven out of Gaul. This memorable battle was fought in the plains near Straſbourgh, when the corn was ripe, and the moon in the laſt quarter [z]. Julian aſcribed the whole glory of it to Conſtantius, and immediately ſent his royal captive Chnodomarius to him, whom he had treated with great reſpect, looking upon him as an inſtance of the inſtability of all human grandeur. Conſtantius ſent him to Rome, where he died ſoon after a natural death [a]. This victory was greatly leſſened by the ſycophants at court, and all the other actions of Julian turned into ridicule; which, however, was leſs prejudicial to him, than if they had extolled and magnified his exploits to a ſuſpicious, weak, and timorous prince. Conſtantius was not aſhamed to aſcribe the whole glory of this great action to himſelf, as appears from an edict publiſhed about this time, wherein he ſpeaks of himſelf as if he had fought at the head of his army, without ſo much as mentioning the name of Julian [c].

The Germans entirely defeated.

Conſtantius aſſumes to himſelf the whole glory of this action.

[u] Ammian. p. 84, 85. Liban. orat. x. p. 237. Julian. ad Athen. p. 512. [w] Ammian. ibid. [x] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 704. [y] Ammian. l. xx. p. 160. [z] Panegyr. xi. p. 223. [a] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 78. [b] Idem, l. xvii. p. 103. [c] Idem, l. xvi. p. 86.

Aurelius Victor, who wrote about the latter end of his reign, ſpeaks in the ſame ſtrain [d]; and Themiſtius, in magnifying his victories over the Germans, and the valour with which he delivered Gaul from their inroads, and reſtrained them within their antient limits, quotes the letters which the emperor himſelf had ſent to the ſenate of Conſtantinople [e]. Julian's firſt care, after the battle, was to cauſe all the dead to be buried, without diſtinction of friend or enemy. Having performed this pious office, he returned to Saverne, to finiſh the works begun there, and then advanced with all his army to Mayence, where he built a bridge over the river, and entered Germany, having with much-ado prevailed upon his army to follow him. The Germans, alarmed at the boldneſs of the young general, ſent deputies to ſue for peace, and almoſt at the ſame time others to threaten him and his army with immediate deſtruction, if they did not forthwith retire; but the brave commander, deſpiſing their menaces, continued ravaging their country till after the equinox; and then the ſnow preventing him from advancing farther, he began to repair the fort of Trajan, which ſome take to be the caſtle of Cromburgh, about three or four leagues from Francfort. This undertaking alarmed the enemy to ſuch a degree, that they ſent new deputies to ſue for peace, which they could not obtain upon any terms; but a truce was granted them for ten months, upon their promiſing to ſtore with proviſions the fort which was building in their country, in order to curb and awe them [f]. After this, he returned to Gaul with a great number of captives; but being informed on his march, that ſome Franks, having ravaged the country about Rheims during his abſence, had ſhut themſelves up in two caſtles on the Meuſe, he marched againſt them, and obliged them to ſurrender, after they had defended themſelves with great bravery for the ſpace of fifty-four days; that is, the greateſt part of December and all February. The priſoners were all ſent to the emperor, who incorporated them among his troops. Julian, having thus ended this long and glorious campaign, put his troops into winter-quarters, and took up his own in Paris, which we find about this time firſt mentioned in hiſtory. It was then only a caſtle ſituated on the iſland formed by the Seyne, which is now but a very ſmall part of that great metropolis [g]. This year the emperor enacted a law, dated the third Julian obliges ſome Franks to ſurrender, and ſends them to the emperor.

[d] Aur. Vict. p. 528. [e] Themiſt. or. p. 57. [f] Ammian. p. 68. Liban. orat. xii. p. 277. [g] Ammian. p. 240. in fol third of July, commanding the effects of thoſe to be confiſcated, who ſhould renounce the Chriſtian to embrace the Jewiſh religion; by another, he obliges all ſenators to reſide at Rome, or in the neighbourhood, many of them having retired from that metropolis, and ſettled in Achaia, Macedon, and the other provinces of Illyricum, on account of the great expences attending that dignity at Rome. By a third, addreſſed to Felix biſhop of Rome, he exempts all merchandizing eccleſiaſtics, their wives, children, and domeſtics, from every impoſition, whether ordinary or extraordinary, ſuppoſing the gains they made to be applied by them to the relief of the poor. Some laws of Conſtantius.

THE next conſuls were Cerealis, uncle to Gallus Caſar on the mother's ſide, and Datianus, who, though of a mean deſcent, bore the title of comes in 349, and was afterwards raiſed to the rank of a patrician [h]. We have obſerved above, that the Perſian general Tamſapor had been perſuaded by Muſonianus, prefect of the eaſt, to write to his maſter about renewing the antient treaties with the Romans; but as Sapor had not only concluded a peace with the Chionitæ, but entered into an alliance with them before Tamſapor's letters came to his hands, in anſwer to the propoſals tranſmitted to him by that general, he wrote a haughty letter to Conſtantius, which he ſent by one Narſes, with preſents for the emperor. The contents of the letter were, that he might lawfully inſiſt upon the emperor's yielding to him all the countries beyond the river Strymon in Macedon; but leſt his demands ſhould ſeem unreaſonable, he would be ſatisfied with Armenia and Meſopotamia, which with the utmoſt injuſtice had been taken from his grandfather Narſes. He added, that, unleſs they were reſtored, he was determined to do himſelf juſtice, and try whether he could recover them by force of arms. In this latter Sapor ſtyled himſelf king of kings, brother of the ſun and moon, &c. Narſes, who was charged to deliver it to the emperor, arrived at Antioch about the end of the preceding year, where Themiſtius ſaw him; and, after having reſted ſome time there, purſued his journey to Conſtantinople, which he entered with great pomp on the twenty-third of February of the preſent year 358. From Conſtantinople he repaired to Sirmium, where the emperor then was, and, in a public audience, preſented to him Sapor's letter, wrapped up in a piece of white ſilk. Conſtantius, without entering into any negotiation with him, wrote back to Embaſſies from Sapor to Conſtantius, and from Conſtantius to Sapor.

[h] Philoſtorg. l. viii. c. 8. p. 113. Cod. Theod. tit. 4. p. 8.

Sapor, that as he had maintained the Roman dominions in their full extent while he was poſſeſſed only of the eaſt, he could not ſuffer them to be curtailed now that he was maſter of the whole empire. He added, that he was ready and deſirous to conclude a peace with the Perſian monarch, provided it were upon honourable terms. With this letter he diſmiſſed Narſes; but a few days after ſent a ſolemn embaſſy into Perſia, with letters and preſents for the king, being deſirous at leaſt to put off the war till he had ſecured the northern provinces againſt the incurſions of the barbarians, that he might employ all the forces of the empire againſt ſo powerful and formidable an enemy. The Roman embaſſadors found Sapor at Cteſiphon; but not being able to prevail upon him to abate any thing of his demands, they returned about the twenty-fourth of Auguſt. Count Lucillianus and Procopius, who uſurped the ſovereignty in the reign of Valens, were ſent to the Perſian court ſoon after, to amuſe that warlike prince with new propoſals; but he, inſtead of hearkening to them, kept the embaſſadors ſome time under cloſe confinement, threatening to treat them as ſpies, but in the end diſmiſſed them unhurt [i]. While the emperor reſided at Sirmium, the Quadi and Sarmatians broke into Pannonia and Mœſia; and the Juthunges, a German nation, into Rhætia. The latter were defeated and driven back by Barbatio; but the emperor marched in perſon againſt the former ſoon after the vernal equinox; and having croſſed the Danube on a bridge of boats, laid waſte the territories of the Sarmatians, who thereupon came in great numbers, with the Quadi, pretending to ſue for peace; but their true deſign was to ſurpriſe the Romans, who, ſuſpecting it, fell upon them ſword in hand, and cut them all to a man in pieces. This obliged the reſt to ſue for peace in good earneſt; which they obtained, upon their ſetting at liberty the priſoners they had taken, and delivering up hoſtages [k]. The emperor then marched againſt the Limigantes, that is, thoſe ſlaves, who, in 334, had driven the Sarmatians out of their country, and ſeized it for themſelves, as we have related elſewhere. They too had made frequent inroads into the Roman territories; but, upon the approach of the army, came in great numbers to meet the emperor, pretending to ſubmit; but prepared to fall upon him unexpectedly, if an opportunity offered. The emperor emperor, obſerving their ſurly looks, and diſtruſting them, aſcended his tribunal, attended by the chief officers of the army, and his guards, in order to acquaint them with his pleaſure. While he was ſpeaking to them, his troops, purſuant to their private orders, inſenſibly ſurrounded them on all ſides. When the emperor had done, the Limigantes, diſſatisfied with the conditions he had offered them, laid their hands on their ſwords; which being obſerved by the Romans, who watched all their motions, they fell upon them at once, and began the ſlaughter. The Limigantes, finding it impoſſible to make their eſcape, made with great fury towards the tribunal; but were repulſed by the guards forming themſelves into the ſhape of a wedge, and all to a man cut in pieces, not one of them deigning to aſk quarter. After this, the Romans entering their country on one ſide, and the Sarmatians, their antient maſters, with the Taïfales, on the other, and deſtroying all with fire and ſword, they were obliged in the end to comply with the only condition the emperor offered them, which was, to quit their country, and remove to a more diſtant place, that they might not be tempted to infeſt the empire anew. Conſtantius reſtored the country to the Sarmatians, its antient owners, twenty-four years after they had been driven from it; appointed one of their nation, by name Zizais, to rule over them with the title of king, and declared them a free people[l]. For theſe exploits the army ſaluted Conſtantius with the ſurname of Sarmaticus, who ſoon after, that is, about the end of October, returned to Sirmium, which he entered in triumph, and put his troops into winter-quarters[m].

The Quadi and Sarmatians overcome by Conſtantius.

[i] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68. & l. xvii. p. 94. Themiſt. orat. iv. p. 57. Zonar. p. 17. Petr. legat. p. 28. [k] Ammian. l. xvii. p. 103, 104.

The Limigantes driven out by him, and the country reſtored to the Sarmatians.

In the mean time, Julian, having ſpent the firſt months of this year at Paris, in regulating the taxes paid by the province, ſo as to find the neceſſary ſupplies, without laying any new burdens on the people, already quite drained and exhauſted, took the field as ſoon as the ſeaſon was fit for action, with a deſign to conquer the Franks, before the truce which he had granted to the Alemans was expired. The Franks were at this time divided into ſeveral tribes or clans; but the moſt powerful among them was that of the Salii, who, being driven by the Saxons, according to Zoſimus[n], from the lands they poſſeſſed in Germany, had ſettled in Batavia; that is, in the iſlands formed by the ſeveral branches of the Rhine, and in Toxandria, which country began, according to the [l] Idem, p. 106—112. [m] Idem ibid. [n] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 707.

beſt modern geographers, about a league from Maſtricht, and extended about twenty-five leagues along the Meuſe, where ſtand at preſent the cities of Boiſleduc, Breda, and Antwerp [o]. Againſt theſe Franks Julian marched firſt, and was already arrived at Tongres, when he met their deputies on their journey to Paris, where they ſuppoſed they ſhould find him. They had been ſent to beg he would ſuffer them to remain as friends in the country which they poſſeſſed. Julian, upon ſome difficulties which he ſtarted, ſent them back for more particular inſtructions. They imagined, that he deſigned to wait their return at Tongres; but they were no ſooner gone, than he followed them; and having entered their country, and obliged them to ſubmit, he allotted them lands in Gaul, and incorporated great numbers of them into his cavalry [p]. He then marched againſt the Chamavi, another nation of Franks, who had ſettled in Gaul; and having overcome them in battle, and taken many of them priſoners, he obliged them to retire beyond the Rhine; whence they ſent deputies to ſue for peace, which he granted them upon ſuch terms as he thought fit to preſcribe. Having thus reduced the Salii and Chamavi, he rebuilt three forts on the Meuſe, which the barbarians had demoliſhed; but wanting proviſions, in a country ſo often ravaged by the enemy, to ſtore them, to ſupply his army, and to maintain the many captives, whom he had obliged the enemy to ſet at liberty, he ordered ſix or eight hundred veſſels, as we read in Zoſimus, to be built in Britain, for the conveying of corn from thence into Gaul. Julian continued in the country of the Chamavi, till the truce he had granted to the Alemans was expired; and then laying a bridge of boats over the Rhine, he entered their country, putting all to fire and ſword. Hereupon two of their kings, Suomarius and Hortarius, came in perſon to him, and obtained a peace, upon their promiſing to ſet at liberty all the captives they had taken, to ſupply a certain quantity of corn when required, and to furniſh wood, iron, and carriages for the repairing of the cities which they had ruined. The priſoners, whom he reſcued out of the hands of the barbarians during this campaign, amounted to twenty thouſand and upwards [q]. The campaign being thus ended, he put his troops into winter-quarters; but we are not told where he took up his own. This year, on the twenty-fourth of Julian overcomes the Salii,

And the Chamavi.

He obliges the Alemans to ſue for peace.

[o] Notit. Gall. p. 558. [p] Ammian. p. 99. Julian. ad Athen. p. 514. [q] Jul. ibid. Ammian. p. 102. Liban. orat. xii. p. 280. Zoſ. p. 70.

of Auguſt, about ſix in the morning, a moſt dreadful earthquake was felt in Aſia, Pontus, and Macedon, which greatly damaged an hundred and fifty cities, and utterly ruined that of Nicomedia, where it was ſo ſudden and violent, that all the houſes were overturned at once, and the inhabitants to a man buried in the ruins. This calamity is deſcribed at length by Ammianus [r], by Gregory of Nyſſa [s], Ephrem of Edeſſa, who wrote an elegy on that ſubject [t], and Libanius, who bemoaned in an oration the deſtruction of a city, which he ſtyles the fifth of the empire for greatneſs, and inferior to none in beauty [u]. When Julian paſſed that way in 362, he could not refrain his tears, in comparing the condition it was in then, with that in which he had formerly ſeen it [w]. Ariſtenetus, who reſided there in quality of vicar; Cecrops biſhop of the place, and another biſhop, periſhed with the reſt; but not in the church, nor with many biſhops, as the pagans gave out, to inſult the chriſtians [x]. The church, which was a magnificent ſtructure, and had been built by Conſtantine about the year 330, underwent the ſame fate with the other edifices [y]. This year the emperor enacted a law, dated the thirteenth of July, and addreſſed to Taurus prefect of Italy, declaring all magicians, aſtrologers, augurs, aruſpices, and pretenders to the art of divination, enemies to mankind; and ſuch of them as ſhould be found in the prince's court, guilty of treaſon, as giving the world occaſion to believe, that he ſuffers or countenances them. By the ſame law he orders the latter, whether diſcovered in his own palace, or in that of Julian, to be put to the rack, if they deny the charge, and ſpecifies the various kinds of tortures which he will have them to undergo, without any regard to their rank or quality [z]. Authors think, that, by this law, the emperor meant to drive theſe impoſtors from the court of Julian, who was ſuſpected of privately favouring them, and giving credit to their predictions [a].

Nicomedia overturned by an earthquake.

A law againſt magicians, augurs, &c.

The following year 359, the two brothers Euſebius and Hypatius were conſuls, being raiſed to that dignity by the empreſs Euſebia their ſiſter [b]. Ammianus begins his hiſtory of this year with the exploits of Julian in Gaul, where he was buſied in erecting magazines, in viſiting the cities which had had ſuffered moſt by the inroads of the barbarians, and giving proper orders for the rebuilding of their walls, and repairing their fortifications. After this, he aſſembled all his forces at Mentz, and paſſing the Rhine on a bridge of boats, entered Germany, and advanced as far as a place or country called Pallas, where the territories of the Alemans and Burgundians ended, pillaging and laying waſte their country far and wide.

[r] Ammian. p. 97. [s] Greg. Nyſſ. p. 75. [t] Marc. chron. p. 66. [u] Liban. orat. viii. p. 203. [w] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 219. [x] Soz. l. iv. c. 16. p. 559 [y] Philoſt. l. iv. c. 1. p. 70. [z] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 16. leg. 6. p. 124, 125. [a] Vide. Baron. ad ann. 358. [b] Ammian. l. xviii. p. 113.

Julian obliges ſeveral German nations to ſue for peace.

There he was met by two kings, Macrianus and Hariobaudus, who were brothers, come in perſon to ſubmit to Julian, who granted them a peace, as he did ſoon after to three other kings, Urias, Urſicinus, and Veſtralpus, upon their promiſing to deliver up all the priſoners they had taken, and to furniſh a certain quantity of corn when required. After this, Julian left Germany, and, as the ſeaſon was already far advanced, he put his troops into winter-quarters, and retired himſelf to Paris [c]. To return to Conſtantius: That prince, having intercepted a letter to Barbatio from his wife Aſſyria, giving him ſome hopes of being raiſed one day to the ſovereignty, ordered them both to be executed. Many innocent perſons were involved in their ruin, and put to death, as privy to their deſigns.

Barbatio and ſeveral others executed.

A tribune, by name Valentine, was ſeveral times racked in a moſt inhuman manner; but, as he conſtantly denied the charge, the emperor, convinced in the end of his innocence, to make him ſome amends, gave him the command of the troops in Illyricum [d]. Before the end of the winter, the emperor received intelligence, that the Limigantes, quitting the country in which they had been placed by him the preceding year, were advancing towards the borders of the empire.

The treachery of the Limigantes.

Hereupon, leaving Sirmium early in the ſpring, he haſtened to the banks of the Danube, to prevent them from croſſing that river, and invading Pannonia. Upon his arrival he ſent deputies to them, deſiring to know what had induced them to abandon the country which had been allotted to them. The Limigantes anſwered in appearance with the greateſt ſubmiſſion imaginable, that they were willing to live as true ſubjects of the empire, in what part ſoever the emperor ſhould think fit to place them; but that the country, which they had abandoned, was altogether uninhabitable, as they were ready to demonſtrate, if the emperor would give them leave to croſs the river, and lay their complaints before him. Conſtantius, pleaſed with their propoſal, granted them their requeſt, and received them in the neighbourhood neighbourhood of Acumincum, which moſt geographers take to be the preſent town of Kamanez on the Danube, near Peterwaradin, in the territory of Sirmium. But while he was aſcending his tribunal, they unexpectedly fell upon his guards ſword in hand, and would have killed the emperor himſelf, had he not with much-ado ſaved himſelf by flight. Several of his guards were ſlain; but in the mean time the reſt of the troops, taking the alarm, flew to arms, ſurrounded the Limigantes, and cut them all to a man in pieces [e]. Conſtantius then returned to Sirmium, where he was on the twenty-ſecond of May, this year the eve of Pentecoſt; but ſoon after ſet out from thence for Conſtantinople, for he was on the eighteenth of June at Singidunum in Mœſia [f]. He paſſed the remaining part of this year at Conſtantinople, ready to march, upon the firſt advice, againſt the Perſians. During his ſtay in that metropolis, he diſtinguiſhed it with a prefect or governor; an honour till this time peculiar to Rome. The firſt prefect of Conſtantinople was one Honoratus, inveſted with that dignity on the eleventh of December, according to Idatius, or of September, as we read in the chronicle of Alexander. He had before been prefect of Gaul [g]. This year the emperor diſpatched into the eaſt the ſecretary Paulus Catena, famous for his cruelty, to proſecute ſeveral perſons accuſed of having conſulted the oracle of an idol named Beſa in the city of Abydus, on the moſt diſtant borders of Egypt. Modeſtus, then count of the eaſt, and afterwards prefect, was appointed to judge the criminals, Hermogenes, who had ſucceeded Muſonianus in the office of prefect, being thought unfit for that commiſſion, on account of his mild and compaſſionate temper. Modeſtus eſtabliſhed his tribunal at Scythopolis in Paleſtine, whither perſons of both ſexes, and of every rank and condition, were daily dragged in crowds from all parts, and either confined to dungeons, or torn to pieces in a moſt cruel an barbarous manner on the rack, or publicly executed. Ammianus gives us a moſt frightful idea of this, as we may call it, inquiſition; but at the ſame time owns, that ſeveral perſons were cleared, and others puniſhed with far leſs ſeverity than was expected [h]. Parnaſus, who had been governor of Egypt, was condemned to loſe his head, for having conſulted an aſtrologer, by means of one Ariſtophanes; but Modeſtus ſoftened the rigour of that ſentence, and only ſent him him into baniſhment; as he did Simplicius the ſon of Philippus, who had been prefect, and conſul in 348, though accuſed of aſpiring at the empire. The latter was only baniſhed from his own country; nor would Modeſtus ſuffer him to be racked, though he had poſitive orders for it from the emperor. As for Ariſtophanes, he was, by the order of Paulus, whom he had provoked with his freedom of ſpeech, beaten with balls of lead faſtened to cords, till he was ready to expire; when Modeſtus, pitying him, ordered the executioner to forbear, and ſent Ariſtophanes into baniſhment. Demetrius, ſurnamed Cythras, a philoſopher, ſtriken in years, being convicted of having ſacrificed to the idols, was tortured with great cruelty for many hours; but afterwards ſuffered by Modeſtus to return to Alexandria his native city. Parnaſus and the reſt, excepting Ariſtophanes, who had been baniſhed on this occaſion, were recalled three years after, and pardoned [i].

[c] Ammian. l. xviii. p. 113. & l. xx. p. 154. [d] Idem, l. xviii. p. 118.

They are all cut off.

Several perſons condemned for conſulting an oracle.

[e] Idem, ibid. [f] Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 59. [g] Idem ibid. Socrat. l. ii. c 37. p. 139. Soz. l. iv. c. 23. Chron. Alex. p. 682. [h] Ammian. l. xix. p. 150, 151.

The Perſians begin hoſtilities.

IN the mean while, Sapor, king of Perſia, was encouraged and preſſed to begin hoſtilities by an officer of Conſtantius, named Antoninus, who, finding his affairs ruined at home, had fled to the court of Perſia, hoping to make his fortune there, and brought with him an exact account of the ſtate of the empire and all its forces. At the ſame time, Euſebius the eunuch, who had been long contriving the ruin of Urſicinus, as the only perſon who was independent of him and ſcorned his ſupport, perſuaded the emperor to remove him, as a perſon not to be truſted, from the command of the troops in the eaſt, and to appoint in his room Sabinianus, a decrepit old man, poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, but every way unfit for that employment. This change was no ſooner known at the Perſian court, than Antoninus, who was well acquainted with the character of Sabinianus, preſſed Sapor anew to begin the war without delay, adviſing him to march ſtrait to the Euphrates, without loſing time in beſieging towns, to croſs that river, and enter Syria, which he might eaſily reduce, while defended by ſo unfit a commander. The Perſian, approving the ſcheme, began to aſſemble his troops from all quarters, in order to put it in execution. This alarmed Conſtantius, who immediately ordered Urſicinus to haſten back into Syria, with the character of general of the foot, in the room of Barbatio lately beheaded; but without any authority, or even troops under his command. This too was a malicious contrivance of Euſebius and the other eunuchs, that;

[i] Idem, p. 152.

that, if the mighty deſigns of the Perſians were defeated, Sabinianus might have the honour of it; but if they were attended with ſucceſs, Urſicinus might bear the whole blame. That brave commander had no ſooner reached Syria, than he was informed, that the enemy's vanguard had already paſſed the Tigris. Upon this intelligence he haſtened into Meſopotamia, to give the neceſſary Orders there, in caſe the enemy ſhould attack the city of Niſibis. From Niſibis he flew to Amida, another city in the ſame country; and, though he travelled in the night-time, he narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands, whoſe parties were ſpread all over the country. From Amida he ſent Ammianus Marcellinus, the hiſtorian, to reconnoitre the enemy, who, upon his return, informed him, that to him they ſeemed at leaſt an hundred thouſand ſtrong; that they had already paſſed Nineve in the province of Adiabene, and were arrived at the bridge of the Anzabas, a river in Aſſyria. Hereupon Urſicinus diſpatched orders to Caſſianus, duke of Meſopotamia, and to Euphronius, governor of the province, to warn the inhabitants to withdraw with their effects into places of ſafety; to abandon Carrhæ, which was an open city; and to ſet fire to the forage, and likewiſe to the corn, though already ripe, that the enemy might find no ſubſiſtence, either for themſelves or their horſes, between the Tigris and the Euphrates. At the ſame time he took care to fortify the banks of the Euphrates with forts and paliſades, ſupplying the former with warlike engines of all kinds. Theſe wiſe precautions having obliged Sapor to lay aſide his deſign of marching ſtrait to the Euphrates, he turned to the left, and took his rout, purſuant to the advice of Antoninus, by the foot of the mountains which part Meſopotamia from Armenia, not doubting but he ſhould find there plenty of forage, and the Euphrates fordable nearer its head. Urſicinus, appriſed of his deſign, immediately left Amida, to give the neceſſary orders on that ſide likewiſe; but being ſurrounded by one of the enemy's parties, he narrowly eſcaped falling into their hands. Ammianus Marcellinus, the hiſtorian, was purſued as far as Amida; which place was inveſted a few days after by Sapor's whole army, in which ſerved ſeveral princes of different nations, and among the reſt the king of Albania, and Grumbates, king of the Chionitæ, a prince renowned for his valour and conqueſts. The Perſian took on his march to Amida two Roman forts, Reman and Buſan, the ſoldiers who garriſoned them, opening the gates to him upon the firſt ſummons, though they were both places of great ſtrength, and the inhabitants of the neighbouring country

Urſicinus enters Meſopotamia.

Wiſe precautions taken by Urſicinus.

Sapor takes two Roman forts.

try had retired to them with all their effects. In both the forts Sapor found ſome virgins, conſecrated, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus, to the worſhip of God, according to the diſcipline of the chriſtians, and was ſo far from offering them any injury, that, on the contrary, he enjoined his ſoldiers not to interrupt or diſturb them in their uſual exerciſes of piety, hoping, by that gentle treatment, to remove the prejudice, which his former cruelties had begotten in the minds of the neighbouring people [k]. He appeared before Amida, not with a deſign to beſiege the place, but only to ſound the diſpoſition of the garriſon; and, in caſe they refuſed to ſubmit, to purſue his march into Syria, agreeable to the plan ſuggeſted by Antoninus. But the Romans having diſcharged againſt him, as he approached the walls to ſhew himſelf in all his pomp and majeſty, a ſhower of darts, arrows, and javelins, one of which pierced his royal robes, and another laid the ſon of Grumbates, a youth of great expectation, dead at his father's feet, he was ſo tranſported with rage, that, laying aſide his former ſcheme, he reſolved at all adventures to revenge the affront offered to himſelf and the death of the young prince, with the utter deſtruction of the city, and a general maſſacre of all its inhabitants. The reader will find a very particular and diſtinct account of this memorable ſiege in Ammianus, who was ſhut up in the town, and an eye-witneſs of all that paſſed both within and without the walls. Never was place aſſaulted with more fury, nor defended with more vigor, reſolution, and intrepidity; but in the end moſt of the garriſon being killed, and thoſe who ſurvived quite ſpent with labour and watching, the walls being in ſeveral places levelled with the ground, and the ditches filled up with dead bodies, the Perſians made a laſt effort, and entered the town ſword in hand, after having lain ſeventy-five days before it, and loſt, during that time, thirty thouſand men and upwards. The city was razed, the chief officers crucified, and the reſt, with the ſoldiers and inhabitants, either put to the ſword, or carried into captivity, except our hiſtorian, and two or three more, who, in the dead of the night, eſcaped through a poſtern not obſerved by the enemy. As for Sapor, the ſummer being already far ſpent, and his army greatly fatigued, he thought it adviſeable to return to his dominions, having but little to brag of this expedition, which coſt him the lives of ſo many men, and prevented him from purſuing the advantageous deſigns ſuggeſted to him by Antoninus [l]. Sabinianus

He lays ſiege to Amida.

Which, after a long and vigorous reſiſtance, is taken, and razed.

[k] Idem, l. xviii. p. 124—132. [l] Idem, p. 144—146.

nianus was buſied, during the whole time of the ſiege, in exerciſing his men near Edeſſa [m]. Urſicinus was continually preſſing him to take the field, and haraſs, at leaſt, the enemy, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their convoys; which he might have eaſily done, and by that means diverted them from purſuing the ſiege with ſo much vigor, and perhaps obliged them to raiſe it. But Sabinianus returned no other anſwer, than that his inſtructions were not to expoſe the army to any danger. He is ſuppoſed to have had likewiſe private inſtructions from Euſebius, the favourite eunuch, his patron, to give Urſicinus no opportunity of performing any thing that might redound to his honour [n]. Thus was that great officer obliged to continue inactive, and ſee, with the utmoſt regret, one of the ſtrongeſt cities in the eaſt reduced, and ſo many brave men fall unrevenged. Ammianus, after his eſcape from Amida, found him at Miletene in the Leſſer Armenia, on his way to Antioch, whither he followed him ſoon after. From Antioch Urſicinus repaired to court, where he was, to his great ſurprize, charged with the loſs of Amida, and all the wrong ſteps taken during that unhappy campaign. Arbetio and Florentius, two of Euſebius's creatures, were appointed by the emperor to enquire into his conduct, and examine by whoſe fault Amida was loſt. Theſe two judges, however partial and corrupt, could not lay the blame on Urſicinus; but, on the other hand, not caring, through fear of offending Euſebius, to expoſe Sabinianus, ended their enquiries, without clearing, as they were in juſtice bound to do, the former, or condemning the latter. Urſicinus, highly provoked at ſuch proceedings, appealed to the emperor, who, he ſaid, would not fail to puniſh with due ſeverity the authors, whoever they were, of the late miſcarriages. In the tranſport of his paſſion, he let drop the following unguarded expreſſion, viz. That the emperor himſelf, though he marched into Meſopotamia the next ſpring at the head of his army, would not be able to protect that country, ſo long as he was thus governed by eunuchs. This being carried immediately to the emperor, as it generally happens in courts, with malicious aggravations, Conſtantius, without any further enquiry, ordered that brave and loyal officer to retire to his native country, after having deveſted him of his employment, and given it to one Agilo a German, who, in 354, had been tribunus ſtabuli, which anſwers our maſter

Urſicinus accuſed at court, but found innocent.

He is diſgraced.

[m] Idem, p. 127. [n] Idem ibid. & l. xix. p. 126.

maſter of the horſe [o]. Thus was this weak and deluded prince induced to deprive himſelf, and the empire, which lay at ſtake, at ſo critical a conjuncture, of the ſkill, counſels, and experience of the beſt officer of the age, to gratify the avarice, ambition, and revenge of a wicked courtier, ſacrificing to his private ends the public intereſt, and the welfare and glory both of his prince and country.

The Perſians make themſelves maſters of ſeveral places in Meſopotamia.

THE following year, Conſtantius being conſul the tenth time, and Julian the third, Sapor, entering Meſopotamia early in the ſpring, took by aſſault Singara, a town of conſiderable ſtrength, and carried both the garriſon and inhabitants into captivity. Then leaving Niſibis, where great part of the Roman army lay encamped, on the left, he took his rout towards Bezabde, called alſo Phœnicia, a ſtrong town on the Tigris. After ſeveral attacks, in which great numbers fell on both ſides, the biſhop of the place went out to exhort the king to withdraw, and put an end to ſo deſtructive a war; but Sapor, without returning him any anſwer, purſued the ſiege, made himſelf maſter of the place, put moſt of the inhabitants to the ſword, and reduced the reſt, with the biſhop and all his clergy, to ſlavery. Some ſuſpected the biſhop, named, as we are told [p], Heliodorus, of ſecretly favouring the Perſians; but Ammianus clears him of this charge [q]. Sapor did not demoliſh Bezabde, as he had done Singara; but repaired the fortifications, and leaving a garriſon in it, led his army againſt Virta, or Birtha, on the moſt diſtant borders of Meſopotamia; but not being able to reduce it, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attacks, he raiſed the ſiege, and retired to his own dominions, without engaging in any other enterprize this campaign. While Sapor was thus, by degrees, reducing Meſopotamia, Conſtantius was ſtill at Conſtantinople, raiſing new troops, and ſoliciting the Goths and other barbarians to join him. At length he left that Metropolis, when the ſpring was already far advanced, and ſet out for Syria. Upon his arrival at Cæſarea in Cappadocia, he was met by deputies ſent to him by Julian, who had been declared emperor at Paris, as we ſhall relate anon. He was thunder-ſtruck with this news, and long in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould march againſt Julian or Sapor; but was in the end perſuaded to purſue his march into the eaſt. Leaving therefore Cappadocia, he advanced to Miletene in the Leſſer Armenia, paſſed the Euphrates at Samoſata in Syria, and arrived at Edeſſa in Meſopotamia, where Conſtantius marches into Meſopotamia.

h

[o] Idem, p. 144, 145, & l. xiv. p. 24. [p] Menæa, 9 Ap. p. 76. [q] Ammian. l. xx. p. 165.

he was obliged to wait the coming of his troops, and the warlike engines, till after the autumnal equinox, when he purſued his march to Amida, which he could not behold, buried, as it was, in its ruins, without ſhedding many tears. From Amida he continued his rout to Bezabde, with a deſign to retake that place; but being in ſeveral aſſaults repulſed by the Perſian garriſon, he reſolved to reduce it by famine, which he might have done, the Perſian army being long before diſperſed, and, according to cuſtom, returned to their reſpective homes, had not the heavy rains and ſevere weather obliged him to drop the enterprize and retire to Antioch, which he did not reach before the end of the year; for, on the ſeventeenth of December, he was at Hierapolis in Euphrateſiana.

The Scots and Picts break into the Roman territories.

We ſhall now return to Julian, whom we left the preceding year in his quarters at Paris, where he was informed in the beginning of the winter, that the Picts and Caledonians, about this time firſt diſtinguiſhed in hiſtory by the name of Scoti or Scots, had broken into the Roman province, and committed dreadful ravages there. Upon this intelligence, he ſent his lieutenant Lupicinus, who had ſucceeded Severus in that poſt, with ſome troops into Britain. Lupicinus ſet ſail from Boulogne in the depth of winter, and in a few days reached London, where he landed his forces. But of this expedition we find no farther account in hiſtory: and indeed Lupicinus, tho' he was an officer of great bravery and experience in war, had not time to perform any remarkable exploits, being recalled ſoon after, as we ſhall relate anon. In the mean while, Conſtantius, wholly intent upon aſſembling a mighty army for his intended expedition againſt the Perſians, ſent Decentius, one of his ſecretaries, into Gaul, to bring from thence all the Batavians and other auxiliaries, with three hundred men choſen out of each corps ſerving under Julian, that is, the flower of that prince's army. The emperor's orders were not addreſſed to Julian, to whom he only wrote, warning him not to oppoſe them; but to his lieutenant Lupicinus, and to Gentinus, or, as others call him, Sintula, his tribunus ſtabuli, or maſter of the horſe. Moſt writers are of opinion, that the emperor took this reſolution, rather with a deſign to weaken Julian, than to ſtrengthen himſelf; for he began to be jealous of that prince's glory, and apprehenſive

The emperor ſends for part of Julian's army.

[r] Cod. Theodoſ. p. 60. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 185. & l. xx. p. 170—177. [s] Idem, l. xx. p. 154.

ſive of his power. The common report was, that the emperor was induced to take this ſtep by private letters from Florentius, at that time prefect of Gaul, and in his heart a great enemy to Julian [s]. Be that as it will, Julian found himſelf reduced, by the above-mentioned order, to the unhappy dilemma, either of falling a ſacrifice to the reſentment of the emperor, if he refuſed to comply with it; or periſhing by the arms of barbarians, if he obeyed it, being well appriſed that they unmindful of their promiſes and treaties, would be tempted to break into Gaul, as ſoon as they ſaw that province deſtitute of troops to defend it. In this dangerous ſituation, he reſolved, without heſitating a ſingle moment, to obey, but at the ſame time to abdicate the dignity of Cæſar, that he might not be charged with the loſs of Gaul. He thought himſelf, however, bound to acquaint Decentius, that the auxiliaries raiſed in Gaul and Germany had entered into the ſervice, upon condition of their not being obliged to paſs the Alps; and that the violation of this article, always inſiſted upon by the people beyond the Rhine, might prevent their lifting themſelves for the future. But Decentius giving no ear to his juſt remonſtrances, he ſubmitted to the emperor's will without reply. As Lupicinus, to whom the emperor's orders were addreſſed, was abſent in Britain, Decentius himſelf choſe all the beſt men out of each corps, not excepting Julian's own guards; which was no ſooner done, than Julian wrote to their reſpective commanders, enjoining them to quit their winter-quarters, and begin their march without delay. This order threw all Gaul into the utmoſt confuſion; nothing was heard but complaints, outcries, and lamentations, as if the barbarians had already entered the province: ſeveral libels againſt Conſtantius, and in commendation of Julian, were privately handed about, and diſperſed among the ſoldiery. Ammianus mentions one, in which the ſoldiers complained of their being baniſhed to the moſt remote parts of the earth, while their wives, children and relations were carried into captivity by the barbarians. To obviate this complaint, Julian ordered them to carry their families with them, ſupplying them with public carriages for that purpoſe. When the troops were ready to depart, Julian adviſed Decentius not to ſuffer them to approach Paris, where he ſtill was in winter-quarters; but Decentius, fearing they might mutiny, if they left Gaul without ſeeing their general, led led them thither to take their leave of him, which proved a very injudicious ſtep. Julian received them in a moſt obliging manner, and encouraged them chearfully to ſubmit to the emperor's commands, who would not fail to reward their valour. But on the other hand, the people conjured them not to abandon a country which they had defended with ſo much glory; and the ſoldiers ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to comply with their requeſt. Hereupon Julian, aſcending the tribunal, told them, that it was not by any means lawful for them to deliberate about a thing already decided by the emperor; and upon that ſubject made a long diſcourſe, which the ſoldiers heard with attention, and withdrew in ſilence. After this, Julian invited the chief officers to dinner, entertaining them with no leſs tenderneſs than magnificence, and deſiring them, when they took leave of him to let him know in what he could be ſerviceable to them. The officers, greatly concerned to part with ſo obliging a commander, and to quit their country, returned in the utmoſt affliction to their quarters [t]. However, they continued all quiet till about ſun-ſet, when the ſoldiers, ſtirred up, according to Zoſimus [u], by libels diſperſed under-hand among them by their officers, flew all at once to arms, and haſtening to the palace, ſurrounded it, and with a tumultuous noiſe proclaimed Julian emperor [w]. Julian calls all the gods to witneſs, that he had not the leaſt knowledge of this deſign, nor the leaſt ſuſpicion of its being on foot, but was withdrawn with his wife, when he firſt heard himſelf ſaluted with the title of Auguſtus [x]. Libanius too aſſures us, that the deſign was not premeditated, but ſudden [y]. Julian, ſhewing himſelf highly diſſatisfied with the conduct of the ſoldiery, ordered all the gates of the palace to be kept ſhut; inſomuch, that the ſoldiers, eager to ſee him, were obliged to wait till the next morning. In the mean time, he invoked his gods, entreating them to reveal to him their will by ſome prodigy; and they commanded him, as we are told, to comply with the deſires of the ſoldiery. Ammianus writes, that Julian told his friends in confidence, that a ſpectre appeared to him that very night, repreſenting the genius of the empire, as it was painted in thoſe days, and diſappeared, after having uttered theſe words, I am come to ſtay with you, but only for a ſhort time [z]. Eunapius aſſures us, that before he accepted the ſovereignty, he performed certain ceremonies in private with a pagan pontiff, whom he had ſome time before ſecretly ſent for out of Greece [a]; which, in the language of that writer, imports, that he had recourſe to magic. As ſoon as day appeared, the ſoldiers breaking down the gates of the palace, obliged Julian to ſhew himſelf, and ſaluted him anew with the title of Auguſtus, which he continued to reject, reminding them of their duty, and promiſing to prevail upon the emperor to countermand the orders which had given occaſion to their complaints, mutiny, and revolt. But all was to no purpoſe; nay, the ſoldiers well appriſed that Conſtantius, notwithſtanding all his promiſes, would in the end treat them as rebels, threatened Julian with immediate death, if he perſiſted any longer in declining the honour they intended to confer upon him. To theſe menaces he yielded, and was thereupon lifted up by the ſoldiers on ſhields, and ſhewn to the multitude, who, with loud acclamations, proclaimed him emperor, while an officer, by name Maurus, placed upon his head his golden collar, enriched with precious ſtones, inſtead of a diadem. When this ceremony was over, Julian, to animate his ſoldiers, promiſed them five pieces of gold and a pound weight of ſilver a man [b]. After this, he ſhut himſelf up in the palace, diſpleaſed and uneaſy at what had happened; which gave occaſion to the report of his having been murdered. This alarmed the ſoldiery, who immediately flew to the palace, where, to their great ſatisfaction, they found him, not only ſafe, but clad in the imperial robes [c]. Libanius writes, that the eunuch, his chamberlain, had in reality been bribed to murder him [d]; and Julian himſelf, that money had been diſtributed among the ſoldiery to debauch them [e]. However that be, the ſoldiers, imagining he had been in danger, preſſed him to put all the friends of Conſtantius to death, who had oppoſed his promotion; but he reſolutely declared, that he would not by any means ſuffer the leaſt injury to be offered to them; nay, he generouſly forgave the eunuch, who had attempted to take away his life [f]. Some troops had already begun their march towards the eaſt, but they were no ſooner informed of what had paſſed at Paris, than they returned with their leader Sintula, and joined the reſt. Julian having aſſembled them all in a neighbouring plain, appeared Julian rejects the title.

Julian complies with the emperor's orders.

[s] Idem, p. 157, 158.

The ſoldiers unwilling to leave him.

They proclaim him emperor.

[t] Idem, p. 169. Liban. or. xii. p. 283. Julian. ad Athen. p. 518, 519. [u] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 710. [w] Ammian. l. xix p. 159. Lib or. xii. p. 284. [x] Julian. or. xii p. 284. [y] Liban. or. x p. 241. [z] Ammian. p. 162.

But is forced to accept of it.

His generoſity.

[a] Eunap. c. 5. p. 76. [b] Ammian. p. 160. Lib. or. v. p. 179. Zoſ. p. 711. Zonar. p. 18. [c] Julian. ibid. p. 522. Ammian. p. 160. [d] Liban. or. xii. p. 285. [e] Julian. ibid. [f] Idem, p. 522. & Lib. p. 285.

peared at their head with all the badges of majesty; and ascending the tribunal, in a very elegant and lively speech commended their valour, put them in mind of the many victories they had gained under his conduct, encouraged them to defend and protect a prince, whom they themselves had raised, and ended with assuring them, that he was determined to rule with justice and moderation, and to prefer such only as were men of merit, without suffering himself to be biassed by the recommendations of any person whatsoever [g]. Such is the account which Julian himself, and after him Libanius, Ammianus, and Zosimus, his admirers, or rather adorers, give us of his promotion to the imperial dignity. But on the other hand, the christian writers, namely Gregory of Nazianzus [h], Philostorgius [i], Theodoret [k], and Sozomen [l], seem to have thought him privy to the design of the soldiery; nay, Zonaras tells us in plain terms, that either prompted by ambition, or apprehending in the end the doom of his brother Gallus, he gained under-hand the officers, who by his private directions stirred up the soldiers to threaten him as they did, that, to the eyes of the world, he might seem to have accepted the sovereignty to save his life [m]. The former writers betray, no doubt, a great partiality for Julian, and the latter an equal prejudice against him. We shall therefore, in describing his reign and actions, impartially relate, unbiassed as we are by any favour or prejudice, what we find in writers of both parties, leaving the reader to judge which of them deserves most credit. All authors agree, that Julian was raised to the imperial dignity in the year 360, but as to the day, we are quite at a loss: but as the troops were, at the time of his promotion, still in their winter-quarters, it must have happened in the month of May or April. He had no sooner accepted the imperial title, than Decentius hastened back into the east, whither he was soon followed by the prefect Florentius, who, conscious to himself of his conduct towards Julian, and dreading his resentment, was in such haste to get out of Gaul, that he left his whole family behind him; but Julian not only gave them leave to follow him, but ordered them to be supplied for that purpose with public carriages. Lupicinus, Julian's lieutenant, an officer of great experience, courage, and address, was capable of embroiling matters; but as he was still in His speech to the soldiery.

Disagreement among authors about the manner of his promotion.

Decentius and Florentius retire from Gaul.

[g] Ammian. l. xx. p. 161, 162. Julian. Liban. Zos. ibid. [h] Greg. Naz. p. 58, 67. [i] Philostorg. l. vi. c. 5. p. 84 [k] Theodor. l. ii. c. 28. p. 636. [l] Sozomen. p. 18. [m] Zonar. p. 18.

Britain, Julian, by ordering all the veſſels on the coaſt to be ſtopped, prevented his receiving intelligence of what had paſſed; ſo that upon his landing at Boulogne to execute the emperor's orders, addreſſed to him, as we have related above, he was arreſted by an officer ſent thither for that purpoſe, but treated by Julian with the utmoſt humanity and good-nature [n]. And now Julian, well appriſed that the emperor would be alarmed, and highly provoked, at what had happened, in order to appeaſe his wrath, and allay his fears, wrote an obliging letter to him, which he ſent by two of his chief officers, Pentadius and Eutherius. In the letter he acquainted him with what had happened, begged he would ſuffer him to enjoy the title which he had been forced to accept, promiſed to obey him, even in that ſtation, with the ſame readineſs and alacrity as if he were a private perſon, offered to ſend him ſome troops, and even to leave him the nomination of the prefect; but at the ſame time he reſerved to himſelf the creating of the other officers, and remonſtrated with the greateſt ſubmiſſion, that Gaul was ſo far from being able to ſpare any of its natives, that, on the contrary, it ſtood in need of aſſiſtance from other provinces. Julian not only wrote himſelf, but perſuaded the whole army to write to the emperor, earneſtly entreating him to confirm what they had done, and to agree with Julian, who had obliged them to take an oath not to raiſe any diſturbances, if Conſtantius ſuffered him to continue in Gaul with the title of Auguſtus [o]. Julian, in his letter, contented himſelf with the title of Cæſar [p]; and he himſelf aſſures us, that, in writing to the emperor, he never aſſumed any other [q]. But to this public letter, as we may ſtyle it, he added a private one, highly injurious and abuſive, as we read in Ammianus, who tells us, that though it had been communicated to him, yet he ſhould have thought it indecent and unbecoming to inſert it in his hiſtory [r]. The deputies from Julian met the emperor at Cæſarea in Cappadocia, who, upon his firſt reading the letter, was ſo tranſported with rage, that he drove them from his preſence, and was ſome time in ſuſpenſe, as we have ſaid, whether he ſhould proceed in his expedition againſt the Perſians, or turn his arms againſt his new rival; but upon mature deliberation, cooler counſels prevailed, and Conſtantius, diſmiſſing the deputies without any anſwer, diſpatched

Lupicinus arreſted, but treated with humanity.

Julian ſends deputies, and writes to the emperor.

[n] Ammian. p. 171. Julian. ad Athen. p. 515. [o] Ammian. l. xx. p. 167. Julian. p. 518. Zonar. p. 18. [p] Zonar. ibid. [q] Julian. ibid. p. 523. [r] Ammian. ibid. p. 169.

ed Leonas, his quæſtor, into Gaul, with a letter to Julian, acquainting him, that he could not by any means approve of his uſurpation, and exhorting him, as he tendered his own ſafety, and that of his friends, to be ſatisfied with the title of Cæſar, which he ſtill allowed him to enjoy, but diſapproved and annulled whatever elſe had been done. Leonas ſoon reached Paris, where he was kindly received by Julian, to whom he delivered the emperor's letter the day after his arrival. Julian received it ſitting on his tribunal, in the preſence of the ſoldiery and people, whom he had aſſembled for that purpoſe, and cauſed it to be read aloud. When he underſtood, that the emperor would not by any means allow him the title of Auguſtus, addreſſing himſelf to Leonas, he told him, that he was willing to lay down that title, provided the ſoldiery conſented to it; but otherwiſe could not, without betraying them, and expoſing them to the reſentment of Conſtantius. He had ſcarce uttered theſe words, when the whole aſſembly confirmed to him with repeated acclamations the title they had given him, declaring, that they were determined to ſtand by him to the laſt drop of their blood. Julian wrote to the emperor by Leonas, acquainting him with the diſpoſition of the people and ſoldiery, and telling him, that he could not prevail upon himſelf to abandon them to his reſentment. Several meſſages and embaſſies paſſed between Conſtantius and Julian; the former inſiſting upon his abdicating the ſovereignty, and the latter declining, under various pretences, to relinquiſh the authority with which he had been inveſted by the ſoldiery and people, but at the ſame time aſſuring the emperor of his good intentions and zeal for his ſervice [s].

Conſtantius refuſes to acknowledge him emperor.

Julian's conduct on this occaſion.

In the mean time, the emperor being wholly taken up with the Perſian war in the eaſt, Julian, to keep his army in action, and maintain the reputation he had acquired, paſſed the Rhine at Triceſima, which ſome take to be Cleves, others Kellen, in that neighbourhood; and falling ſuddenly upon the Atthuarii, the inhabitants of the preſent countries of Cleves and Munſter, who had made frequent inroads into Gaul, laid waſte their territory, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſubmit to ſuch laws as he thought fit to impoſe upon them. In this expedition he ſpent three months, and then repaſſing the Rhine, he viſited all the forts on that river as far as Baſle, recovered ſome places that were ſtill held by the enemy, fortified them, and, as the year was already far spent, retired by the way of Besançon, which he describes in a letter [t], to Vienne, where he took up his winter-quarters. About this time died his wife Helena, the sister of Constantius, and her body was sent to Rome, to be there interred near that of her sister Constantina [u]. She is styled on most of her medals Flavia Julia Helena, and on some bears the title of Augusta [w], which we suppose her to have taken after the promotion of her husband. This year, on Monday the twenty-eighth of August, happened a great eclipse of the sun, which began at half an hour past four in the morning, and lasted above two hours [x]. Ammianus takes notice of it in his history [y].

Julian overcomes the Atthuarii.

[s] Idem, p. 170. Lib. or. xii. p. 286. Zon. p. 19.

His wife Helena dies

THE next consuls were Flavius Taurus, prefect of Italy, who had presided the year before at the famous council of Rimini, and Florentius, prefect of Gaul, who had fled from that province upon the promotion of Julian. This year Julian, finding Constantius would not hearken to any terms, began to prepare for war, being incited to it also by his magicians, who assured him of success, and encouraged by several dreams, in one of which he is said to have known, that Constantius was near his end, nay, that he was to die about the month of November [z]. He still made an outward profession of the christian religion, says Ammianus [a], to gain the christians to his party, though he had long since renounced that in his heart, and embraced the religion of the antient Romans; nay, the better to impose on them, on the feast of the Epiphany, which was celebrated with extraordinary solemnity in the church, he publicly assisted at divine service, and offered up with the rest his solemn prayers [b]; which expression of Ammianus some understand of his receiving the eucharist. Zonaras writes, that this happened on the feast of our Saviour's nativity, which was then celebrated by the Greeks on the sixth of January; and adds, that Julian by this hypocrisy hoped to secure the soldiers to his party, who were for the most part christians [c]. When he had made the necessary preparations for war, and was ready to march into Italy, and thence into the east, against Constantius, if he persisted in refusing him the title of emperor, advice was brought him, that the Alemans, and among the rest the subjects of Vadomarius, Julian's hypocrisy.

[t] Julian. epist. xxxviii. p. 180. [u] Ammian. l. xx. p. 172. & l. xxi. p. 178. [w] Byzan. famil. p. 41. [x] Petav. doctr. temp. l. xi. c. 45. p. 373. [y] Ammian. l. 20. p. 155. [z] Liban. or. xii p. 286. Ammian. ibid. p. 179. [a] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 180. [b] Idem, p. 181. [c] Zonar. p. 19.

marius, whoſe country lay near Baſle, had broken into Gaul, on the ſide of Rhœtia, and committed dreadful ravages there. Vadomarius pretended to have the greateſt reſpect imaginable for Julian, and to be much concerned for the hoſtilities committed by his countrymen; but, in the mean time, Julian, having intercepted a letter from him to Conſtantius, filled with bitter invectives againſt himſelf, found means to have him arreſted at a banquet, and baniſhed him into Spain [d]. He had already ſent Libano, one of his commanders, with a ſtrong detachment againſt the Alemans; but he being killed, and his men put to the rout near Sanctio, now Seckingen, in the neighbourhood of Baſle, Julian advanced in perſon againſt them, paſſed the Rhine, and coming upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to reſtore the booty they had taken, and ſue for peace; which he granted them upon his own terms [e]. Libanius aſſures us, that Conſtantius had, by letters and large ſums, tranſmitted to the heads of the German nations, ſtirred them up, and encouraged them to invade Gaul, in order to divert Julian from forming other ſchemes [f]. This, ſays Ammian, was the common report [g], and Julian pretended to have in his cuſtody the very letters, and to ſhew both them, and others, which the emperor was ſuppoſed to have written to the barbarians in the time of Magnentius, animating them to invade Gaul [s]; which greatly eſtranged from him the minds of the people. However, Ammianus does not take upon him to affirm it, but only ſays, that it was a flying report [t]. In the mean time, Conſtantius having ordered magazines to be formed at Briancon in Dauphiny, at Bregentz on the lake of Conſtance, and at ſeveral other places on the Alps, Julian concluded from thence, that he was bent upon war; and reſolving to be before-hand with him, he threw off the maſk, and obliged his ſoldiers to take an oath of allegiance to him, which they all did very readily, except Nebridius, who had ſucceeded Florentius in the prefecture of Gaul. That officer frankly declared, that he would not, upon any conſideration whatſoever, take an oath, which obliged him to draw his ſword againſt his lawful ſovereign. Upon this, Julian ſuffered him to retire unmoleſted into Hetruria [u]. The loyal, generous, and diſintereſted conduct of this officer deſerved a better name than that of effeminacy, with which Libanius

He reduces the Alemans; And grants them a peace.

He obliges his ſoldiers to take an oath of allegiance to himſelf.

[d] Ammian. ibid. [e] Idem ibid. [f] Liban. or. v. p. 180. [g] Ammian. ibid. [s] Julian. ad Athen. p. 524. [t] Ammian. ibid. [u] Idem, p. 183.

banius has been pleaſed to ſtigmatize it [w]. In his room, Julian appointed one Germanicus to diſcharge the functions of the prefect. As his thus obliging the ſoldiers to take an oath of allegiance to himſelf was openly revolting from Conſtantius, he wrote to ſeveral cities and among the reſt to Athens, Lacedæmon, and Corinth, acquainting them with the motives that had prompted him to take that ſtep, being well appriſed, ſays Libanius, that good princes are willing to ſubmit their actions to the judgment of the whole world, whereas tyrants dread the leaſt ſcrutiny [x]. Of all theſe letters, or rather apologies, only that has reached our times which he wrote to the Athenians, and a few lines of a letter which he wrote to the inhabitants of Corinth, when he was already maſter of great part of the empire. In theſe he pretends to have been animated by his gods to make war upon Conſtantius, and by them aſſured of ſucceſs [y]. And now Julian, finding he could depend upon the fidelity of his army, and reſolved to purſue his deſigns with vigour, ſent part of his forces into Pannonia under the conduct of Nevita, Jovinus, and Jovius, ordering them to take different routs, that they might ſeem the more numerous, and ſtrike the greater terror into the enemy, while he, leaving Baſle, marched through woods and by-ways into Illyricum. Nevita, Jovinus, and Jovius, had with them about twenty thouſand men, but Julian himſelf only three thouſand. They were all to meet at Sirmium, the place of the general rendezvous. Upon the firſt news of Julian's march, Taurus, prefect of Italy, and Florentius, whom Conſtantius had lately appointed prefect of Illyricum, abandoning their provinces betook themſelves to flight, and haſtened to the emperor to acquaint him with the motions of Julian. As they were both conſuls this year, Julian ordered them, if Zoſimus is to be credited [z], to be ſtigmatized in all the public acts with the name of the runaway conſuls. By their flight, Julian became maſter of Italy without ſtriking a blow, and likewiſe of Sicily, whither he ſent ſome troops, with orders to keep themſelves in readineſs to paſs over into Africa. The different parties, led by Julian and the three above-mentioned commanders, purſued their march with ſuch expedition, that in ten or eleven days time they all arrived in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, which Julian entered in triumph; Lucilianus, who commanded there for Conſtantius, having been ſurpriſed the night before, and taken priſoner by one of Julian's

He writes to ſeveral cities

He ſets out on his march

[w] Liban, p. 287. [x] Liban. or. xii. p. 288. [y] Julian. ep. xiii. p. 129. Naz. or. ix p. 68. [z] Zoſ. p. 712.

Julian's parties. He ſtaid but two days at Sirmium, being eager to make himſelf maſter of the important paſs of Sucida-va, dividing Illyricum from Thrace, which he did without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition; and having left a ſtrong garriſon there under the command of Nevita, he turned back to Naiſſus, where he ſeems to have continued, till news was brought him of the death of Conſtantius, aſſembling troops from all quarters, in order to reinforce his army before he entered Thrace. During his ſtay there, he raiſed Aurelius Victor, the hiſtorian, to the government of Pannonia Secunda, and wrote to the Roman ſenate a letter filled with bitter invectives againſt Conſtantius, which was ill received by the people, and is highly diſapproved of by Ammianus himſelf [a]. While Julian lay at Naiſſus, without the leaſt apprehenſion of an enemy at his back, two of Conſtantius's legions, and a cohort of archers, who had been ordered into Gaul, ſurpriſed on their march the city of Aquileia, and defended it with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that Julian could not by any means reduce it: they were commanded by one Nigrinus, who held out till two months after the emperor's death, and was even then with much ado prevailed upon to ſubmit to Julian [b].

Makes himſelf maſter of Illyricum.

But cannot reduce Aquileia.

In the mean time, Conſtantius, being returned from Meſopotamia to Antioch in the latter end of the preceding year, as we have related above, married in that city, with great ſolemnity, Maxima Fauſtina, Euſebia being dead ſome time before. Of the parentage and qualities of this new empreſs, no mention is made by the antients. All we know of her is, that ſome time after the death of Conſtantius ſhe was delivered of a daughter, named Flavia Maxima Conſtantia, who was afterwards married to the emperor Gratian [c]. When the public rejoicings were over, the emperor ſpent the remaining part of the winter in preparing for his intended expedition againſt the Perſians, being reſolved to end that war, or at leaſt to ſecure the empire on that ſide, before he marched into the weſt againſt Julian. In the mean time, Sapor, having aſſembled a mighty army, took the field, and advanced to the banks of the Tigris, with a deſign to croſs that river, and purſue his march ſtrait to the Euphrates. This Conſtantius no ſooner underſtood, than he left Antioch; and, croſſing the Euphrates, advanced as far as Edeſſa, whence he ſent ſent part of his army under the command of Arbetio and Agilo, to the banks of the Tigris, with expreſs orders to ſpare the troops, and not expoſe them wantonly to dangers. About this time the emperor received certain intelligence, that Julian had already made himſelf maſter of Illyricum, and the important paſs ſeparating that country from Thrace. He was thunderſtruck with this news; but the very next day, an expreſs arrived from his generals on the banks of the Tigris, aſſuring him, that Sapor, frightened by unlucky omens, was marched back to his own dominions with his whole army. Conſtantius, overjoyed at theſe tidings, immediately left Meſopotamia, and returned to Antioch, with a deſign to march without delay againſt Julian, being encouraged thereunto by his army, who declared with one voice, that they were ready to ſacrifice their lives in ſo good and honourable a cauſe. In the mean time, he diſpatched Arbetio with a ſtrong detachment to the ſtreights of Sucidava, where Julian was aſſembling his forces in order to invade Thrace, and followed him in perſon with the reſt of his army about the latter end of the autumn. Upon his arrival at Tarſus in Cilicia, he was ſeized with a feveriſh diſtemper, occaſioned chiefly by the uneaſineſs and perplexity of his mind; but believing he might get the better of it by motion and exerciſe, he purſued his march to Mopſucrene, on the borders of Cilicia, at the foot of mount Taurus, where, by the violence of his diſtemper, which encreaſed daily, he was obliged to ſtop. In that place, all remedies proving ineffectual, he died on the third of November, being then in the forty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæſar, but only the twenty-fifth ſince the death of his father [d]. It was commonly ſaid, and believed at leaſt by the chriſtians, that Julian had, with the promiſe of a great reward, ſeduced one of his courtiers, whom they do not name, to adminiſter him poiſon, of which he died [e]. Be that as it will, Julian no ſooner received the news of his death, than he left Illyricum, and on the eleventh of December arrived at Conſtantinople, whither he cauſed the corſe of the deceaſed prince to be brought by Jovian, afterwards emperor, and ordered it to be interred with the uſual ſolemnity in the church of the Apoſtles [f]. Julian himſelf aſſiſted at the ceremony in his purple robes, but without the other badges

The emperor marries Fauſtina.

[a] Ammian. p. 190. Lib. or. xi. p. 254. Zoſ. p. 122. [b] Ammian p. 191—195. [c] Idem, l. xxi. p. 185. Cange Byz. fam. p. 48.

The Perſians retire.

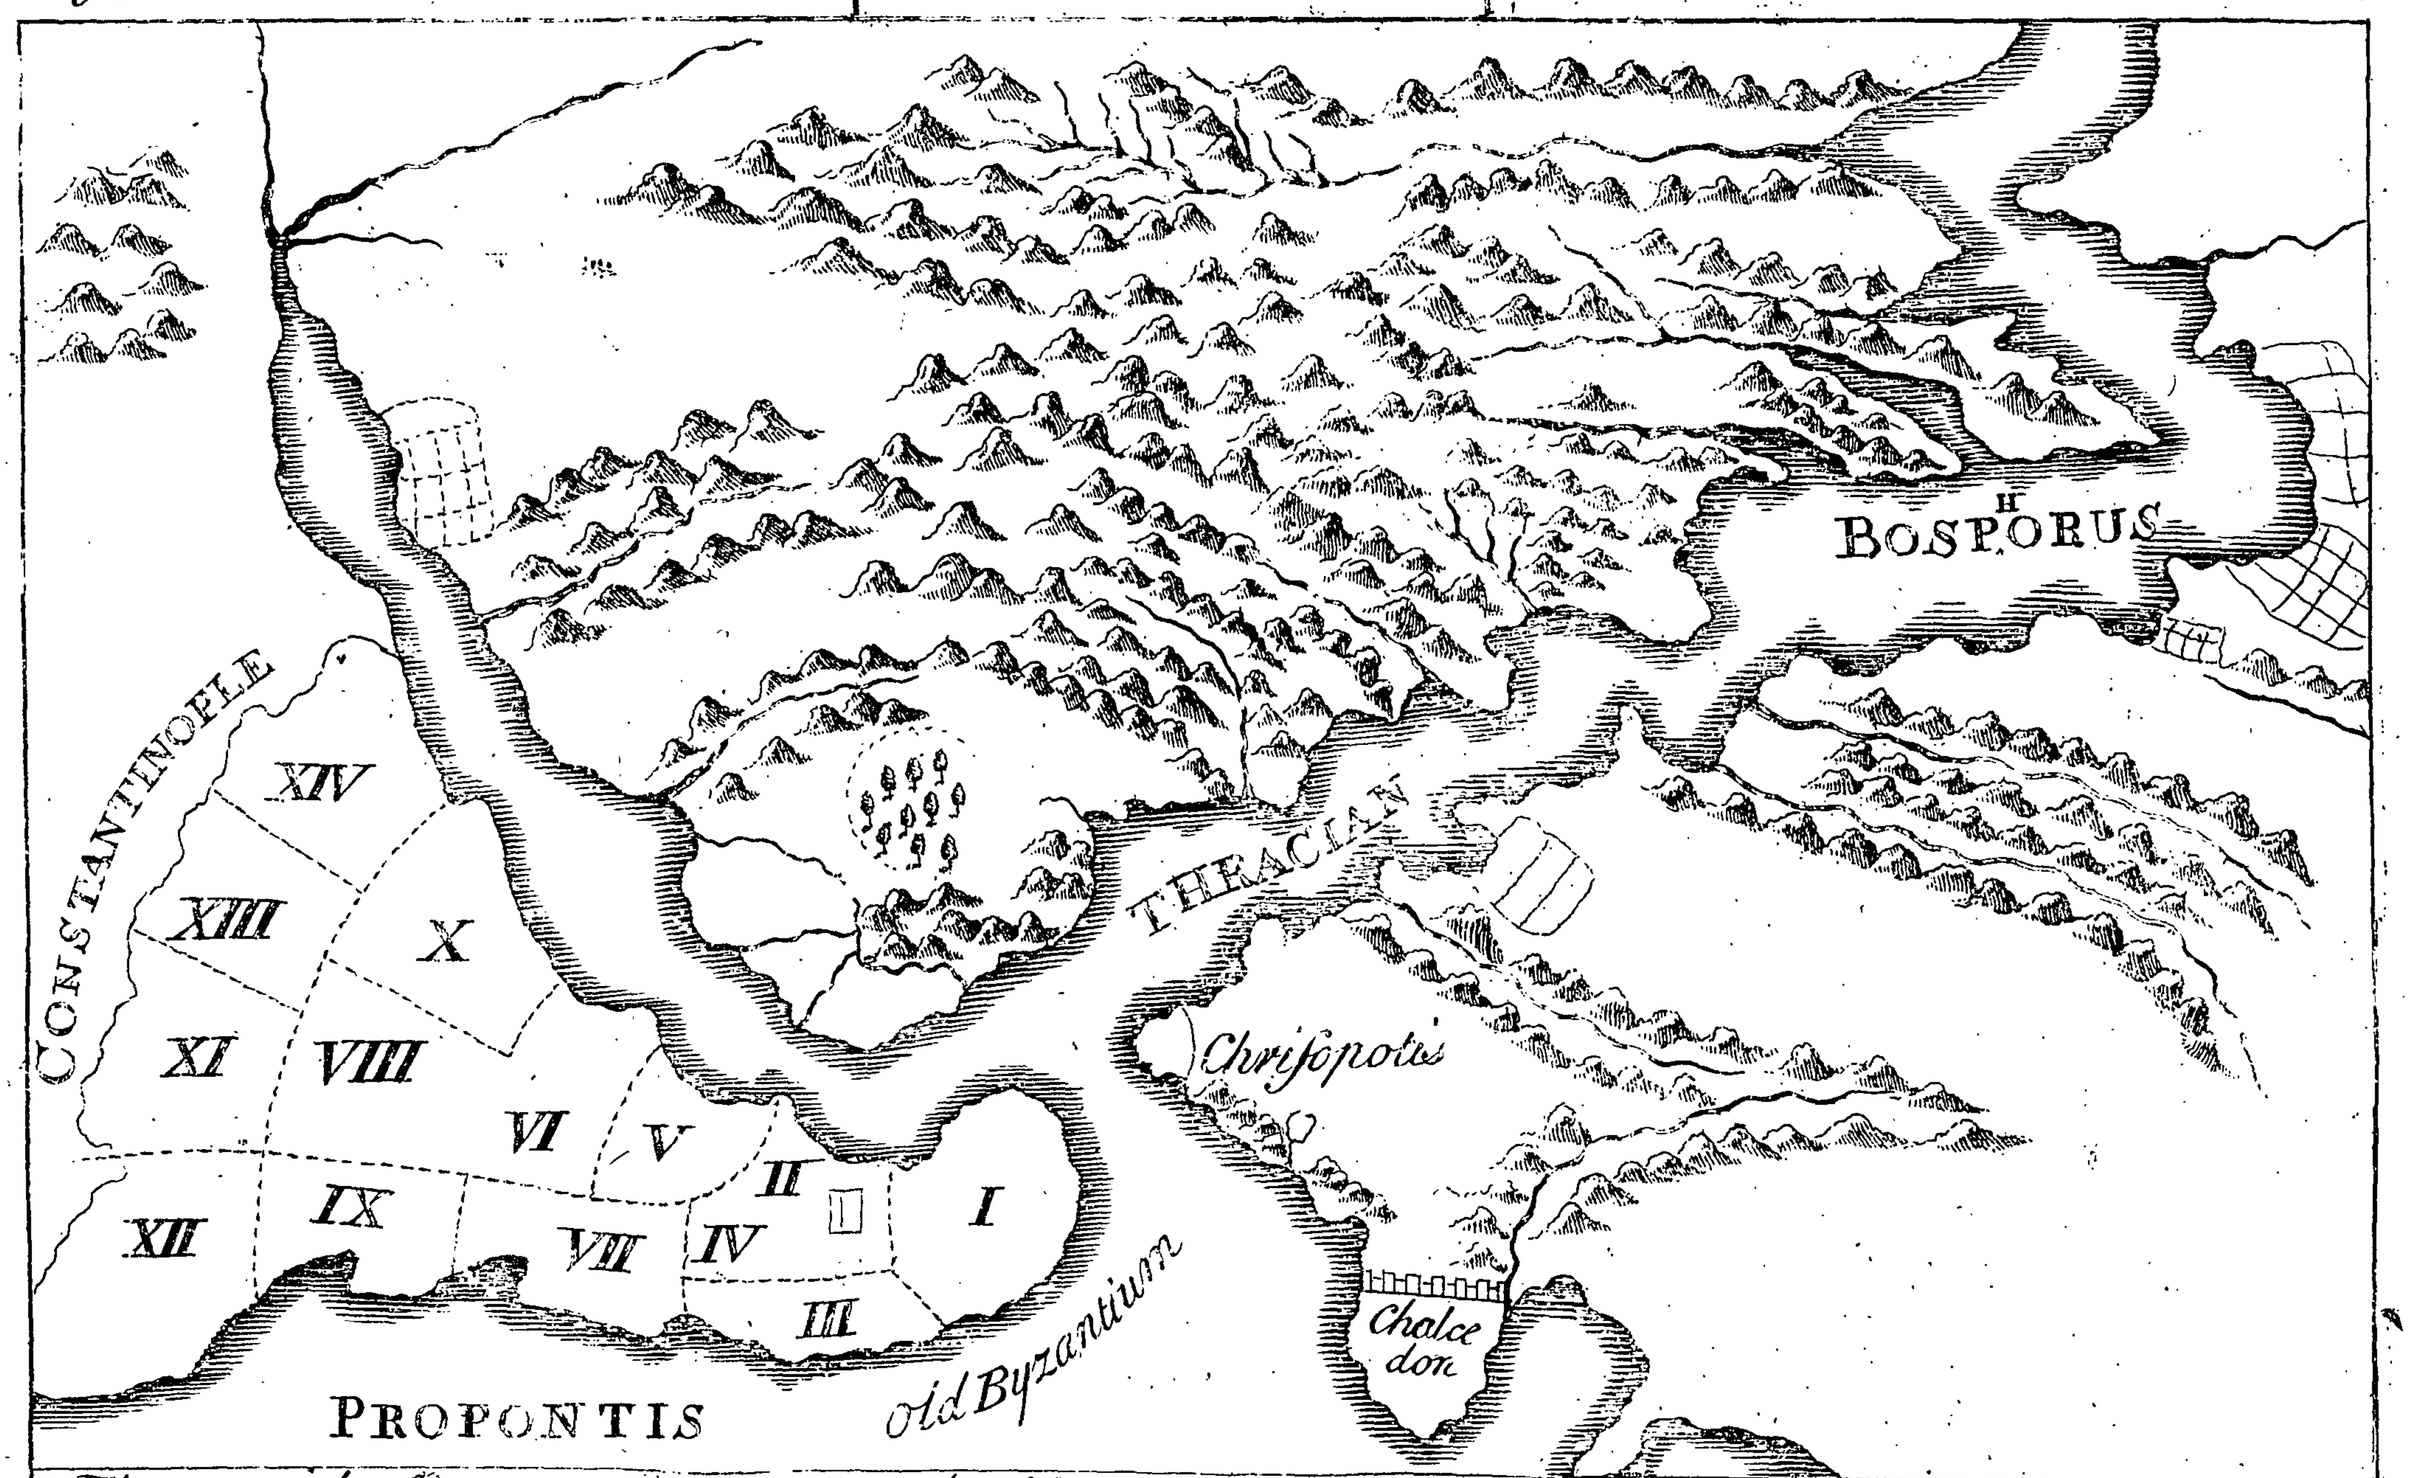
The emperor marches againſt Julian, but dies at Mopſucrene.

[d] Ammian. p. 196. Zon. p. 19. Socr. l. ii. c. 47. [e] Greg. Naz. or. iii. p. 68. [f] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 205. Socr. l. iii. c. i. p. 168. Panegyr. xi. p. 213.

badges of his dignity [g]. Gregory Nazianzen writes, that at the point of death Conſtantius betrayed great concern chiefly for three things; which were, his having murdered his neareſt relations, his having raiſed Julian to the dignity of Cæſar, and his having perſecuted, at the inſtigation of the Arians, the orthodox chriſtians [h]. On the other hand, Ammianus tells us, that he was ſaid to have named Julian for his ſucceſſor. We can ſcarce believe, that he repented his having perſecuted the church, though Gregory Nazianzen and, after him, Theodoret [i] affirm it, ſince Athanaſius aſſures us, that he held the impious tenets of the Arians to his laſt breath, and received baptiſm a little before he expired at the hands of the biſhop Euzoius, a moſt obſtinate Arian [k]. Socrates writes, that he was baptized by Euzoius at Antioch before he ſet out for Cilicia; and truly Euzoius was the Arian biſhop of that metropolis [l]. But Philoſtorgius tells us, that he received baptiſm at Mopſucrene, when he was already at the point of death *; wherein he is followed by the chronicle of Alexandria [m], which adds, that he ſent for Euzoius from Antioch. As for his character, all the antients, whether chriſtians or pagans, paint him as a weak and vain prince: he was entirely governed by the eunuchs of the court, eſpecially by his chamberlain Euſebius, over whom, however, he had, ſays Ammianus pleaſantly, ſome ſmall authority [n]. He admitted none to his confidence, but ſuch as were ſkilled in the art of flattery; whence he had no true friends about him, but ſuch only as, by approving and commending all his meaſures, ſtudied to gain his favour and raiſe themſelves. He uſed to aſcribe to himſelf the whole glory of victories gained by his officers, and ſpeak of them as if he had fought in perſon at the head of the victorious army. The chriſtian writers, both Arian and orthodox, complain of his aſſuming to himſelf, too much in eccleſiaſtic matters. Under him employments were not given to the moſt deſerving men, but to ſuch only as were beſt able to purchaſe them of the eunuchs, and other favourites; whence the unhappy people in the provinces were miſerably oppreſſed by their governors, who made it their chief buſineſs to repay themſelves, at their expence, the ſums which they had diſburſed, and to heap up money wherewithal to purchaſe other more profitable employments. He was ſo jealous of his his authority, and of ſuch a timorous and ſuſpicious temper, that, upon the leaſt appearance of a plot, he put numbers of perſons to death, frequently confounding the innocent with the guilty, though accuſed by perſons altogether unworthy of credit. By this means the infamous tribe of informers encreaſed under him to ſuch a degree, that no man of fortune, however innocent, was ſafe . As he had no great genius or capacity himſelf, he hated all men of letters, and diſcountenanced every liberal art and ſcience ; whence only freed-men applied themſelves to the ſtudy of the law, and that of eloquence was entirely neglected: to be a great philoſopher was reckoned a crime, Conſtantius looking upon the philoſophers as magicians, againſt whom he enacted, as we have obſerved, moſt rigorous laws [o]. However, he founded and endowed a library at Conſtantinople, enriched it with a large collection of choice books, and appointed a perſon with a handſome ſalary to take care of it [p]. But among ſo many bad qualities, he had ſome good ones. In crimes of treaſon, real or only ſuſpected, he behaved like a tyrant, ſays Ammianus ; but in other reſpects was not a bad prince [r]. He was of a very low ſtature, ſays the ſame writer, but enured to all manner of fatigues, and performed the military exerciſes, eſpecially thoſe of the infantry, with wonderful addreſs [s]. He was ſatisfied with a frugal diet, ſlept little, was an utter ſtranger to luxury, and of ſuch chaſtity and temperance, as not to be even ſuſpected of thoſe vices which uſually reign in courts [t]. He is generally thought to have been the author of the law condemning thoſe to death who were found guilty of crimes againſt nature . He ſometimes performed the meaneſt duties of a ſoldier, but at the ſame time knew how to maintain the grandeur and majeſty of his ſtation [u]. He deſpiſed all manner of popularity, which Ammianus aſcribes to a greatneſs of mind worthy of a prince, but perhaps ironically ; for elſewhere he derides his affected gravity, telling us, that he appeared in public like a ſtatue, without moving his head or hands, without ſpitting or blowing his noſe, (to theſe particulars that writer deſcends) leſt he ſhould by ſuch vulgar actions degrade the majeſty and grandeur of an emperor [x].

Is baptized at the point of death by an Arian biſhop.



His character.

[g] Liban. or. xii. p. 289. [h] Greg. Naz. or. xxi. p. 389. [i] Theodor. l. iii. p. 637. [k] Ath. de ſyn. p. 907. [l] Socrat. l. ii. c. 47. p. 161. * Philoſt. l. vi. c. 6. p. 85. [m] Chron. Alex. p. 684. [n] Ammian. l. xviii. p. 119.

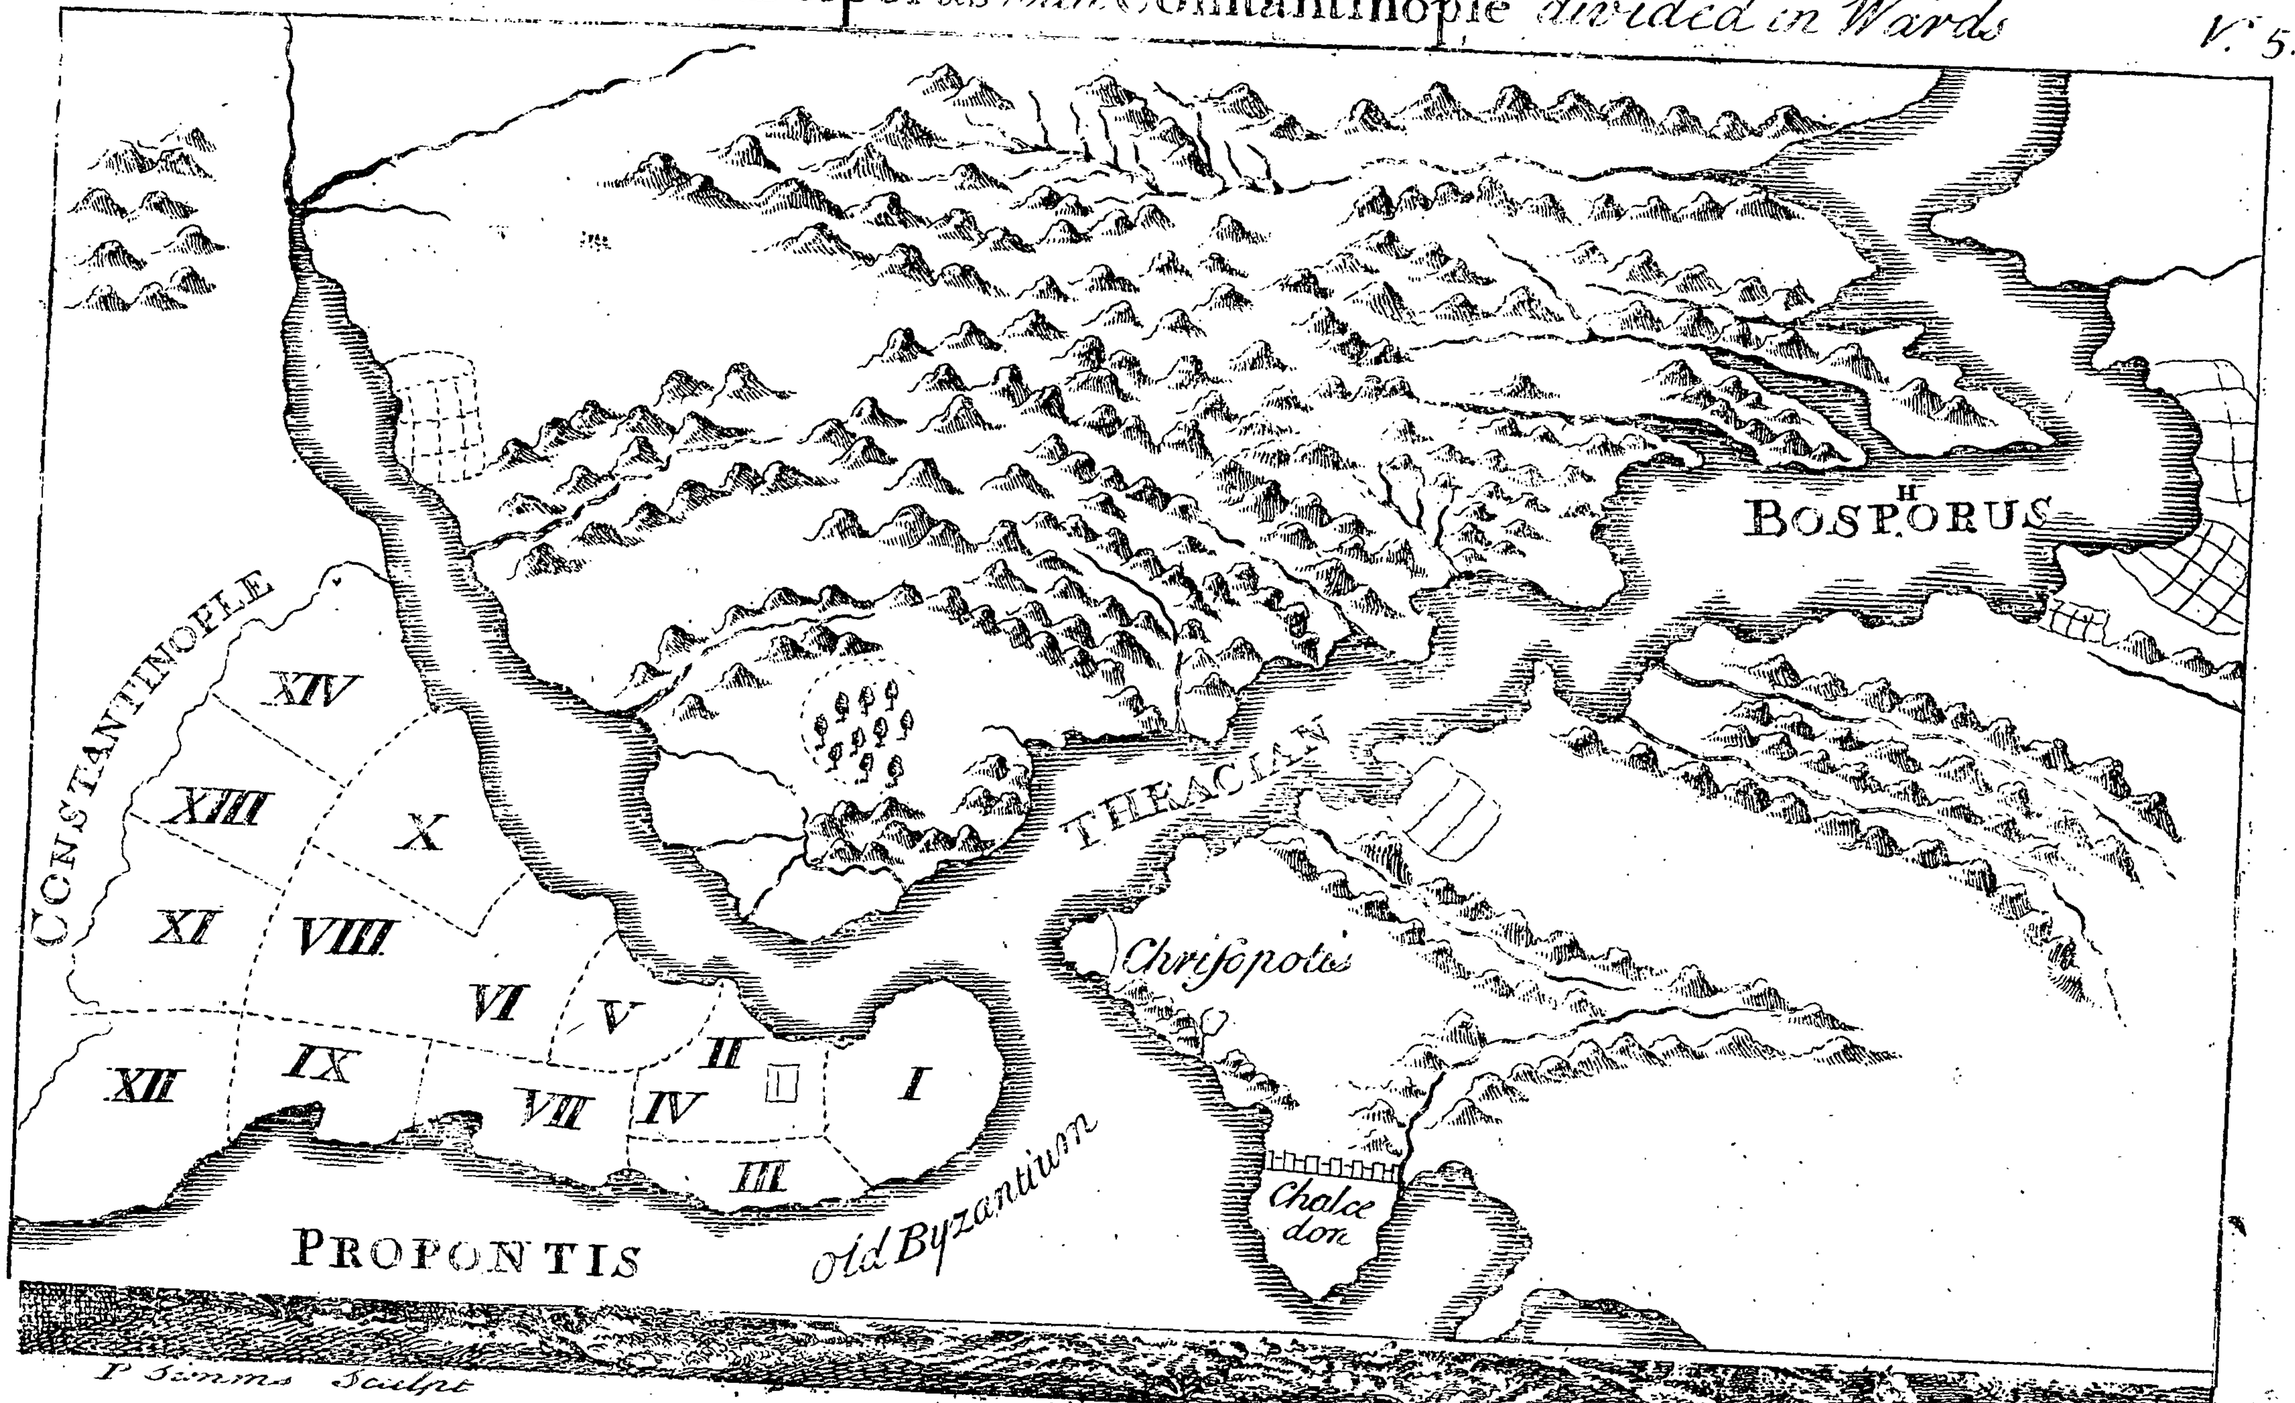
Though

[o] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 203. Liban. or. xxviii. p. 591. [p] Liban. ibid. Eutrop. l. xv. p. 44. [q] Themiſt. or. iii. p. 45. [r] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 21, 22. [s] Idem ibid. p. 203. [t] Idem ibid. p. 201. & l. xvi. p. 70. Themiſt. or. i. p. 39. Vict. epit. [u] Cod. Theodoſ. ix. tit. 7. leg. 3. p. 59. [w] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 200. [x] Idem, l. xvi. p. 70.



The Outside Prospect of the Church of Sancta Sophia from Du Fresne Lib 3 Pag. 1

The whole view of the Church of Sancta Sophia from Du Fresne Lib. 3. Pag. 5

The Thracian Bosporus with Constantinople divided in Wards

Though he had no genius either for poetry or eloquence, yet he was not quite unacquainted with polite literature [y]; but of this his ſpeeches, which we read in Ammianus, are no proof, ſince they, as we may well imagine, were compoſed by that hiſtorian. Aurelius Victor and Eutropius commend him for the great reſpect he always ſhewed to his father, for his extraordinary modeſty, and for rewarding, with uncommon generoſity, every ſervice done him [z]. Themiſtius extols his magnificence, and obſerves, that he enriched all his friends [a]. He finiſhed the walls of Conſtantinople, begun by his father; repaired, at a great expence, many of the buildings there; and embelliſhed the city with fountains, baths, and other ſtately edifices [b]. His panegyriſts ſpeak of him as a prince of great moderation, and inclined to mercy; but Julian tells us, that he was an utter ſtranger to all mercy and compaſſion, though he was commonly thought to be poſſeſſed of both theſe virtues [c]. Crimes of treaſon he puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity, ſays Libanius [d]; but bore with great patience, and was ready to forgive, upon the leaſt ſubmiſſion, all other affronts and injuries offered him. To confirm this, he tells us, that the inhabitants of Edeſſa having pulled down one of his ſtatues, and publicly whipt it, adding, that he who deſerved to be thus treated, was not fit to govern, the emperor, when informed of the inſult, did not betray the leaſt reſentment, nor ever ſhewed the leaſt ill-will to that city, or the authors of ſuch an outrage, which few princes would have ſuffered to go unpuniſhed [e]. He was a moſt zealous promoter of the chriſtian religion, and enacted ſeveral laws, of which we have taken notice in the hiſtory of his reign, for the utter ſuppreſſion of idolatry. He built a great number of churches, and among the reſt the famous cathedral of Emeſa in Syria, and the great church of Alexandria, called Cæſarea. As for that of St. Sophia in Conſtantinople, it was the work of Conſtantine, though commonly aſcribed to his ſon Conſtantius [f]. He not only built, but endowed and enriched, many churches with great revenues, and ſhewed, on all occaſions, an extraordinary reſpect and eſteem for the clergy, eſpecially the biſhops, receiving their bleſſing in an humble poſture, entertaining them at his table, exempting them from all all manner of impoſts and taxes, &c [g]. But theſe favours he beſtowed on thoſe alone who profeſſed the doctrine of Arius. As for the orthodox biſhops, they were driven from their ſees, and either baniſhed, or impriſoned; nay, ſome of them were, by the authority or connivance of the emperor, put to death. But to give an account of this perſecution is not our province, but that of the eccleſiaſtic writers. Of the authors who flouriſhed under Conſtantius, we ſhall ſpeak in note (G).

[y] Aur. Vict. p. 87. [z] Idem ibid. & Eutrop. p. 183. [a] Themiſt. or iv. p. 62. [b] Idem ibid. p. 58. [c] Julian. epiſt. 23. p. 141. [d] Liban. orat xiv. p. 399. [e] Idem ibid. p. 400. [f] Socrat. p. 94. Cange urb. Conſtantinop. deſcrip. p. 144, 145.

BEFORE

[g] Hilar. contra Conſtant. or. p. 113, 114.

(G) Among the men of learning who flouriſhed under Conſtantius, St. Jerom mentions Gennadius, Petrus, Victorinus, Minervius, Alcimus, Delphidius, and Donatus (1). All we know of the two firſt, is, that they were both celebrated lawyers; that the former lived at Rome, and the latter at Saragoſa in Spain (2). Of Victorinus we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Tiberius Victor Minervius taught eloquence at Conſtantinople, at Rome about the year 353, and at Bourdeaux, the place of his nativity (3). He is highly commended by Auſonius, who is proud of having ſtudied under him (4). Alethius Minervius, his ſon, was likewiſe profeſſor of eloquence in the ſame city; but died when he was yet very young (5). Latinus Alethius Alcimus was a native of the Agenois, or territory of Agen, and is by Auſonius counted among the profeſſors of Bourdeaux (6); but he was likewiſe a pleader, and is commended by Apollinaris Sidonius for his knowledge of the law, and his extraordinary ſkill in the Greek and Latin tongues (7). He publiſhed ſome works, in which he commended the emperor Julian, and Salluſt, who was prefect of Gaul under that prince (8); but none of them have reached our times. Auſonius, who had a great value for him, commends his modeſty, the mildneſs of his temper, his gravity, and the regularity of his life (9). Atticus Tyro Delphidius, the ſon of the orator Patera, or Paterius, of whom we have ſpoken in our laſt note, acquired great reputation by his poems (10). As he was by profeſſion a pleader, he accuſed of extortion before Julian in 358, Numerius governor of Narbonne Gaul; but could not make good the charge (11). He

(1) Hier. chron. (2) Idem ibid. (3) Idem ibid. & Auſon. de profeſſ. Burdical. carm. 1. p. 137. (4) Auſon. ibid. carm. 6. p. 150. (5) Hier. chron. p. 254. (6) Auſon. ibid. carm. 2. p. 141. (7) Sidon. l. viii. epiſt. 11. p. 232. (8) Idem. ibid. (9) Auſon. ibid. (10) Idem ibid. carm. 5. p. 147. (11) Ammian. l. xviii. p. 114.

He embraced the party of a tyrant, hoping by that means to make his fortune; but, without the tears of his father, he had been utterly undone (12). This tyrant can be no other than Procopius, who revolted from the emperor Valens in 365. Afterwards he taught rhetoric at Bourdeaux with great reputation (13), but in the reign of Valentinian, and not of Conſtantius, if what Sulpicius Severus writes be true, viz. that dying about the age of forty, he had not the diſpleaſure to ſee his daughter Procula ſeduced by the Priſcillianiſts in 380, and his wife Eucrocia, who had embraced the ſame hereſy, beheaded about the year 384 (14). St. Jerom writes, that while he was yet very young, he was famous all over Gaul for his compoſitions both in verſe and proſe (15). Ammianus Marcellinus (16) and Apollinaris Sidonius (17) commend his lively and flowing eloquence. Though we might infer from what we have quoted above out of Sulpicius Severus, that he was a chriſtian, yet St. Jerom, in writing to Hedibia deſcended from him, ſpeaks of him as a pagan (18). Donatus, under whom St. Jerom ſtudied, taught grammar at Rome with great reputation in 354, wrote comments on Terence and Virgil, and publiſhed ſeveral grammatical pieces, often quoted by Caſſiodorus, who judged them more proper for children, than any thing written by other grammarians (19). Gregory the great ſpeaks of the rules of Donatus, as generally taught at the end of the ſixth century (20). Some grammatical pieces, explaining with great clearneſs the firſt principles, have reached us, under the name of Ælius Donatus (21). There are ſtill extant comments on Virgil and Terence, which ſome pretend to be thoſe which St. Jerom aſcribes to his maſter Donatus; but critics of more penetration are of opinion, that tho' ſome obſervations on the comments of Virgil ſeem worthy of Donatus, yet the whole is altogether unworthy of a man of his parts (22). As for the comments on Terence, they are thought to have been written by one Evanthius, called by ſome Eugraphus, who died in the firſt year of Gratian's reign, or in 359, under Conſtantius, as we read in the chronicle of St. Jerom, who calls him the moſt learned among the grammarians (23). He taught the Latin tongue at Conſtantinople, and, upon his death, Chreſtus was ſent for out of Africa to ſucceed him (24). The life of Virgil, aſcribed by ſome to Donatus, is, in (12) Auſon. car. 5. p. 148. (13) Idem ibid. p. 149, (14) Sulp. Sever. l. ii. p. 173, 177. & Proſp. chron. (15) Hier. epiſt. 150. p. 140. (16) Ammian. ibid. (17) Apol. Sid. l. v. epiſt. 10. p. 140. (18) Hier. epiſt. 150. p. 140. (19) Hier. in Ruf. l. i. c. 4. p. 202. Caſſiod. de orthogr. p. 255, 256. (20) Greg. moral. p. 62. (21) Vide Baillet. gram. c. 622. p. 37, 38. (22) Idem, p. 29, 30. (23) Hier. chron. (24) Idem ibid. & Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. 743.

in the opinion of Voſſius, a very mean performance, done not by Ælius Donatus, which he takes to be the name of the grammarian, under whom St. Jerom ſtudied, but by one Tiberius Claudius Donatus (25). As for the life of Terentius, he takes it to have been written by Suetonius, and not Donatus (26). Nonius Marcellus, another celebrated grammarian, lived, as is ſuppoſed, about the time of Conſtantius, and was, as we gather from the title of his work, on the propriety of Latin words, a native of Tivoli, and Peripatetic philoſopher (27). He is quoted and commended by Priſcian; which ſeems very ſtrange to Voſſius, who ſpeaks of him with great contempt, and thinks him commendable for no other reaſon, but becauſe he has conveyed to us ſeveral paſſages out of the antients, which are to be found no-where elſe (28). The works of Sex. Pompeius Feſtus bear a much better character than thoſe of Marcellus. He wrote on the ſignification of words; but his work, which was only an abridgment of what Verrius Flaccus had written on that ſubject, in the time of Auguſtus, was abridged in the time of Charlemagne by Paulus Diaconus; and to this abridgment is owing the loſs of the far greater part of that which was done by Feſtus (29). At what time Feſtus lived, we are no-where told. Some manuſcripts have reached our time on the art of ſurveying or meaſuring land, done by one Innocentius, probably the ſurveyor of that name, who, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, was at the court of Conſtantius, in 359 (30). To him are likewiſe aſcribed ſome remarks on the Roman laws, which, in our opinion, were rather the work of Innocentius the quæſtor, who drew up moſt of the laws of Conſtantius, as Eunapius informs us (31), and publiſhed ſeveral works both in Greek and Latin. The latter was grandfather to Chryſanthus, under whom Eunapius ſtudied, and conſequently was more antient than the ſurveyor, and ſuperior to him in rank (32). One of Conſtantius's officers, by name Innocentius, took holy orders, and, retiring from the court, led a ſolitary life on the Mount of olives (33). Vindanius Anatolius, a native of Berytus, wrote ten books on agriculture, containing many uſeful rules, blended with ſome ſuperſtitious and heatheniſh obſervations (34). Part of that work has reached our times; but the author is there ſtyled Vindamonius, and not Vindanius. One Anatolius, a pagan, and a native of Berytus, was a prefect of Illyricum in 349, and 359, (35), and died in 360 (36). He was perhaps the author

(25) Idem ibid. p. 743. & orat. l. vi. c. 2. p. 432. (26) Idem ibid. (27) Vide Baillet. c. 620. p. 34. & Salmaſ. in not. in Spart. p. 241. (28) Voſſ. ibid. (29) Vide Baillet. p. 30, 35. (30) Ammian. l. xix. p. 149. (31) Eunap. c. 21. p. 144, 145. (32) Idem ibid. (33) Pallad. hiſt. Lauſiac. c. 103. p. 1022. (34) Phot. c. 163. p. 349. (35) Eunap. c. 1. p. 117. (36) Ammian. l. xix. p. 166. & l. xxi. p. 185.

thor of the above-mentioned work. One Andronicus was concerned in the affair of Parnaſus, governor of Egypt, accuſed in 359, of having conſulted the aſtrologers, as we related among the other tranſactions of that year; but Andronicus was abſolved, and afterwards became famous, eſpecially on account of his poetical compoſitions (37). Libanius ſpeaks of a poet, by name Andronicus, who, he ſays, charmed all Egypt, and was ſtill alive in 378 (38). Themiſtius, who was contemporary with Libanius, mentions a young Egyptian, who had a particular talent for writing tragedies (39); and Photius takes notice of ſeveral theatrical pieces written by one Andronicus, ſenator of the city of Hermopolis in Egypt, ſome of which were inſcribed to count Phœbammon of Cynopolis in the ſame country (40). Whether all theſe writers ſpeak of one and the ſame perſon, we will not take upon us to determine. Sextus Aurelius Victor may be ranked among the writers who flouriſhed under Conſtantius, tho' he died long after him, ſince, in his reign, he wrote his hiſtory of the Roman emperors. He is commonly thought to have been a native of Africa, and to have been born of poor parents in ſome village of that country (41). He was, at leaſt when he wrote his hiſtory, a pagan, as muſt evidently appear to all who peruſe it. It begins with Auguſtus, and extends to the twenty-third year of Conſtantius; that is, to the end of the year 359, or the beginning of 360 (42); for he ſpeaks of the victories gained by Julian in Gaul; but takes no notice of his aſſuming the title of Auguſtus, which he would not have omitted, had his hiſtory reached ſo far. He aſcribes all the conqueſts of that prince to Conſtantius, at that time the object of his flattery (43). In the title, the work is ſaid to extend to the tenth conſulſhip of Conſtantius, and the third of Julian, which happened in the year 360. This hiſtory is but a very conciſe abridgment. Another abridgment, done by the ſame writer, has reached our times, comprehending the lives of illuſtrious men, moſtly Romans, from Procas to Julius Cæſar. This work is, by different writers, aſcribed to Cornelius Nepos, to Pliny the younger, to Æmilius Probus, to Tacitus, and to Suetonius; but Voſſius, and other able critics, adjudge it to Aurelius Victor (44). To theſe two hiſtories is prefixed a third, on the origin of the Romans, which likewiſe paſſes under the name of Sextus Aurelius Victor, and is thought by Andreas Scotus to have really been done by him; but Voſſius takes it to be the work of ſome writer, who flouriſhed after his time (45). Another hiſtory of the emperors, extending to the reign of Theodoſius, goes under the name of one Sextus Aurelius Victor, whom we muſt diſtinguiſh from the author we are now ſpeaking of. Ammianus writes, that Julian, while he was at Sirmium, in 361, ſaw there Victor the hiſtoriographer, and ſoon after created him governor of Second Pannonia, and honoured him with a ſtatue of braſs (46). The ſame writer adds, that he was generally eſteemed on account of his wiſdom, and was afterwards raiſed to the government of Rome. Voſſius and others take this to be the hiſtorian of whom we are now ſpeaking; for he had ended his hiſtory the year before, as we have obſerved above (47). One Victor was conſul in 369, whom Onuphrius ſuppoſes to have been the hiſtorian mentioned by Ammianus (48); but, had it been the ſame perſon, Ammianus would, in our opinion, have taken notice of his conſulſhip, as well as his government. In an inſcription of the time of Theodoſius, that is, long after the year 369, he is ſtyled governor of Rome, but not conſul; which title would not have been omitted, had he ever diſcharged that office. Beſides, it appears from Themiſtius (49), that Victor, who was conſul in 369, was a commander of great proweſs and renown. Gothofredus publiſhed in 1628, an antient deſcription of the world, as he ſtyles it, done in the time of Conſtantius, and not of Conſtantine, as we read in the text, after that prince had finiſhed the port of Seleucia, and after the earthquake which overturned the city of Duras (50). The port of Seleucia was perfected, according to St. Jerom, in 346, and the earthquake happened in 345. The author takes no notice of the earthquake that ruined Nicomedia in 358, nor of that which overturned Berytus in 348, or rather 349, whence Gothofredus concludes that work to have been done about the year 347. He thinks the author inſinuates, that there were then two emperors; and infers from thence, that he wrote after the death of young Conſtantine in 340, and before that of Conſtans in 350 (51). Gothofredus, in publiſhing this work, not only reformed the barbarous and uncouth language of the Latin text, and corrected the many faults he found in it, but added to it a Greek tranſlation, ſuppoſing it to have been written originally in that language (52); which ſuppoſition is rejected by Petavius, as falſe and groundleſs. However that be, the author ſeems to have been better acquainted with the eaſtern than the weſtern provinces. He was greatly miſtaken in ſuppoſing Rome and Hetruria to have been compriſed in what was at that time called Italy (53). Gothofredus is inclined to believe one Alypius of Antioch, famous in Julian's time, to have been the true author of this work; becauſe that prince commends the geography, which had been ſent to him by Alypius, the

(37) Idem, l. xix. p. 152. (38) Liban. vit. p. 158. (39) Vide Ammian. ibid. p. 230. (40) Phot. c. 279. p. 1596. (41) Voſſ. hiſt. Lat. p. 196. (42) Aur. Vict. p. 528. & 517. Caſaubon. not. in Spart. p. 119. Voſſ. ibid. (43) Aur. Vict. p. 486. (44) Voſſ. ibid. (45) Idem ibid. p. 196.

(46) Amnian. l. xxi. p. 190. (47) Voſſ. ibid. p. 196. (48) Onuph. p. 298. (49) Themiſt. orat. ix. p. 121. (50) Gothofred. vetus orb. deſcrip. p. 13. & 33. (51) Idem, p. 13, 14. (52) Idem, p. 7. (53) Idem, p. 33.

the brother of Cæſarius (54). But this geography ſeems only to have been a map, accompanied with ſome verſes. The author gives us a tolerable account of ſeveral cities, tho' for the moſt part, blended with many fables; which evidently ſhew him to have been a pagan, though he acknowledged a God the author of mankind (55). The beginning of the work beſpeaks it imperfect (56); and beſides, it is plain, that he had written ſeveral things relating to the Perſians, which have not reached us (57); whence Gothofredus concludes this to be only a ſmall part of a much larger work (58). Voſſius was altogether unacquainted with this writer. None of the authors we have hitherto mentioned were chriſtians; but Julius Firmicus Maternus, who flouriſhed at the ſame time, was not only a chriſtian, but a zealous defender of the religion he profeſſed; for he addreſſed a work to the two emperors, Conſtantius and Conſtans, animating them to complete the deſtruction of idolatry. This work is intituled, the errors and falſhood of profane religions (59). The author not only expoſes the abſurd notions of the pagans, but explains, with great elegance and erudition, ſeveral articles of the chriſtian faith. He wrote before the year 350, in which Conſtans died, and in or after the year 343, for he ſpeaks of his journey to Britain, which happened that year (60). Though the antients ſeem to have been quite unacquainted with this work, yet no writer, we know of, has ever queſtioned its being genuine. The author is diſtinguiſhed, in the title of the work, with the epithet of clariſſimus, which was peculiar to the ſenators of Rome, and ſufficiently confutes the opinion of Baronius, who will have him to have been biſhop of Milan (61). Eight books on judicial aſtrology were publiſhed about the ſame time by one Julius Firmicus Maternus, who was likewiſe a Roman ſenator, and is therefore by ſome writers confounded with the above-mentioned author (62); but Poſſevinus maintains them to be two different writers (63): and truly the aſtrologer is ſtyled, in the title of his work, Julius Firmicus Maternus junior; and the work itſelf is altogether unworthy of a chriſtian. It is addreſſed to Mavortius Lollianus, and was begun in the reign of Conſtantine the Great, but finiſhed in that of his ſon Conſtantius, about the year 355 (64). With the year 354, the ſeventeenth of Conſtantius's reign, end two ſmall works, publiſhed by Bucherius in 1633, with the paſchal cycle of Victorius. Bucherius is of opinion, that they were compoſed that very year, and by the ſame author, to whom he aſcribes three others contained in the ſame manuſcript (65). The firſt of theſe works is a liſt of the conſuls from 205, to 354, with the epacts, biſſextile years, and the day of the week with which each year began. There are ſome miſtakes in the epacts; but the reſt is done with great exactneſs (66). The manuſcript, which Bucherius made uſe of, was imperfect; but cardinal Noris having diſcovered an entire copy in the emperor's library, containing a liſt of the conſuls, from the two firſt, Brutus and Collatinus, to thoſe of the year 354, he publiſhed it in 1689, with a learned diſſertation on that work, by him greatly eſteemed (67). He is of opinion, that it was compoſed in 354, the year with which it ends (68). The ſecond work publiſhed by Bucherius, is another liſt of the conſuls and governors of Rome, from 254, to 354. From the year 288, to the end, the author not only names the governors, but the day on which each of them entered upon his office (69). The third begins with a ſhort necrology of the biſhops of Rome, in which are marked, according to the order of the months, the day on which each of them died, and the place where he was buried. It begins with Lucius, and ends with Julius. In this liſt, Sextus II, and Marcellus are omitted; the latter probably by a miſtake of the tranſcriber, confounding him with his predeceſſor Marcellinus; and the former perhaps, becauſe he is ſet down in the calender of martyrs annexed to the necrology, and containing the names of ſeveral martyrs according to the order of the months, and the time of their martyrdom; but they are all of Rome, except St. Cyprian, and the famous martyrs of Africa, Perpetua and Felicitas (70). The fourth work for which we are indebted to Bucherius, is another catalogue of the biſhops of Rome, which ends with Liberius, who ſucceeded Julius, the laſt in the former liſt. As the election of Liberius is marked, and not his death, we may ſuppoſe this catalogue to have been written in his time. It is exceeding exact from Pontianus to the end; but full of miſtakes till his time. Anicetus, Eleutherius, and Zephyrinus, are omitted (71). The fourth work begins with the birth-days of the emperors, or the days of their acceſſion to the empire, according to the order of the months. The laſt emperor mentioned there is Conſtantius, who is not ſtyled, as the others, divus, but dominus; a convincing proof, that he was ſtill living (72). This work contains likewiſe ſome verſes, and a calendar of the ſports, and other profane, and even idolatrous ſolemnities; but from the author's marking the dominical letters, we may conclude him to have been a chriſtian. The work

(54) Julian. epiſt. 30. p. 163. Gothofred. p. 10, 11. (55) Idem, p. 9. (56) Idem, p. 3. (57) Idem, p. 9. (58) Idem, p. 3. & 8. (59) Firm. Matern. c. 21. Bibl. patr. tom. 4. p. 99. (60) Du Pin. tom. 1. p. 578, 579. Poſſevin. aper. tom. 1. p. 989. Matern. c. 29. p. 107. (61) Baron. ad ann. 337. (62) Vide Du Pin. p. 577. (63) Poſſevin. p. 988. (64) Du Pin. ibid.

(65) Buch. cycl. p. 245, 247. (66) Idem, p. 247—251. (67) Noris faſt. conſular. (68) Idem, p. 23. (69) Buch. p. 236, 241, 244. (70) Idem. p. 268, 269. (71) Idem p. 269—273. (72) Idem. p. 276, &c.

BEFORE we proceed to the hiſtory of Julian's reign, it will not be foreign to our purpoſe to give the reader a ſuccinct account of the birth, parentage, education, and ſtudies of a prince ſo much ſpoken of by the eccleſiaſtic writers. Julius Conſtantius, the brother of Conſtantine the Great, had two wives, viz. Galla, by whom he had Gallus Cæſar, and other children, whoſe names are not known, and Baſilina, deſcended of an illuſtrious family, being the daughter of one Julian, who was prefect, and the ſiſter of another, who was count of the eaſt. The ſurname of Anicius was common to both, and the Anician family was one of the moſt illuſtrious in Rome [h]. Perhaps Baſilina was the daughter of Anicius Julianus, who was conſul in 322, and afterwards governor of Rome. She profeſſed the chriſtian religion [i]; but ſeems to have been tainted with the doctrine of Arius; for ſhe bore great hatred to Eutropius, the famous orthodox biſhop of Adrianople [k]. She was married at Conſtantinople, and died a few months after ſhe was delivered there of Julian, her only child [l]. He was born in 331, after the month of June; for writing againſt Athanaſius at the end of 362, he ſays, that he was then in the thirty-ſecond year of his age, which was not ended on the twenty-ſixth of June work is inſcribed to one Valentine, and is ſaid in the title to have been done by Furius Dionyſius Filoccalus (73). The months of March, April, May, and June, are wanting in the edition of Bucherius; but are to be found in Petavius's uranology, copied by him from Herwart (74). Du Cange will have the firſt author of the paſchal chronicle, or the chronicle of Alexandria, to have ended his work in the year 354, for it is manifeſt, that this work was done by different writers, the ſame thing being often repeated, and ſometimes related in a quite different manner. In ſome places the tenets of Arius are preached up, and in others condemned (75). As therefore Holſtenius found a manuſcript of this chronicle ending in the year 354, Du Cange aſcribes it to the firſt author, and what was afterwards added, to another, who not only continued the work to the time of Heraclius, but inſerted ſeveral things into the part which had been done by the other (76). But the taſk of examining this point, we are willing to leave to others.

Birth, education, and parentage of Julian.

[h] Ammian. l. xiv. p. 31. l. xxv. p. 291. Lib. orat. xii. p. 262. [i] Pallad. hiſt. lauſ. & vit. Chryſ. p. 126. [k] Athen. ſolit. p. 812. [l] Julian. ad Athen. p. 502. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 219.

(73) Idem. p. 275. (74) Petav. uranol. p. 114. (75) Chron. paſc. prim. p. 289—291. (76) Idem ibid.

June 363, when he died [m]. He was named Julian from his grandfather on the mother's ſide, and is ſtyled in all antient inſcriptions Julianus Flavius Claudius. He was of low ſtature, and a diſagreeable aſpect, which was beſides disfigured with a long beard, as he is repreſented in moſt of his medals; but at the ſame time well-ſhaped, very nimble, active, and of great addreſs at all ſorts of exerciſes [n]. As for his mind, he was endowed by nature with an extraordinary capacity, learned with ſurpriſing quickneſs, and never forgot what he had once known [o]; inſomuch, that thoſe, whoſe province it was to inſtruct him, though perſons eminent in every branch of learning, uſed to complain, that he too ſoon exhauſted their ſtock of knowledge [p]: hence he is by ſome writers equalled and by others preferred, to the greateſt men Greece ever produced [q]. However, he was far better acquainted with the Greek than the Latin tongue: in the former he came not ſhort of the beſt writers; but did not excel, according to Eunapius [r], in the latter. His eloquence was eaſy and flowing, and accompanied by a graceful delivery [s]. In his anſwers off-hand he diſplayed an uncommon penetration, vivacity, and preſence of mind, and, in the greateſt dangers, an undaunted courage and intrepidity [t]. But whether the ſolidity of his judgment was equal to the brightneſs of his genius, we ſhall leave the reader to judge from his actions. He was naturally of a mild and ſweet temper, had a violent thirſt after glory, was greatly attached to his own opinion, which he frequently preferred to the advice of his ableſt counſellors, and ſtrangely addicted to ſatire and raillery [u]. He was brought up at Conſtantinople till the death of his uncle Conſtantine, which was followed by the maſſacre of all his relations, in which were involved among the reſt the father and elder brother of Julian; but Julian himſelf was ſpared on account of his infancy, being then but ſix or ſeven years old, as was his brother Gallus, becauſe he happened to be at that time ill of a fever, and thought paſt recovery [w]. Some authors write, that Julian was conveyed away privately by Marcus biſhop of Arethuſa

[m] Lib. orat. xii. p. 262. Julian. miſop. p. 80, 81. & epiſt. 58. p. 214. [n] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 226. [o] Idem ibid. [p] Eunap. c. 5. p. 68. [q] Idem, p. 589. & Vict. epit. p. 545. [r] Eunap. ibid. [s] Idem ibid. [t] Ammian. l. xviii. p. 114. [u] Idem, l. xiv. p. 31. Eunap. c. 5. p. 68. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 169. [w] Julian. ad Athen. p. 497. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. Liban. orat. xii. p. 262.

Arethuſa in Syria, and concealed in a church [x]; others, that Conſtantius ordered both him and his brother to be ſpared [y]. Julian himſelf tells us, that the emperor at firſt ordered him to be murdered with the reſt of his relations; but afterwards contented himſelf with ſending him into baniſhment [z]. Conſtantius ſuffered Gallus to enjoy part of his father's eſtate, and reſtored to Julian the eſtates both of his mother and grandmother, which had been confiſcated [a]. Julian, at ſeven years old, was put under the tuition of an eunuch formerly belonging to his mother, named Mardonius, who diſcharged his truſt with great care, inſpiring him with an utter averſion to all manner of ſports and diverſions, and teaching him how to conquer his paſſions, and get the better of his evil inclinations [b]. The emperor afterwards committed the care of his education to Euſebius biſhop of Nicomedia, a leading man among the Arians [c], by whom he was brought up, partly at Nicomedia, and partly at an eſtate in Bithynia left him by his grandmother, where he planted with his own hands a vineyard. He took great delight in this place; but nevertheleſs gave it afterwards to one of his friends [d]. At the age of fourteen or fifteen, he was, by the emperor's orders, ſent with his brother Gallus, who had been all this time confined to his eſtate in Ionia, to a caſtle called Macella, in the neighbourhood of Cæſarea in Cappadocia. There they had a royal palace for their habitation, an handſome allowance, a noble court, and the beſt maſters to inſtruct them in all the ſciences; but at the ſame time were ſurrounded by the eunuchs of the court, and kept in a manner priſoners, no one being allowed, as Julian complains [e], to viſit them. In this exile or retreat they continued ſix years; that is, till the fifteenth of March 351, when Gallus was created Cæſar. The emperor's chief care was to appoint them ſuch maſters as were capable of inſpiring them with ſentiments of piety, and inſtructing them in the duties of the chriſtian religion, which they were taught to practiſe, by converſing only with perſons of religious and exemplary lives. They ſpent their time, ſays Sozomen, not in profane diverſions, but in reading, meditating, viſiting the churches, and the tombs of the holy martyrs [f]. They were even admitted to the office of readers, and read the holy ſcriptures in public, appearing no leſs

[x] Greg. Naz. orat. iii. p. 9. [y] Idem. ibid. p 58. [z] Julian. ad Athen. p. 498. [a] Idem. ibid. p. 502, 532. [b] Jul. miſopog. p. 80, 81. [c] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 219. [d] Julian. epiſt. 46. p. 199, 200. [e] Julian. ad Athen. p. 499. [f] Sozom. l. v. c. 2. p. 593.

leſs ſatisfied with that function, than if they had been diſcharging the higheſt office in the ſtate [g]: and truly Gallus acted therein with ſincerity, he being not only a true, but a moſt pious, chriſtian; but Julian only ſtudied, if Gregory Nazianzen is to be credited, to deceive the world with the maſk of piety, and conceal his wicked inclinations [h]. Both that writer and Ammianus Marcellinus aſſure us, that he was, from his infancy, inclined to the religion of the antient Romans, that is, to idolatry [i]; but he himſelf tells us, that he was a chriſtian till he was twenty [k]; and Libanius, that when he came firſt to Nicomedia, which was in 351, or 352, he had an extreme averſion to the Roman gods [l]. Be that as it will, the different diſpoſition of the heart, with which the two brothers performed the ſame actions, was laid open to the eyes of the world, as we are told, by the following miracle, which we cannot omit, but entirely ſubmit to the judgment of the reader. They both undertook to build a church over the tomb of St. Mamas, a celebrated martyr of Cæſarea in Cappadocia; but the ſide that was to be erected by Julian could never be finiſhed; whereas that which Gallus had undertaken, was ſpeedily completed. This miraculous event is not only related by Theodoret [m], but by Gregory Nazianzen, who aſſures us, that he learnt it of thoſe who had been eye-witneſſes of it [n]; and Sozomen, who, in relating it, ſays the ſame thing, and adds, that many perſons were ſtill living, ready to confirm, as eye-witneſſes, the truth of what he relates [o]. From this retreat Gallus was called to court, and created Cæſar, in the beginning of the year 351, and ſoon after the emperor was, with much-ado, prevailed upon to give Julian leave to quit Macella, and purſue his ſtudies at Conſtantinople, where he ſaw his brother, as he paſſed through that city on his journey into the eaſt, with the title of Cæſar [p]. Libanius writes, that he met Gallus at Nicomedia, and obtained leave of the emperor to ſpeak with him [q]. At Conſtantinople Julian ſtudied oratory, under a ſophiſt of no great eloquence, but choſen by Conſtantius for his preceptor, becauſe he uſed in all his declamations, to inveigh againſt the idolatrous worſhip of the pagan gods [r]. Socrates

[g] Theodoret. l. iii. c. 1. p. 637. [h] Greg. Naz. p. 58.
[i] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 208. [k] Julian. epiſt. 51. p. 210.
[l] Liban. orat. v. p. 173. [m] Theodor. p. 637. [n] Greg. Naz. p. 59. & 61. [o] Sozom. p. 594. [p] Ammian. l. xv. p. 34. [q] Liban. orat. xii. p. 263. [r] Idem. ibid.

Socrates aſſures us, that this ſophiſt was Ecebolus [s], of whom hereafter. Julian's conduct at Conſtantinople, his application and obliging behaviour, ſoon gained him the affections of the inhabitants of that city, though he appeared in the ſchools like a private perſon, and, following the directions of the eunuch Mardonius, carefully avoided the leaſt mark of diſtinction. This no ſooner came to the ears of the jealous emperor, than he ordered him to quit Conſtantinople, and retire to Nicomedia, or what other place in Aſia he pleaſed; but ſtrictly enjoining him not to frequent the ſchool of Libanius, a pagan ſophiſt of great reputation, who, being driven out of Conſtantinople, had opened a ſchool at Nicomedia; which city he was likewiſe obliged to quit ſoon after, and retire to Antioch, the place of his nativity [t]. The ſophiſt too, under whom Julian ſtudied at Conſtantinople, prevailed upon him to promiſe and ſolemnly ſwear, that he would never hear the lectures of Libanius. Julian obſerved his oath; but, as he had great eſteem for that orator, he privately read his works, and imitated his ſtyle with better ſucceſs than thoſe who had ſtudied under him [u]. During his ſtay at Nicomedia, he became acquainted with one Maximus of Epheſus, a pagan philoſopher of great reputation, and much addicted to the ſtudy of magic, who flattering him with the hopes of being one day emperor, inſpired him with an averſion to the chriſtian religion, which condemn all magical practices [w]. Libanius writes, that the precepts and inſtructions of a philoſopher in Ionia, meaning, no doubt, Maximus, made ſuch a deep impreſſion on the mind of Julian, that he immediately renounced the chriſtian religion, and embraced that of the Romans [x]. However, he was ſo far from owning his real ſentiments, that, on the contrary, he put on the appearance of a ſincere and zealous chriſtian, cauſing his head to be ſhaved, ſays Sozomen, affecting the dreſs and manners of a monk, and performing the office of a reader in the principal church of Nicomedia, while he at the ſame time privately adored the heathen deities, and cauſed himſelf to be inſtructed in the abominable myſteries of magic [y]. Gallus, who reſided at Antioch, hearing ſomewhat of his brother's inclination to idolatry, endeavoured, by ſeveral warm and pious epiſtles, to confirm

[s] Socrat. l. iii. p. 197. [t] Eunap. c. 14. p. 132. Liban. vit. p. 18. Socrat. p. 165. [u] Liban. orat. xii. p. 263. Socrat. p. 165. Eunap. c. 14. p. 134. [w] Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 167. Soz. l. v. c. 2. p. 594. Liban. orat. 5. p. 173. [x] Lib. ibid. [y] Socrat. ibid. p. 166.

firm him in the true religion, and divert him from the idolatrous worſhip of the pagan gods [z]. But the ſacrilegious curioſity of knowing future events, ſays Gregory Nazianzen, and the deſire of reigning, prevailed over all other conſiderations [a]. Upon the ruin of his brother Gallus, he was very near undergoing the ſame fate, being unjuſtly charged with ſeveral crimes, and ſuſpected by the emperor of aſpiring at the ſovereignty, who thereupon ordered him to be arreſted, and kept him for ſeven months ſurrounded by guards, ſometimes in one place, and ſometimes in another [b], but moſtly at Milan, where the emperor himſelf reſided; for he tells us, that he was kept ſix months in the great city which was the emperor's abode; and that, during the whole time he was detained there, he was but once admitted to ſee the emperor, and then by the mediation of the empreſs Euſebia, who prevailed upon her huſband to hear him, and encouraged him to defend himſelf with liberty and freedom; which he did, without either juſtifying, through fear or complaiſance, the emperor's proceedings againſt his brother, or provoking his vengeance, by complaining of the hard uſage he himſelf had met with. Conſtantius promiſed him a ſecond audience; which was put off from day to day, under various pretences, by the eunuch Euſebius, the emperor's great chamberlain, who began to apprehend, that Julian might, by degrees, gain not only the prince's favour, but confidence [c]. However, Conſtantius being in the end convinced of his innocence, by means of the empreſs, he was allowed to return to his own country; that is, to his mother's eſtate in Ionia or Bithynia [d]. But a report being ſpread, before he ſet out, that Africanus had revolted in Illyricum, Conſtantius would not ſuffer him to return to Aſia; but, at the requeſt of Euſebia, gave him leave to return into Greece, which he preferred to all other places, being deſirous, as he pretended, to perfect himſelf in the ſciences; but his true deſign was to confer with the magicians at Athens, whom he believed more ſkilful in that art than thoſe in Aſia [e]. He arrived at Athens about the middle of the year 355, and there became acquainted with the two great luminaries of the church, St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Baſil, who were at that time both improving themthemſelves at Athens in the ſtudy of eloquence, of which they made afterwards ſo good an uſe. With the latter Julian read and ſtudied, not only the profane authors, but the books of the holy ſcripture, carefully concealing, through fear of Conſtantius, his real ſentiments [f]; but he could not, with all his diſguiſes, deceive the former, who, from his wild motions and geſtures, which he minutely deſcribes, foreſaw, and foretold among his intimate friends, what afterwards happened [g]. During his ſtay at Athens, he became familiar with the moſt zealous advocates for paganiſm, and the perſons beſt verſed in magic, expreſſing to them, in confidence, his concern for the downfal of paganiſm, and his deſire and intention of reſtoring it to its former luſtre, as ſoon as it was in his power ſo to do [h]. He had been but a very ſhort time at Athens, when he was recalled, to attend the emperor at Milan, who, it ſeems, had already determined with himſelf to raiſe him to the dignity of Cæſar [i]. Julian left Greece with great regret, reſolving not to accept the dignity with which he imagined the emperor deſigned to inveſt him, either becauſe he loved a retired life, as Libanius would make us believe [k], or rather dreading the fate of his brother, as he himſelf informs us [l]. On his arrival at Milan, he lodged in an houſe without the city, where he was ſplendidly entertained by the eunuchs of the empreſs [m]. Conſtantius was not then at Milan; but he returned ſoon after to that city, and immediately communicated to his friends his deſign of raiſing Julian, who did all that lay in their power to divert him from it; but Euſebia, who favoured Julian, prevailed; and the emperor ordered Julian to ſhave his long beard, to quit his philoſophical cloak, and appear in the attire of a military man and the garb of a courtier [n]. As he had hitherto led the life of a philoſopher, or rather of a monk, his aukwardneſs in acting a part he had never been accuſtomed to, afforded for ſome time no ſmall diverſion to the other courtiers [o]. The emperor aſſigned him an apartment in the palace, which he entered with dread and terror, reflecting, that he was to live among thoſe who had ſhed the blood of his father and brothers, and maſſacred his whole family. When he found the emperor, in ſpite of his warm remonſtrances, reſolved upon his promotion, promotion, he earneſtly entreated him to appoint ſuch miniſters and officers to ſerve under him, as might ſupply his want of experience, and to give him in writing directions relating to his whole conduct, that his only buſineſs might be to obey [p]. Conſtantius encouraged him, and having calmed his fears, gave him leave to wait on the empreſs, who removed all his apprehenſions [q]. At length, on the ſixth of November 355, he was declared Cæſar with the uſual ſolemnity, appointed governor of Gaul, and a few days after, by the intereſt of Euſebia, married to Helena, the empreſs's ſiſter [r]. We have related above [s] in what manner he was treated, and how narrowly watched after his promotion. His houſhold was changed, and of his former domeſtics only four were left with him, viz. two youths, his phyſician, and his librarian [t]. The latter only was privy to his ſentiments touching religion, as he himſelf informs us [u]. He left Milan on the firſt of December, as we have obſerved above [w], and arrived at Vienne in Gaul about the end of the year. His warlike exploits, already deſcribed by us in the reign of Conſtantius, ſeem to us altogether ſurpriſing, when we reflect, that they were performed by one who was yet very young; who had been brought up in the country and among books, and conſequently was obliged to learn the firſt rudiments of war while he was leading the army to battle [x]. During his ſtay in Gaul, as ſoon as he had quitted the field, he betook himſelf to his ſtudies, eſpecially to that of philoſophy, but without neglecting the other ſciences, in which he made a wonderful progreſs, being, according to Ammianus, not only an excellent philoſopher, but an eloquent orator, a good poet, well verſed in the Roman and other hiſtories, thoroughly acquainted with the Greek tongue, and pretty well with the Latin, in which he expreſſed himſelf with great eaſe [y]. His two elogies on Conſtantius, his panegyric on the empreſs Euſebia, and his diſcourſe in commendation of Salluſt, which have all reached our times, were the fruit of his ſtudies in Gaul; for in the firſt of theſe compoſitions he ſpeaks of his promotion to the dignity of Cæſar, and tells us in the ſecond, that he had ſeen the barbarians on the banks of the Rhine, and the coaſts coaſts of the ocean, which muſt have happened in the campaign of the year 358 [z]. The panegyric on Euſebia was written after that princeſs had been at Rome, in the latter end of the year 356 [a]. As Julian took great delight in learning, men of letters flocked to him while he was in Gaul from all parts, eſpecially from Greece, and among the reſt the pontiff of Eleuſina, with whom he practiſed in private the abominable myſteries of magic, and conſulted the aruſpices and augurs; for, though he outwardly profeſſed the chriſtian religion, he was an heathen in his heart, and ſacrificed every morning to Minerva in his cloſet [b]. He obſerved great temperance and ſobriety in his diet, remembering, ſays Ammianus [c], the ſaying of Cato the elder, viz. That whoever thinks too much of his table, thinks little of virtue. Having this maxim conſtantly before his eyes, he would not even ſuffer his table to be ſerved after the manner preſcribed by Conſtantius, who had given him inſtructions under his own hand, as we have obſerved above, which were to be the rules of his conduct, and deſcended even to his diet, but contented himſelf with the food of the common ſoldiers [d]. As he fed ſparingly, he was ſatisfied with little ſleep, repoſing on a ſkin ſpread on the ground, and awaking when he pleaſed, which was conſtantly about midnight: the reſt of the night he ſpent in writing, reading, and viſiting before break of day the ſentries and guards in their different ſtations; from this no inclemency of weather ever diverted him [e]. He never ſuffered plays to be exhibited but on the firſt day of the year, and then not for his own diverſion, (for he hated all ſorts of ſports, even thoſe of the circus) but to comply with an antient cuſtom, and to humour the populace [f]. No dancers, comedians, players upon inſtruments, buffoons, &c. were ſuffered to appear at his court; nay, when he was emperor, he would not ſuffer the pagan pontiffs to aſſiſt at the infamous ſports, as he ſtyles them, of the theatre, nor to contract friendſhip with ſtage-players, dancers, drivers of chariots, &c. or even enter their houſes: however, he allowed them to be preſent at certain combats, which he names ſacred,

[z] Philoſt. l. iii. c. 27. p. 59. Liban. orat. x. p. 234. [a] Greg. Naz. orat. iii. p. 86. [b] Liban. orat. xii. p. 267. Julian. ad Athen. p. 501. [c] Idem ibid. p. 503, 504. Liban. ibid. [d] Julian. ibid. p. 501. Ammian. l. xv. p. 34. [e] Julian. ibid. Eunap. c. 5. p. 74. Themiſt. p. 479.

[f] Baſil. ep. 207. p. 122. [g] Greg. Naz. p. 121, 122. [h] Liban. orat. xii. p. 268. [i] Jul. ad Athen. p. 503. Ammian. l. xv. p. 47. Liban. orat. x. p. 235. [k] Liban. ibid. [l] Julian. ad Athen. p. 505. [m] Liban. orat. 12. p. 268. & Julian. ibid. [n] Idem ibid. p. 505, 506. [o] Ammian. l. xv. p. 47.

Julian is declared Cæſar.

His conduct in Gaul.

[p] Julian. ibid. p. 516. [q] Idem ibid. p. 517. & orat. iii. p. 128. [r] Ammian. l. xv. p. 49 Chron. Alex. p. 680. Socr. l. ii. c. 34. Julian. orat. iii. p. 130. [s] Vide p. 474. [t] Julian. ibid. p. 526. Liban. orat. ix. p. 236. [u] Julian. ibid. p. 509. [w] P. 474. [x] Julian. ibid. p. 180. [y] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 62.

His frugality.

He hates all ſports.

[z] Julian. or. i. p. 82. & or. ii. p. 103. [a] Idem, or. iii. p. 241. [b] Julian. ep. xxxviii. p. 180. Liban. or. x. p. 140. & xii. p. 279. Eunap. c. 5. p. 76, 77. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 180, 181. [c] Ammian. l. xvi. & xxv. p. 61. & 292. [d] Idem ibid. p. 62. Julian p. 60. Liban. or. xii. p. 304. [e] Ammian. Julian. Lib. ibid. [f] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 292. Julian miſopog. p. 59, 60.

ſacred, and at which no women appeared; but as for the combats, in which men entered the liſts with wild beaſts, he excluded from them both the prieſts and their children [g]. The grave and ſevere life he led in Gaul gained him the eſteem and affections of the people there, who looked upon him as a prince ſent down to them by heaven, the more becauſe he made it his chief ſtudy to eaſe them of the heavy and inſupportable burdens with which they were loaded by the emperor's officers, eſpecially by Florentius, prefect of Gaul, who, on that account, conceived an implacable hatred againſt him, and did him all the evil offices at court that lay in his power. But Julian, preferring the welfare of the people to his own ſafety, in ſpite of Florentius, leſſened the taxes, and reduced them from twenty-five pieces of gold an head to ſeven, which he found ſufficient to defray all the expences of the war [h]; whence he was by all the people in Gaul looked upon as the reſtorer of their country, and their common father [i]. In what he undertook in favour of the people, he was greatly aſſiſted by one Salluſt, a native of Gaul, in whom he repoſed an entire confidence; which raiſed ſuch jealouſy in the other courtiers, that they took great pains to diſcredit him with the emperor, who was in the end perſuaded to remove him, and appoint one Lucianus in his room [k]. Julian, ſenſibly affected in ſeeing himſelf deprived of the counſels of ſo truſty a friend, gave vent to his grief in the diſcourſe which he wrote to bid him farewel [l]. From that diſcourſe, which is a kind of panegyric on Salluſt, it appears, that Julian had communicated to him his moſt ſecret thoughts; whence ſome conclude him to have been a pagan, though a man of great integrity and an unblemiſhed character [m]. The emperor, who was then in Illyricum, ſent him into Thrace; whence he was ſoon after remanded into Gaul, where Julian left him in 361, with the character of prefect [n]. As Julian was univerſally eſteemed and beloved by the people in Gaul, no wonder that they readily concurred with the ſoldiery in beſtowing upon him the title of emperor in 360, as we have related above. After his promotion, he continued for ſome time to profeſs outwardly the chriſtian religion, and publicly aſſiſted at the holy ceremonies of the church on the feaſt of the Studies to eaſe the people.

[g] Lib. or. x. p. 240. Julian. or. fragment. p. 555. [h] Panegyr. xi. p. 223. Ammian. l. xvi. p. 58. Julian. ep. xvii. p. 133. [i] Lib. or. xii. p. 281. Julian. ep. ad Athen. p. 518. [k] Liban. ibid. Julian. ep. xvii. p. 135. [l] Julian. or. viii. p. 444. [m] Idem ibid. p. 449. [n] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 187.

the Epiphany in 361 [o], but threw off the maſk ſoon after; for we are told by Libanius, that he no ſooner ſaw himſelf maſter of Illyricum, than he opened the temples of the gods, offered ſacrifices according to the antient rites, and exhorted all perſons to follow his example, and reſtore to its former luſtre the religion of their anceſtors [p]. This happened before the death of Conſtantius, who died on the third of November 361, ſince Gregory Nazianzen ſuppoſes him to have known, that Julian had renounced the true religion [q]; and Libanius aſſures us, that before the emperor's death, the Greeks, eſpecially the Athenians, declaring for Julian, had begun to offer ſacrifices as formerly, and practiſe the ceremonies that had been long neglected, which gave occaſion to a ſedition raiſed at Athens among the ſacred families, as Libanius ſtyles them, meaning, no doubt, the families of the pontiffs. The ſame writer adds, that Julian wrote ſeveral letters, exhorting them to peace and concord [r]. We have mentioned above, what paſſed in Gaul and Illyricum, from the time Julian was declared emperor to the death of Conſtantius; and ſhall therefore, without repeating the ſame events, reſume the thread of our hiſtory from that period, generally reckoned the beginning of Julian's reign. Conſtantius being dead, the eunuch Euſebius, and ſome others, who dreaded the reſentment of Julian, and the puniſhment due to their enormous crimes, were for electing another emperor; but no one falling in with them, Theolaiphus and Aliguldus, both ſtyled counts, were diſpatched to Julian with the news of the emperor's death, and to aſſure him, that all the eaſtern provinces were ready to obey his commands. The two meſſengers found him at Naiſſus in Illyricum, employed chiefly in ſuperſtitious enquiries into the entrails of victims, and ſometimes promiſing himſelf the beſt, at other times apprehending the worſt, events. But the death of Conſtantius delivered him from all his doubts and apprehenſions, and put him in poſſeſſion of the empire, without ſtriking a blow [s]. We are told, that when he received the news of the emperor's death, he burſt into tears, appeared the ſame day in deep mourning, and betrayed an extraordinary grief and

He cauſes the temples of the gods to be opened.

Julian acknowledged emperor upon the death of Conſtantius.

[o] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 711. Soz. l. v. c. 1. p. 590. Julian. ad Athen. p. 509. [p] Lib. or. xii. p. 288. [q] Greg. Naz. or. iii. p. 68, 69. [r] Lib. or. xii. p. 288. [s] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 200. & l. xxii. p. 204. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 713. Lib. or. xii. p. 289.

and concern amidſt the repeated acclamations of the ſoldiery, ſaluting him with the title of Auguſtus [t]. He immediately iſſued orders for a general mourning, and commanded all poſſible honours to be paid to the body of the deceaſed emperor [u]. Soon after the meſſengers, ſeveral horſemen arrived from Conſtantinople, aſſuring him, that the troops in thoſe parts had unanimouſly acknowledged him emperor [w]. He therefore ſet out without delay for Conſtantinople; and being met by almoſt all the inhabitants of that metropolis at Heraclea, he made his public entry on the eleventh of December of this year 361, being attended by the ſenate in a body, by all the magiſtrates, and by the nobility in their beſt apparel, every one teſtifying with loud ſhouts of joy the ſatisfaction they felt in ſeeing ſuch a promiſing prince; a prince, who had been born, and ſome time educated, in their city, who had already performed ſuch wonderful exploits, raiſed to the empire without the leaſt expence of blood or treaſure to the republic [x]. He was anew declared emperor by the ſenate of Conſtantinople; and as ſoon as that ceremony was over, he cauſed the obſequies of Conſtantius to be performed with the greateſt pomp and ſolemnity imaginable [y]. His next care was to form at Chalcedon a court of juſtice, to enquire into the conduct of the miniſters of the deceaſed emperor, and to hear the complaints of ſuch as had been injured by them. In this court preſided Salluſtius Secundus, whom Julian had created prefect of the eaſt, in the room of Elpidius, and we muſt take care not to confound with Salluſt, prefect of Gaul, of whom we have ſpoken above: to diſtinguiſh them, we ſhall call the former Secundus, following therein Ammianus and other writers. Julian repoſed in both an entire confidence; and the prefect of the eaſt, though a pagan, is highly commended, even by the eccleſiaſtic writers, for his prudence, diſcretion and compaſſion towards the chriſtians perſecuted by Julian, whoſe conduct towards them he loudly condemned. With him were joined in commiſſion the two conſuls elect Mamertinus and Nevita, the former prefect of Illyricum, and the latter an officer in the army, with Arbetio, Agilo, and Jovinus, of whom the latter had been lately created general of the horſe in Illyricum, and the two others had ſerved under Conſtantius in quality of generals. Arbetio was univerſally abhorred on account of his haughty and imperious behaviour,

He is received with great joy at Conſtantinople.

He erects a court of juſtice to enquire into the conduct of the miniſters of Conſtantius.

[t] Zonar. p. 21. [u] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 713. [w] Idem ibid. [x] Ammian. l. xxi. p. 205. [y] Socr. l. iii. c. 1. p. 164. Libor. xii. p. 289. Zoſ. p. 713.

haviour. and was ſaid to have occaſioned the ruin of ſeveral innocent perſons under the late reign; whence the conduct of Julian ſeemed to all very ſtrange, in appointing one to judge others, who ought himſelf to have been arraigned as a criminal; nay, we are told, that the whole authority was lodged in his hands, and that the others were named only for formſake [y]; which betrayed in Julian, ſays Ammianus, no ſmall want either of judgment or vigour [z]. Be that as it will, by this court were condemned to be burnt alive the famous Paulus Catena and the noted informer Apodemus, as the chief authors of all the cruelties committed in the late reign. The eunuch Euſebius was likewiſe condemned and executed. Theſe executions were by all the world applauded as juſt and equitable; but the death of Urſula, a man of great merit and known integrity, was a ſtain upon the reputation of Julian, whom he had ſupplied with money unknown to the emperor, when he was ſent into Gaul with the title of Cæſar, but without the neceſſary appointments to ſupport that dignity. What prompted Julian to put him to death we are no-where told; but all authors agree, that he deſerved no ſuch treatment, eſpecially at his hands; and therefore charge him with the blackeſt ingratitude in procuring the death of a perſon to whom he owed the greateſt obligations [a]. Julian, to palliate his ingratitude, cruelty, and injuſtice, pretended, that Urſula had been condemned and executed without his knowledge; but Ammianus himſelf owns this to be but a lame excuſe [b]. To atone in ſome degree for this crying injuſtice, he ordered great part of the eſtate of Urſula, which had been confiſcated, to be reſtored to his daughter, his only child [c]. Florentius, who was this year conſul, and had, while prefect of Gaul, highly diſobliged Julian, as we related above, was likewiſe ſentenced to death; but he found means to make his eſcape, and appeared no more [d]: whence we muſt diſtinguiſh him from another of the ſame name, who was taken and beheaded with Procopius in 369. Two officers, whom Julian had diſcharged, offered to diſcover Florentius, provided they were reſtored to their rank; but Julian diſmiſſed them, branding them with the name of informers, and adding, that to perſecute an unhappy man, who had been obliged to conceal himſelf, was an action unworthy of a prince [e]. Taurus, Florentius's

Several of them condemned and executed.

Urſula, an others, condemned unjuſtly.

[y] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 206, 207. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Lib. or. xii. p. 298. Ammian. ibid. p. 206, 207. [b] Idem ibid. [c] Lib. or. xii. p. 298. [d] Ammian. ibid. p. 206. [e] Idem l. xxvi. p. 328. & l. xxii. p. 210.

tius's collègue in the conſulſhip, and prefect of Italy, was baniſhed to Vercellæ, now Vercelli, in Piedmont, for no other reaſon but becauſe he had fled when Julian entered Illyricum [f]. With the ſame injuſtice were baniſhed another Florentius, who had been magiſter officiorum under Conſtantius, Palladius, who had diſcharged the ſame office in the court of Gallus, and many others [g]. Julian, not ſatisfied with having puniſhed ſome of Conſtantius's miniſters, deprived the reſt of their employments without diſtinction, though there were among them ſeveral perſons of unblemiſhed characters, who had diſapproved, and even oppoſed, moſt of the late meaſures. As the vaſt number of officers was become an intolerable burden to the public, he thought himſelf bound to leſſen it; and accordingly diſcharged all uſeleſs perſons about court, preferring the frugality and modeſty of a philoſopher, ſays Ammianus, to the vain magnificence of a prince [h]. He reduced among the reſt the officers called agentes in rebus, from ten thouſand to ſeventeen [i], and diſcharged thouſands of cooks, barbers, and ſuch-like vermin, who devoured the ſubſtance of the people, and with their large ſalaries drained the exchequer [k]. Hiſtorians relate of him, that having called for a barber, and one appearing in a dreſs far above his condition, Julian looking upon him, and betraying great ſurprize, I called for a barber, ſaid he, and not for a governor or a ſenator [l]. The curioſi, whoſe office it was to inform the emperor of what paſſed in the different provinces, were all diſcharged, and that employment entirely ſuppreſſed [m]. This great reform of officers and offices enabled him to eaſe the people of the heavy burdens they groaned under; which he did, abating throughout the whole empire the fifth part of all taxes and impoſts [n]. He recalled from baniſhment all the orthodox biſhops, but with a deſign, as is obſerved both by the pagan and chriſtian writers, to raiſe diſturbances, and ſow diſſenſions in the church.

He reforms the court.

He eaſes the people by leſſening the taxes.

THE death of Conſtantius was no ſooner known, than deputies were ſent from the chief cities of the empire, to preſent the new prince with crowns of gold, and to congratulate him on his acceſſion to the empire. Their example was followed by ſeveral foreign nations, among which, however, we find no

Deputies ſent from ſeveral cities and nations to congratulate Julian.

[f] Idem, p. 206. [g] Idem ibid. [h] Idem, p. 213. [i] Lib. or. xii. p. 279. [k] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 206, 207. [l] Idem, l. xxii. p. 213. Zon. p. 21. [m] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 207, 208. Lib. or. xii. p. 293. [n] Julian. miſop. p. 102.

no mention made of the Perſians. The deputies of the Goths cavilling about the oaths they were to take, Julian ordered them to return home, and prepare for war; but contented himſelf with placing ſtrong garriſons in the cities of Thrace, and on the banks of the Danube [o]. Before he left Conſtantinople, he wrote to the philoſopher Maximus, who had firſt inſpired him, as we have obſerved above, with an averſion to the chriſtian religion, inviting to court both him and another pagan philoſopher and magician, named Chryſanthus. The latter, deterred by ſome bad omens, could not prevail upon himſelf to comply with the invitation; but the former readily obeyed, and was received by the emperor at Conſtantinople with ſuch tokens of friendſhip and eſteem, as to Ammianus ſeemed below the dignity of a prince [p], though highly commended by Libanius [q]. The philoſopher, puffed up with the reception he met with from Julian, and the reſpect paid him by others out of complaiſance to the prince, grew ſo proud and haughty, that it was leſs difficult to have acceſs to the emperor than to him [r]. By him Julian was perſuaded to write a ſecond letter to Chryſanthus; nay, he condeſcended to write privately with his own hand to the philoſopher's wife, hoping by her means to draw him to court. But finding him unalterably fixed in his former reſolution, he created him high pontiff of Lydia [s]; which office he diſcharged with great moderation. Foreſeeing, without the aſſiſtance of magic, what might happen, he did not take upon him, as others did, to rebuild the temples of the gods; but carefully avoided diſobliging the chriſtians, or doing them the leaſt injury: hence the re-eſtabliſhment of idolatry in that province was ſcarce perceptible [t]. The encouragement Maximus met with from Julian, drew to court from all parts ſwarms of philoſophers, magicians, aruſpices, and diviners of all denominations, who were kindly received by the emperor, entertained at a great expence, and raiſed to honourable employments, though many of them had in the late reign been branded with infamy for their notorious impoſtures, and condemned either to languiſh in priſon, or to work in the mines. Theſe were Julian's chief favourites; theſe the perſons in whom he moſt confided [u]. But among them Maximus and Priſcus bore the chief ſway, aſſuming a port and authority ill ſuiting their profeſſion [w]. Iamblichus of Apamea was likewiſe importuned by Julian to comé to court; but he choſe rather to lead a retired life, as did the great Baſil, rejecting with contempt the tender which Julian, who had known him at Athens, made him of his friendſhip [x]. The chriſtian writers add, that Julian's court was not only crouded with philoſophers and magicians, but with infamous women [y]; a charge not denied by Ammianus himſelf, who owns, that he was not undeſervedly traduced and ridiculed for carrying about with him troops of women [z].

He invites to court philoſophers, magicians, &c. from all parts.

[o] Ammian. ibid. p. 210. Lib. or. 10. p. 245. [p] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 110. [q] Lib. or. xii. 299. [r] Eunap. c. 5. p. 79. [s] Idem ibid. p. 80, 81. [t] Idem, c. 21. p. 148, 149. [u] Idem, c. 5. p. 80, 81. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 225.

THE next conſuls were Claudius Mamertinus and Nevita, or Nevitta, who on the firſt day of January, when they entered, according to cuſtom, upon their office, went, before it was light, to wait on the emperor, fearing, ſays Mamertinus in the panegyric he pronounced on this occaſion, he ſhould be before-hand with them [a]. Julian no ſooner heard they were coming, than he haſtened to meet them in the utmoſt confuſion, as if he had been wanting in reſpect to them, kiſſed them, received them with the greateſt regard imaginable, and would by all means attend them in their chariots, walking before them to the ſenate mixed with the croud [b]. His conduct on this occaſion is greatly commended by ſome, and no leſs blamed by others, among the reſt by Ammianus, who looked upon it as too mean, and below the majeſty of a prince [c]. It was an uſual thing for emperors to accompany the new conſuls on that day, but not on foot, it ſeems, nor blended with the croud. On the third of January, Mamertinus exhibited the circenſian ſports, when a troop of ſlaves being brought into the circus, in order to be declared free by the conſul, according to cuſtom, Julian, unacquainted with the prerogatives of the ſeveral magiſtrates, declared them free himſelf; but being told, that he entrenched upon the juriſdiction of the conſuls, he begged pardon, and condemned himſelf to pay a fine of ten pounds weight of gold [d]. Ammianus obſerves, that Julian went frequently to the ſenate, and ſpoke in all debates; whereas Conſtantius uſed to command the ſenators to attend him in the palace, and to ſignify to them his will and pleaſure, without allowing them to ſit down in his preſence [e]. This year, Julian appointed Julian pays great reſpect to the conſuls.

one

[w] Eunap. ibid. [x] Baſil. ep. 206, 207. p. 225, 226. [y] Chryſ. in gent. p. 676. Greg. Naz. or. iv. p. 221. [z] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 227. [a] Panegyr. xi. p. 222. [b] Idem, p. 224. [c] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 209. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Idem, p. 210.

one Prætextatus governor of Achaia, who is mightily commended both by Ammianus [f] and Zoſimus [g]; and Photius quotes a diſcourſe of the ſophiſt Himera on his proconſulſhip, which office he ſtill held in 364, and 365, under the emperor Valentinian [h]. Before he left Conſtantinople, he enriched that metropolis, the place of his nativity, with many privileges, formed a large harbour to ſhelter the ſhips from the ſouth wind, built a magnificent porch leading to it, and in another porch a ſtately library, in which he lodged all his books [i]. At length he left Conſtantinople in the month of May, and ſet out for Antioch: he paſſed through Chalcedon, and from thence went to Nicomedia, the ruins of which city, overturned by an earthquake, he could not behold without ſhedding many tears: he ordered conſiderable ſums for the rebuilding of it, and then purſuing his journey by Nice, he turned out of his way on the borders of Galatia, to viſit the famous temple of Cybele at Peſſinus, which he enriched with offerings of a great value. He pronounced a diſcourſe on that pretended deity, which he compoſed in one night, appointed Calixenes prieſteſs of the temple, and then continued his rout to Ancyra, where he was met by the pagan prieſts carrying with them their idols. As ſoon as he arrived at the palace, he ordered conſiderable ſums to be diſtributed among them, and the next day exhibited public ſports [k]. As he purſued his march, he was met in moſt places by crouds of people come to lay their complaints before him: he heard them with patience, and decided their differences with equity, not ſuffering himſelf to be prejudiced in favour of thoſe who complained, or againſt ſuch as had given them occaſion to complain [l]. As he entered Cilicia, he was met by the inhabitants of a ſmall village, one of whom accuſed another of aſpiring at the empire, alledging, that he had ordered himſelf a purple habit, which was actually making. Julian heard the informer with great patience, and then told him, that when the purple habit was done, he might ſupply, if he pleaſed, the new prince with purple ſhoes [m]. The emperor, paſſing through Cilicia, arrived at length at Antioch, where he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy imaginable. Soon after his arrival, he went up to the top of mount Caſius in the neighbourhood of that city, and there

He enriches the city of Conſtantinople with many privileges.

He ſets out for Antioch.

[f] Idem ibid. [g] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 735. [h] Phot c. 165. p. 353. [i] Ammian. p. 224. Zoſ. p. 713. Themiſt. or. iv. p. 60. [k] Lib. or. 10. p. 258. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 220. [l] Ammian. ibid. [m] Idem ibid.

offered a ſolemn ſacrifice to Jupiter. On his return, Theodotus, one of the chief citizens of Hierapolis, who, it ſeems, had formerly done ſomething to diſoblige him, threw himſelf at his feet, entreating him to forgive him. Julian did not know him; but without enquiring who he was, or what he had done, embraced him with great tenderneſs, ſaying, In what you have diſobliged me, I know not, nor do I care to know; but be what it will, you have nothing to fear under a prince, whoſe greateſt ambition is to leſſen the number of his enemies, and encreaſe that of his friends [n]. During his ſtay at Antioch, he employed himſelf chiefly in hearing and deciding cauſes; in protecting the innocent, without diſtinction of chriſtian or pagan, ſays Ammianus [o]; and puniſhing the guilty, without forgetting his uſual lenity and moderation. In the adminiſtration of juſtice, he readily hearkened to thoſe who ſeemed better acquainted with the laws than himſelf, adviſing conſtantly with them before he gave ſentence [p]. But notwithſtanding his ſo much boaſted equity and moderation, he ſentenced to death Gaudentius, one of the late emperor's ſecretaries, and Julian formerly vicar, for no other reaſon but becauſe they had adhered to Conſtantius with great ſteadineſs and zeal [q]; which a generous prince would have rather thought worthy of reward than puniſhment. He treated in the ſame manner the ſon of Marcellus, accuſed of aſpiring at the empire; but contented himſelf with only baniſhing Romanus and Vincentius, two officers of diſtinction, tho' convicted of the ſame crime [r]. Marcellus had highly diſobliged Julian, while he commanded under him in Gaul, as we have obſerved elſewhere. The eccleſiaſtic writers make long deſcants on the unheard-of cruelties and innumerable murders committed by Julian, during his ſtay at Antioch [s]. Gregory Nazianzen repreſents the Orontes, on which ſtood Antioch, choaked up with the bodies of ſuch as had by his orders been privately murdered, or thrown into that river in the night-time; and adds, that all the ditches, caves, wells, ponds, &c. in the neighbourhood of that city, were filled with the bodies of the young virgins and children whom he had inhumanly ſacrificed, hoping to diſcover future events in their entrails [t]. Theſe abominable practices and barbarous murders were kept ſecret, and carefully concealed, during his life-

He adminiſters juſtice with impartiality.

[n] Ammian. ibid. p. 227. [o] Idem ibid. p. 222. [p] Idem ibid. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Idem ibid. p. 222, 223. [s] Greg. Naz. or. iii. p. 91. Chryſ. in gent. p. 677. [t] Greg. Naz. ibid.

life-time, ſays Theodoret [u]; but after his death many cheſts were found in the palace, filled with the bones of thoſe he had thus inhumanly ſacrificed. It is ſurpriſing, that ſuch cruelties ſhould have been known only to the chriſtian writers. Both pagan and chriſtian authors obſerve, that during the ſhort time Julian reigned, the empire was conſtantly afflicted by ſome grievous calamity or other: dreadful earthquakes were felt in every province; moſt of the cities of Paleſtine, Libya, Sicily, and Greece, were overturned [w]. Libanius writes, that not one city was left ſtanding in all Libya, and but one in Greece; that Nice was utterly ruined, and Conſtantinople greatly damaged [x]. The temples of Apollo at Rome and Daphne were about the ſame time conſumed by fire. The ſea in ſeveral places broke in upon the land, and deſtroyed whole cities with their inhabitants. At Alexandria, the ſea retiring during an earthquake, returned afterwards with ſuch violence, that it laid under water ſeveral towns and villages, and drowned an incredible number of people [y]. To theſe calamities were added a general drought, which laſted till the winter was far ſpent, and produced an univerſal famine: the famine was followed by a dreadful plague, and both continued till the death of Julian, carrying off great numbers of men and cattle [z]. The eccleſiaſtic writers obſerve, that the famine followed Julian from place to place; and that, as he continued longer at Antioch, than in any other city, it raged there with moſt violence. Julian, to remedy this evil, fixed the prices of corn, and all other proviſions, which encreaſed it beyond meaſure, the merchants conveying privately their corn to other places. By this means that great and populous metropolis was reduced to ſuch miſeries as can hardly be expreſſed [a].

The empire afflicted with many calamities.

The following year, 363, Julian entered upon his fourth conſulſhip, having Salluſt, the prefect of Gaul, for his collegue; and on that occaſion Libanius pronounced the panegyric, which is ſtill extant [b]. Julian, on the firſt of January, viſited the temple of Jupiter, and there performed the heatheniſh ſacrifices, which had been long omitted, for the ſafety of the empire. As the inhabitants of Antioch were moſtly chriſtians, and beſides highly provoked againſt Julian, to [u] Theodor. l. iii. c. 22. p. 659. [w] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 226. Soz. l. vi. c. 2. p. 639. Chryſ. & Greg. Naz. ibid. [x] Lib. or. xii. p. 314. [y] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 240. Greg. Naz. p. 112. Soz. p. 639. [z] Ammian. ibid. [a] Lib. or. iv. p. 152. Ammian. p. 233. [b] Lib. vit. p. 43, 44. & or. x. p. 327.

to whoſe impiety in worſhipping the idols they aſcribed the famine and the other calamities with which the whole empire was afflicted, they publiſhed ſeveral lampoons, reflecting on the defects of his perſon, and expoſing him to ridicule on account of his ſmall ſtature, his forbidding aſpect, his long and rough beard, his port and geſtures, which were, it ſeems, ſomewhat odd and ridiculous. They ſtyled him butcher, by reaſon of the many victims he was daily immolating; and rallied him, not without reaſon, ſays Ammianus [c], for taking pride in carrying himſelf the utenſils for the ſacrifices, and acting rather the part of a prieſt than an emperor. The ſtrange and fantaſtical figures, which he cauſed to be engraved on his coins, were, and not undeſervedly, one of the topics of ridicule [d]. Julian, highly provoked with the ralleries of the people of Antioch, and ſevere ſatires that were daily publiſhed againſt him, and ſung publicly in the ſtreets, wrote an ironical invective againſt the Antiochians, ſtyled The Antiochian or Miſopogon, that is, the beard-hater; in which he repreſents them entirely addicted to their intereſt, abandoned to luxury, pomp and lewdneſs, great admirers of plays, farces, and all ſorts of diverſions. And truly, that his reproaches were not groundleſs, is manifeſt from the homilies which the famous Chryſoſtom preached a few years after in that city. However, Ammianus aſſures us, that, blinded with paſſion, he mixed with the truth, many things that were quite foreign to it [e]. Elias of Crete, as quoted by Gregory Nazianzen, tells us, that, in compoſing this piece, Julian was aſſiſted by Libanius [f]. Maximus too had, in all likelihood, a hand in it; for to his cenſure Julian uſed to ſubmit all his compoſitions [g]. The Miſopogon was received, by ſome better, by others, eſpecially the chriſtians, worſe, than it deſerved: it is a continued ſatire, not without humour; but in many places flat, low, and inſipid. He wrote it ſeven months after his arrival at Antioch, that is, about the latter end of January of the preſent year 363 [h]. Though he had been highly provoked by the ſevere reflections, and bitter ralleries, of the Antiochians, yet in his Miſopogon he ſolemnly declares, that none of them ſhall on that ſcore loſe their lives, be beaten with rods, arreſted, or impriſoned; but threatens to withdraw from a city, which thus requited, with Julian rallied by the Antiochians.

His Antiochian or Miſopogon.

[c] Ammian. p. 226. [d] Greg. Naz. or. iii. p. 82. Julian. p. 87. Socr. p. 390. Cange. Byz. fam. p. 39. [e] Ammian. p. 226. [f] Greg. Naz. p. 133. [g] Julian. ep. xvi. p. 131. [h] Julian. Miſop. p. 66.

with the utmoſt ingratitude, the innumerable favours he had heaped upon it, and the extraordinary care he had taken in relieving the citizens, when in the utmoſt diſtreſs. His deſign was to reſide at Tarſus, and with this view he wrote to Memor, governor of Cilicia, one of his intimate friends, enjoining him to get every thing ready for his reception againſt his return from the Perſian war, which he was then bent upon [k]. Libanius tells us, that about the time Julian wrote his Miſopogon, ten ſoldiers, incenſed againſt him on account of his attempting to re-eſtabliſh the worſhip of the gods, conſpired to murder him while he was exerciſing his troops. But the plot being diſcovered by the conſpirators themſelves, when they were intoxicated with wine, they were all arreſted, and brought before Julian, who generouſly forgave them, though convicted of the crime laid to their charge [l].

He deſigns to leave Antioch and reſide at Tarſus.

JULIAN had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the empire, ſhewed a ſtrong inclination to make war upon the Perſians, and try whether he could humble that haughty enemy, who had for many years haraſſed the eaſtern provinces in a moſt miſerable manner, and defeated all the attempts of his predeceſſor. Being adviſed, ſoon after his arrival at Conſtantinople, to fall upon the Goths, he anſwered, that he deſigned to enter the liſts with a more formidable enemy [m]. Before he left that metropolis, he had appointed his generals, and named the officers and ſoldiers who were to ſerve under them. Victor was created general of the foot, and Hormiſda of the horſe. The latter was the elder brother of Sapor, king of Perſia; but having been excluded from the crown, and kept ſome time under confinement, he found means to make his eſcape, and took ſanctuary in the court of Conſtantine in 323 [n]. Julian, during his ſtay at Antioch, purſued his preparations for the Perſian war, drawing together his troops from all quarters, erecting magazines, making new levies, and, above all, conſulting the oracles, the aruſpices, magicians, &c. The oracles of Delphos, Delos, and Dodona, aſſured him of victory [o]. But the aruſpices, and moſt of his courtiers and officers, did all that lay in their power to divert him from his intended expedition [p]. But the deceitful

He prepares for the Perſian war.

anſwers

[i] Idem, p. 101. [k] Idem, p. 102—106. Soz. l. v. c. 19. Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 239. [l] Lib. or. xii. p. 307. & or. iv. p. 161. [m] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 224. [n] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 713. Abulfarag. p. 90. [o] Theodoret. l. iii. c. 16. Greg. Naz. or. p. 114. Philoſtorg. l. vii. c. 15. Liban. p. 252. [p] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 245.

anſwers of the oracles, the confidence he repoſed in the magicians, and the deſire of adding the Perſian monarch to the many kings he had already ſeen humbled at his feet, prevailed over all other conſiderations [q]. The Perſians, according to Theodoret, began hoſtilities [r], by making inroads into Meſopotamia. But Libanius tells us, that the king of Perſia wrote to Julian, offering to conclude a peace with him upon ſuch terms as he ſhould think juſt and reaſonable; but that Julian, deſirous to revenge the many affronts offered to the Romans by that haughty prince, tore the letter, and would hearken to no terms [s]. Socrates ſpeaks of embaſſadors ſent by Sapor with advantageous propoſals, but diſmiſſed by Julian with this anſwer; that ere it was long he hoped to treat with their maſter in perſon [t]. Several nations ſent deputies to Julian, offering him their aſſiſtance, which he refuſed, ſaying, The Romans are to aſſiſt their allies, but ſtand in no need of their aſſiſtance [u]. He likewiſe rejected, and in a very diſobliging manner, the offers of the Saracens, anſwering them, when they complained of his ſtopping the penſion, which was paid to their nation by other emperors, that a warlike prince had ſteel, but no gold; which they reſenting, joined the Perſians, and continued faithful to them to the laſt [w]. However, he wrote to Arſaces, king of Armenia, enjoining him to keep his troops in readineſs to execute the orders he ſhould ſoon tranſmit to him. Having made the neceſſary preparations for ſo important a war, as ſoon as the ſeaſon was fit for action, he diſpatched orders to his troops to paſs the Euphrates, with a deſign to enter the enemy's country before they had the leaſt notice of his march, placing guards for that purpoſe on all the roads [x]. Before he left Antioch, he appointed one Alexander, a cruel and paſſionate man, governor of that city, ſaying the citizens deſerve no better [y]. He ſet out from Antioch on the fifth of March, and reached the ſame day Litarba, a village in the territory of Chalcis, and about fifteen leagues from Antioch. The magiſtrates of that great city, who had attended him thither, wiſhing him a happy journey, and a triumphant return, he told them in a great paſſion, that he would never viſit them again, being reſolved to winter at Tarſus [z]. He had told them before the ſame thing in the preſence of Libanius, who thereupon wrote two ſpeeches,

Will hearken to no terms.

He diſobliges the Saracens.

He ſets out from Antioch.

[q] Idem, l. xxii. p. 224. [r] Theod. l. iii. c. 16. p. 654. [s] Lib. or. x. p. 243—245. [t] Soz. l. iii. p. 192. [u] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 238. [w] Idem, l. xxix. p. 238. & l. xxv. p. 298. [x] Julian. ep. xxvii. p. 160. [y] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 156. [z] Evagr. l. vi. c. 11. p. 452. Julian. p. 156. Ammian. p. 239.

ſpeeches, the one, addreſſed to Julian, in favour of the inhabitants of Antioch, and the other to the inhabitants themſelves [u]. Of theſe, the firſt only has reached our times. From Litarba, Julian proceeded to Berea, where he halted a day, and pronounced a ſpeech before the council of the place, exhorting them to adore the gods of their anceſtors. He writes himſelf, that they all heard him with attention, and commended him; but few followed his advice [w]. At the head of the council was a zealous chriſtian, who had not only diſinherited, but turned out of doors, his ſon, for renouncing the chriſtian religion. As Julian drew near Berea, the ſon accoſting him, acquainted him with the treatment he had met with from his father, and the motives of his indignation. The emperor, pitying his condition, bid him take courage, and be under no concern: For I will take upon me, added he, to appeaſe your father, and reinſtate you in his favour. Mindful of his promiſe, the ſame day he invited the chief citizens of Berea, and, among the reſt, both the father and the ſon, to ſup with him. The two latter he placed by him; and in the midſt of the banquet, turning to the father, I do not think it reaſonable, ſaid he, to uſe any violence in point of religion. Allow your ſon to profeſs a religion different from yours, as I allow you to profeſs one different from mine, tho' I might eaſily oblige you to renounce it. What! replied the father, are you ſpeaking in favour of an impious wretch abhorred by heaven, who has preferred falſhood to truth, and renounced the worſhip of the true God, to fall down before idols? Injuries and invectives, replied Julian, interrupting him, are foreign to our purpoſe, and therefore I beg you would forbear them: then turning to the ſon, It is incumbent upon me, ſaid he, to take care of you, ſince your father is deaf to my prayers and entreaties in your behalf [x]. He was better pleaſed with the inhabitants of Batne, the next city he came to; for they had, before his arrival, reſtored the public worſhip of the gods. There he offered ſacrifices, and having immolated a great number of victims, he purſued the next day his journey to Hierapolis, the capital city of the province Euphrateſiana, which he reached on the ninth of March. He was met at a great diſtance by crouds of people; but as he entered the city, city, fifty ſoldiers were killed, and a great many more hurt, by the fall of a porch [y]. At Hierapolis he lodged in the houſe of one for whom he had a particular eſteem and veneration, becauſe he was the ſon-in-law of Sopater, the diſciple of Iamblichus, and becauſe neither Conſtantius nor Gallus, who had both lodged in his houſe, had ever been able to prevail upon him to renounce the worſhip of his idols [z]. From Hierapolis, Julian wrote to Libanius, giving him an account of his journey, and of ſeveral things he had done at Hierapolis [a]; but takes no notice of the death of the fifty ſoldiers. He left Hierapolis on the thirteenth of March; and having paſſed the Euphrates on a bridge of boats with his army, he came to Batnæ, a ſmall city of Oſrhoene, about ten leagues from Hierapolis, and different from the city of the ſame name in Syria. There fifty ſoldiers more were killed by the fall of a ſtack of ſtraw [b]. From Batnæ he proceeded to Carrhæ, where, in the famous temple of the moon, he performed ſome ceremonies with his magicians, ſays Theodoret, which were not known then, but were diſcovered after his death; for that writer tells us, that he ordered the gates of the temple to be ſhut, ſealed them with his own ſignet, and placed guards round the temple, with orders to let no one enter it till his return. But when the news of his death was brought to Carrhæ, the gates were opened, continues the ſame writer, when, to the great ſurprize of the whole city, a woman was ſeen hanging by her hair, with her arms ſtretched out, and her belly open [c]. What Theodoret writes is not vouched by any other author; but they all agree, that Julian privately ſacrificed in the temple of the moon at Carrhæ; which ceremony being over, he delivered, as we read in Ammianus, a purple robe to his kinſman Procopius, the only perſon whom he had admitted to the ſacrifice, enjoining him to ſeize on the empire, if news ſhould be brought him of his death [d]. This looks as if the omens had not proved favourable. But on the other hand Libanius writes, that the gods revealed to him, that he was not to die till he had humbled the Perſians; and beſtows great encomiums upon him for having choſen to haſten his death, rather than to deprive himſelf of the glory he was to acquire in this war.

The conduct of a chriſtian at Berea.

The route of Julian's army.

[u] Lib. vit. p. 44. Julian. ep. xxvii. p. 156. Socr. l. iii. c. 17. p. 190. [w] Julian. ep. xxvii p. 157. [x] Theod. l. iii. c. 17. p. 655, 656.

He ſacrifices to the moon at Carrhæ.

[y] Julian. ibid. p. 159. Lib. or. xii. p. 311. [z] Julian ep. xxvii. p. 159. [a] Idem. ibid. p. 160. [b] Lib. or. 12. p. 111. Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 239, 240. [c] Theodor. l. iii. c. 21. p. 658, 659. [d] Ammian. p. 240.

war [e]. While he was at Carrhæ, news being brought him, that a party of the enemy's horſe had broke into the Roman territories, he reſolved to leave an army in Meſopotamia to guard the frontiers of the empire on that ſide, while he advanced on the other into the heart of the Perſian dominions [f]. This army conſiſted, according to ſome [g], of twenty thouſand, according to others, of thirty thouſand, choſen troops [h]; and was commanded by Procopius, and Seleaſtian, a famous Manichean, who had been governor of Egypt, and had perſecuted there, with the utmoſt cruelty, the orthodox chriſtians. Theſe two were to join, if poſſible, Arſaces king of Armenia, to lay waſte the fruitful plains of Media, and meet the emperor in Aſſyria. Julian wrote to Arſaces, acquainting him with his deſign, but in the moſt diſobliging terms imaginable, treating him asif he had been the meaneſt of his ſlaves, reviling the memory of Conſtantius, to whom that prince had been ever greatly attached, and extolling his own abilities and ſkill in war. As Arſaces profeſſed the chriſtian religion, Julian, after having threatened to treat him as a rebel, if he did not, with the utmoſt punctuality, execute the orders laid upon him, added, And the god you adore will not be able to ſcreen you from my indignation. Thus Sozomen [i]. There were two roads leading from Carrhæ to Perſia, the one to the left by Niſibis, and through the province of Adiabene; the other to the right, through Aſſyria, along the banks of the Euphrates. On both theſe roads Julian had cauſed magazines to be erected, but choſe the latter; and after having, from an eminence, viewed his army, conſiſting of ſixty-three thouſand men, he ſet out on the twenty-fifth of March for Davana or Dabana in Meſopotamia, and arrived the next day at Calliniſus or Callinicum, where he ſtopt the twenty-ſeventh to celebrate the feaſt of the mother of the gods. The day following, he proceeded on his march, and encamped the night in the fields near the Euphrates; where he was met by his fleet, conſiſting of ſeven hundred gallies and four hundred ſhips of burden, commanded by count Lucillianus and the tribune Conſtantianus [k]. From Callinicum he proceeded to Cercuſium, called alſo Circeſium, ſituated at the conflux of the Abora and the Euphrates, and reckoned one of the ſtrongeſt places in Meſopotamia, having been fortified

His conduct towards the king of Armenia.

The order of his march

[e] Lib. pro templ. p. 24. [f] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 240. [g] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 714. Soz. l. vi. c. 1. p. 634. [h] Ammian. p. 240. [i] Soz. l. vi. c. 1. p. 634. [k] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 240. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 314.

fortified by Dioclefian, to prevent the ſudden irruptions of the Perſians, who, in his reign, had even ſurpriſed Antioch. At this place Julian paſſed the Abora with his whole army, and then ordered the bridge to be broken down, that his ſoldiers might not be tempted to deſert, ſeeing they could not return home. From Cercuſium he advanced to Zaitha, where the tomb of the emperor Gordian was ſtill to be ſeen. On the ſeventh of April, a ſoldier and two horſes were ſtruck dead by a flaſh of lightning; and a lion of an extraordinary ſize, preſenting himſelf to the army, was diſpatched in a moment by the ſoldiers with a ſhower of darts. Theſe omens occaſioned great diſputes between the philoſophers and the aruſpices, the latter looking upon them as inauſpicious, and adviſing the emperor not to proceed on his intended expedition, and the former refuting their arguments with others more agreeable to Julian's temper [l]. The emperor, after having paſſed the Abora, which parted the Roman and Perſian dominions, encouraged his men with a proper ſpeech to revenge the many injuries and affronts, which of late years had been offered by the haughty enemy to the Roman emperors. When he had ended his ſpeech, he ordered large ſums to be diſtributed among them, an hundred and thirty pieces of ſilver a man, ſays Ammianus. He then proceeded on his march with the greateſt order and precaution imaginable. Nevitta led the right wing along the Euphrates; Arintheus and Hormiſda were in the left, with ſome troops of horſe; Julian himſelf commanded in the centre, and the rear was brought up by Dagalaiphus, Victor, and Secundinus: a body of fifteen hundred horſe was appointed to ſcour the country for intelligence, and to prevent any ſurprize. To ſtrike the greater terror into the enemy, he ordered his ranks to be widened; by which means the army took up about ten miles, and appeared at a diſtance far more numerous than it really was [m]. Having paſſed the Abora, he entered Aſſyria, ſays Ammianus; but, according to Libanius, he croſſed vaſt deſerts before he reached that province, which he found very populous, and abounding with all neceſſaries of life; but he laid it waſte far and near, ſetting fire to the magazines, and deſtroying the proviſions which he could not carry with him [n]. By that means he put it out of his power, which was judged very impolitic, to take the ſame rout on his return. Six or ſeven days after he had paſſed the Abora, he came to a fort called called Annathan, which capitulated upon the firſt ſummons; whereupon Julian preferred the officer who commanded there, by name Puſeus, to the rank of a tribune. He ever after ſerved the Romans with great fidelity, and was in the end created duke of Egypt [o]. Here was found a Roman ſoldier, who falling ſick when Galerius invaded Perſia ſixty-ſix years before, had been left in the enemy's country. Upon his recovery he liſted himſelf among the Perſian troops, being then in the flower of his age, and had ſerved with great reputation. When he was brought to Julian, he aſſured him, that he had been often foretold, he ſhould live till he was near an hundred years old, and be buried at laſt in the Roman territories. Ammianus ſuppoſes the place to have been by him betrayed to the Romans [p]. Julian burnt all the places he found abandoned by the inhabitants; but left ſeveral ſtrong-holds behind him, without attempting to reduce them, upon their promiſing to ſubmit, when he had made himſelf maſter of the reſt of the country [q]. After the army had repaſſed the Euphrates, at a place called Baraxmalcha, Hormiſda would have fallen into an ambuſcade laid for him by the enemy, had he not been luckily prevented by a canal, which he could not paſs, from advancing to the place, where a body of Perſians lay in wait for him, under the conduct of Surena [r]. After this, Julian paſſed with great difficulty an arm of the Euphrates, which was ſwelled to an unuſual height by the melting of the ſnow, and laid ſiege to Berſabora or Pyriſabora, next to Cteſiphon the ſtrongeſt place in Aſſyria, being fortified with a double wall and a citadel, and defended by a numerous garriſon. But Julian, ſurmounting all difficulties, reduced it in two days time, in ſpite of the moſt vigorous reſiſtance he met with, both from the garriſon and the inhabitants, who fought to the laſt like men in deſpair. He found in the place great ſtore of proviſions, and diſtributed among his ſoldiers, who began to mutiny, an hundred pieces of ſilver a head, having with much-ado prevailed upon them to be ſatisfied with that ſum [s]. Having thus pacified the army, and ſet fire to the town, he purſued his march, and entered a country, which the enemy, foreſeeing he would paſs that way, had laid under water; but the ſoldiers, animated by the example of their leader, waded through it with great reſolution,

He enters the Perſian dominions.

He lays waſte Aſſyria.

[l] Ammian. p. 244—246. [m] Idem ibid. Zoſ. p. 715. Lib. or. xii. p. 312. [n] Liban. ibid. p. 313. Soz. l. vi. c. 1. p. 634.

He reduces ſeveral towns and ſtrong holds.

[o] Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 263. Liban. orat. xii. p. 312. [p] Ammian. p. 264. [q] Idem. p. 265. [r] Idem. ibid. Zoſ. p. 715. [s] Ammian. ibid. p. 269, 270.

reſolution, and arriving at Maiozamalcha, a place of great ſtrength, which refuſed to ſubmit, they drew a double line round it, battering the walls night and day, without intermiſſion; but the beſieged obſtinately held out, till the Romans, by means of a mine, got into the city, while the Perſians were buſied in defending the walls. Ammianus, who was at this ſiege, calls Maiozamalcha a great and populous city; and his authority is of more weight with us than that of Libanius or Zoſimus, who ſuppoſe it to have been only a caſtle near a large and populous city named Beſuchis [t]. Julian, incenſed againſt the governor for not ſurrendering the place at the time agreed on, and for calling Hormiſda a traitor, ordered him to be burnt alive, and gave up the city to be plundered by the ſoldiers. As the army was now within ſeven miles of Cteſiphon, and Victor, who had viſited all the roads, aſſured them they had nothing to apprehend, they advanced to a city, which had been formerly ruined, ſays Ammianus, by a Roman emperor, meaning, according to ſome, Seleucia, ruined by Lucius Verus, and, according to others, Sabata, about three miles from Cteſiphon the great metropolis of the Perſian empire [u]. From this place they advanced to a fort, which was taken by aſſault, after a ſhort, but vigorous reſiſtance, Julian himſelf having narrowly eſcaped being killed by a ſhower of arrows diſcharged againſt him, as he was viewing the walls too near [w]. Having razed the fort, he allowed his army ſome time to refreſh themſelves; and then, cauſing the canal to be cleanſed, which had been formerly dug by Trajan between the Euphrates and the Tigris, he conveyed by that means his fleet from the former to the latter river. After this, he led his army to Coche, a place of great ſtrength, ſtanding on the Tigris over-againſt Cteſiphon; but we are not told that he attacked it. All we know is, that he paſſed the river with no leſs raſhneſs than courage, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the enemy, encamped on the oppoſite bank, whom he obliged to retire, and ſhelter themſelves within the walls of Cteſiphon. Some of the Romans purſued them to the very gates of the city, which they would have entered with the enemy, had not Victor prudently reſtrained them. The Perſians loſt on this occaſion, according to ſome, two thouſand five hundred, according to others, ſix thouſand men, and the Romans only ſeventy or ſeventy-five. Only part of the Roman army paſſed the Tigris that day, and made themſelves

He advances to Cteſiphon.

Puts the Perſians to flight, and paſſes the Tigris.

[t] Idem, p. 271. Liban. p. 316. Zoſ. p. 721. [u] Ammian. Zoſ. ibid. [w] Ammian. p. 275.

ſelves maſters of the Perſian camp. The reſt followed the next day, and Julian himſelf, with his guards, three days after [x]. Julian continued ſome days encamped before Cteſiphon; but not daring to attack it through fear of being repulſed with ſhame, as it was very ſtrong, well ſtored with proviſions, and defended by a very numerous garriſon, he contented himſelf with ſending Arintheus to lay waſte the neighbouring country [y]. In the mean time, the king of Perſia was aſſembling, on the moſt diſtant confines of his kingdom, a formidable army, with a deſign to fall upon Julian in his retreat. However, he ſent deputies to propoſe terms for an accommodation, being deſirous to put an end to ſo deſtructive a war. Theſe applied to Hormiſda, as their countryman and their king's brother, who immediately flew to the emperor with the agreeable tidings, as he imagined; but Julian, inſtead of hearkening to the propoſals, ordered Hormiſda privately to diſmiſs the embaſſadors, and give out, that they were only ſome of his old friends come to ſee him; for he apprehended, that both the ſoldiers and officers would have diſapproved of his purſuing ſo dangerous and troubleſome a war, when a peace might have been concluded upon honourable and advantageous terms. The embaſſadors being diſmiſſed, Julian, contrary to the advice of his officers, reſolved to advance farther into Perſia; but the army had no ſooner ſet out on their march, than, changing his mind, he began to think it more adviſeable to turn back, not by the way he came, the country on that ſide being laid waſte, but to take his rout along the banks of the Tigris; which he did accordingly, without ſo much as attempting to reduce Cteſiphon, though he had lain ſeveral days before it. He marched ſome time along the Tigris, which he had on his left, being conducted by guides well acquainted with the country; but who in the end betrayed him: for, as they were natives of Perſia, they perſuaded him to quit the river, and take a quite different rout, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of Hormiſda, and all the officers of the army; who, looking upon the guides as perſons ſent by the enemy on purpoſe to lead them into ſome ſnare, did all that lay in their power to divert Julian from following their advice; but he, repoſing in them an entire confidence, reſolved not only to leave the Tigris, but to burn his fleet, leſt the enemy ſhould become maſters of it. This reſolution alarmed the whole army, but was nevertheleſs put immediately

He rejects propoſals of peace.

He turns back without making any attempt upon Cteſiphon.

Deceived by treacherous guides, he burns his fleet.

[x] Ammian. p. 278. Liban. p. 319 Zoſ. p. 726. [y] Ammian. p. 281.

diately in execution, only twelve ſmall veſſels being ſpared, which were to be conveyed over land in waggons, to make bridges, if there ſhould be occaſion. When the fleet was ſet on fire, the army began to mutiny, and cry out with one voice, That the emperor was betrayed; that the pretended guides were real traitors, ſent by the enemy on purpoſe to lead them to deſtruction. Julian, to appeaſe the ſoldiery, ordered the guides to be put to the rack, when they owned themſelves to be what they really were, confeſſing, that, in adviſing him to burn the fleet, they had no other deſign but to ruin him and the army. Hereupon great care was taken to extinguiſh the fire, and ſave the ſhips; but the flames could by no means be overcome, till the whole fleet, except the above-mentioned twelve veſſels, was reduced to aſhes. After this, Julian purſued his march through a country, ſays Ammianus, very fruitful in itſelf, but ravaged and laid waſte by the enemy; inſomuch, that the Romans were reduced to the laſt extremity for want of proviſions, and at the ſame time haraſſed without intermiſſion by ſtrong parties, who, in a manner ſurrounding them, attacked them ſometimes in the front, and ſometimes in the rear. Julian, not knowing what rout to take in a ſtrange country and finding his army quite diſpirited, ſummoned a council of all the chief officers of the army, when, after many conſultations, they reſolved to march towards Corduene which lay ſouth of Armenia, and belonged to the Romans. Purſuant to this reſolution, they ſet forward on the ſixteenth of June; but had not marched far, when they diſcovered at ſome diſtance a very numerous army advancing in full march againſt them. This was the Perſian army, commanded by the king in perſon, attended by two of his ſons, and all the nobility of the kingdom. The Romans thought it adviſeable to return to their camp, where they were, in a manner, beſieged the next day by the numerous troops of the enemy. Several ſkirmiſhes happened on that and the ten following days, in which the Perſians were conſtantly put to flight. In a ſharp encounter on the twenty-ſecond of June, almoſt the whole Perſian army engaged; but were, after a very vigorous reſiſtance, put to the rout with great ſlaughter. The Romans remained maſters of the field; but found little ſatisfaction in a victory which could not relieve their wants in a ſtrange country, where no proviſions were to be had, the corn, graſs and every thing elſe, being burnt up by the enemy. Julian himſe

Is reduced to great ſtreights.

Puts the Perſians to flight.

But diſtreſſed for want of proviſions.

[z] Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 281. Liban. p. 301. Zonar. p. 23.

himſelf laboured under the greateſt perplexity and uneaſineſs imaginable, finding the Perſians were reſolved to oppoſe his march, and attempt all means to diſtreſs him, without ever coming to a general engagement. At length, the night preceding the twenty-ſixth of June, as he roſe, according to his cuſtom, about midnight, and was buſied in his tent in reading or writing, he beheld all on a ſudden before him, with a countenance full of ſorrow, the ſpectre repreſenting the genius of the empire, which had appeared to him, as we have related elſewhere, upon his being declared emperor. He was ſomewhat terrified at this unexpected ſight, and at other omens which happened at the ſame time, and were looked upon by the aruſpices as portending ſome great misfortune, if he ſhould undertake any thing that day. But Julian, deſpiſing, contrary to his cuſtom, the predictions of his ſoothſayers, as ſoon as it was day, ordered his army to decamp, being probably no longer able to ſubſiſt in the ſame place. On his march he was attacked on all ſides by the enemy, who, after they had diſcharged their arrows, which never failed doing great execution, retired, without giving him an opportunity of revenging the death of thoſe who fell. In one of theſe ſudden onſets, the emperor haſtening, without his armour, to repulſe the enemy, was mortally wounded by a dart, which, through his arm and ſide, pierced his very liver. Thoſe who were about him, concluding, from his ſinking down upon the neck of his horſe, that he was wounded, conveyed him with all ſpeed upon a large ſhield to his tent, where Oribaſus, a celebrated phyſician and his intimate friend, attempted in vain to ſave him, applying the beſt remedies his art and ſkill could ſuggeſt. However, as the pain began to abate, he called for his arms and horſe, being deſirous to animate his men with his preſence; but his ſtrength not anſwering his courage, as he was greatly weakened by the loſs of blood, he was forced to continue in his tent, while his men filled with rage and breathing revenge, made a dreadful havock of the enemy, till night put an end to the ſlaughter. Fifty Perſian lords of great diſtinction were killed, and an incredible number of other officers and common ſoldiers. The Romans loſt Anatolius, who was magiſter officiorum, and generally eſteemed an officer of great ſkill and experience. The prefect Salluſt was with much-ado ſaved with his apparitors; but Phoſphorius, his vicar, was ſlain, with many others in the right wing, where the emperor commanded. While the fight continued, Julian lay languiſhing in his tent; and being appriſed that his end approached, he addreſſed thoſe about him, who ſeemed greatly dejected and concerned, in the following terms: "I am now, my fellow-ſoldiers, cal-

And haraſſed on his march by the Perſian army, and mortally wounded

His ſpeech before his death. "led upon to pay the laſt debt of nature, which I do with a "willing and chearful mind, being taught by philoſophy, "that the ſtate of the ſoul is infinitely more happy than that "of the body. Upon this conſideration, I embrace death as "the greateſt bleſſing: it exempts me from the many dan-"gers to which my virtue and reputation were daily expo-"ſed. I have lived, firſt in a private, and afterwards in an "exalted, ſtate, and have ſo behaved in both, as not to be "conſcious to my ſelf of any action, that gives me at preſent "the leaſt remorſe. I have ſtudied to govern with mode-"ration, and being well appriſed, that the end of all govern-"ment is the happineſs of the people, I have, both in "peace and war, endeavoured, as far as in me lay, to ren-"der them happy. I have great reaſon to thank Divine "Providence, for not having ſuffered me to fall by the hands "of conſpirators; to languiſh under a long and troubleſome "diſeaſe; or to die like a criminal, as many innocent "and deſerving perſons have done. I ſubmit with joy to "the eternal and immutable degrees of the gods, though in "the bloom of my age, being ſenſible, that he who is fond "of life, when he ought to die, is as great a coward, as he "who deſires to die when he ought to live. As for my ſuc-"ceſſor, I decline naming any, leſt, through ignorance, I "ſhould paſs by a worthy perſon, or, by naming one equal to "ſo great a truſt, expoſe him to thoſe dangers, which would "inevitably attend his promotion, if it were not univerſally "approved of. I therefore leave the choice to the common "wealth, and, like a dutiful ſon, wiſh her a worthy gover-"nor to ſucceed me." Having thus ſpoken, he diſpoſed of his private eſtate, dividing it amongſt his relations and friends; and not ſeeing Anatolius, enquired after him. Salluſt the prefect told him he was happy, meaning he was dead, according to the expreſſion then in uſe; which ſeemed greatly to affect him; but turning immediately to the philoſophers Maximus and Priſcus, he began to diſcourſe with them concerning the nature of the ſoul: then, calling for a glaſs of cold water, he drank it, and having expreſſed his deſire of being interred at Tarſus in Cilicia, he expired on the Julian dies. twenty-ſixth of June, a little before midnight. He died in the thirty-ſecond year of his age, after having reigned ſeven years and ſix months, from the time he had been created Cæſar; about three years ſince he had taken the title of Auguſtus, and only twenty months, not quite complete, ſince,

by

by the death of Conſtantius, he became peaceable poſſeſſor of the whole empire. Thus is his death related by Ammianus Marcellinus, who ſerved under him in this very expedition, and was an eye-witneſs of what he wrote [a]. Theodoret tells us, that Julian, when he was firſt wounded, filled his hand with blood iſſuing from the wound, and threw it up into the air, crying out, Thou haſt conquered, O Galilean [b]. The ſame thing is related by Sozomen, who is of opinion, that our Saviour, whom he intended to inſult and blaſpheme with the name of Galilean, appeared to him when he received his wound [c]. But theſe, as well as other chriſtian writers, have been led, by their averſion to an apoſtate from the faith, and a perſecutor of the church, to believe and relate many things concerning him, which were unknown to the pagans, and have all the appearance of fables. Libanius writes, that, at the time of his death, a dreadful earthquake happened in Paleſtine, which entirely ruined ſeveral cities [d]. His body was conveyed by Procopius from Meſopotamia to Tarſus in Cilicia, where it was interred with the uſual ſolemnity [e]; but afterwards transferred from thence, according to Zonaras [f] and Cedrenus [g], to Conſtantinople, and depoſited, with that of Jovian his ſucceſſor, in the porch of the church of the Apoſtles. This tranſlation muſt have happened after the fifth century, ſince Zoſimus has not mentioned it. As for the character of Julian, he was, without all doubt, endowed with extraordinary parts, a great lover of learned men, and himſelf well verſed in moſt branches of literature [h]. Ammianus greatly extols his moderation and the mildneſs of his temper, no leſs oppoſite to that of his brother Gallus, than the temper of Titus was to that of Domitian [i]. He could never endure the title of dominus or lord, though common to all princes ever ſince the time of Dioclefian, and had even ſome thoughts of quitting the diadem, which, for many years, had been looked upon as one of the badges of the ſovereign power [k]. He made it his chief ſtudy to eaſe the people, leſſening the taxes throughout the empire, and exacting no more than was abſolutely neceſſary for the defence and ſupport of the ſtate [l]. All the cities uſed, purſuant to an antient cuſtom, to preſent the new prince with crowns of gold, ſome of which weighed a thouſand, and ſome two thouſand, ounces, and upwards; but Julian enacted a law, forbidding any city, however rich or populous, to offer a crown weighing above ſeventy ounces. He would not ſuffer his officers or miniſters to receive preſents from the people, upon any conſideration whatſoever; nor the ſoldiers to injure in the leaſt the ſubjects or allies of the empire, through whoſe country they marched [m]. Libanius ſpeaks much at length of the extraordinary care he took in regulating the public carriages, in chuſing worthy magiſtrates, in clearing the high-ways of robbers, and in relieving ſeveral cities, reduced by heavy taxes to a moſt miſerable condition [n]. His bed, ſays Mamertinus, was as pure and chaſte as that of a veſtal virgin [o]; and Ammianus, that he was an utter ſtranger to all unlawful pleaſures, and a declared enemy to lewdneſs and debauchery [p]. He was generous, adds the ſame author, valiant, ſincere in his friendſhip, and kind to all, eſpecially to ſuch as were in diſtreſs, and moſt wanted his aſſiſtance [q]. Prudentius ſpeaks of him as a prince who deſerved well of the empire, both as a general and a law-giver [r]. He was not, however, even in the opinion of his admirers, without ſome faults. Ammianus owns him to have been of a fickle and changeable temper, ambitious beyond meaſure of popular applauſe, elated with the leaſt ſucceſs, and talkative to ſuch a degree, that his tongue never lay ſtill [s]. The ſame writer accuſes him of cruelty and ingratitude, in condemning Urſula, to whom he owed the greateſt obligations; and Libanius, though highly prejudiced in his favour, cannot help allowing him to have been ſuperſtitious to exceſs, inconſiderate on many occaſions, and too much addicted to his own ſentiments [t]. Ammianus blames the cenſorious temper, which he betrayed in a manner unworthy of a philoſopher, and below the dignity of a prince, in his miſopogon, and his Cæſars, not ſparing even the excellent emperor M. Aurelius. The pagan writers themſelves, namely Eutropius [u], Themiſtius [w], and Ammianus Marcellinus [x], own, that his conduct towards the chriſtians was repugnant to the laws of humanity, and deſerved to

His character.

[a] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 287—295. [b] Theodoret. l. iii. c. 20. p. 658. [c] Soz. l. vi. c. 2. p. 638. [d] Liban. vit. p. 45. & orat. xi. p. 258. [e] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 305. [f] Zonar. p. 24. [g] Cedren. p. 78. Vide Cange urb. Conſtantinop. deſcrip. l. iv. p. 110. [h] Vict. epit. p. 545. [i] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 63. & l. xxii. p. 221. [k] Liban. orat. xii. p. 305. [l] Ammian. l. xvi. xvii. xviii. p. 63. 90. 114.

[m] Liban. p. 305. [n] Idem. p. 296—298. [o] Panegyr. xi. p. 230. [p] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 292. [q] Idem ibid. [r] Prud. apol. c. 4. p. 163. [s] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 206. [t] Liban. orat. xii. p. 304. [u] Eutrop. p. 589 [w] Themiſt. orat. v. p. 69. [x] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 222. & l. xxv. p. 294.

to be buried in oblivion; which is more than a chriſtian writer of our days ſeems willing to allow. As for the chriſtian writers of antient times, they repreſent Julian as one inclined to, and guilty of, the moſt enormous crimes; but craftily diſguiſing them with a falſe ſhew of the oppoſite virtues. In theſe colours the reader will find his portrait drawn by Socrates in his eccleſiaſtic hiſtory [y], and by Gregory Nazianzen in the oration he wrote a few days after Julian's death [z]. But whether the pagans were quite unbiaſſed by favour, and the chriſtians by prejudice, is what we ſubmit to the judgment of the reader. We will not take upon us to queſtion the truth of what the panegyriſts and admirers of Julian have written concerning his other virtues; but, as to his chaſtity, we are not fully convinced, that it deſerved thoſe mighty encomiums, which Mamertinus [a], Libanius [b], and Ammianus Marcellinus [c], have been pleaſed to beſtow upon it; for on one ſide it is certain, that by Helena, his only wife, he had but one ſon, whom the midwife, bribed by the empreſs Euſebia, deſtroyed as ſoon as born [d]. On the other ſide, Julian himſelf, in a letter which he wrote in 363, that is, three years after the death of Helena, mentions his children, and the perſon who was charged with the care of their education [e]. Codin likewiſe, in his antiquities of Conſtantinople, takes notice of ſeveral ſtatues erected to Julian, and his children [f]. His bed therefore, to uſe the expreſſion of Mamertinus [g], was not perhaps quite ſo pure and undefiled as that of a veſtal virgin. The great Chryſoſtom deſcribes the court of Julian, while he reſided at Conſtantinople, crouded with aruſpices, aſtrologers, magicians, young debauchees, and public proſtitutes. The latter, at leaſt, were not proper attendants for one, who pretended to rival the purity of the veſtals. But we will not lay any ſtreſs on the teſtimony of a chriſtian, and conſequently, as may be objected, a prejudiced writer, though he ſolemnly declares, that he himſelf, and all the inhabitants of Conſtantinople, to whom he appeals, were eye-witneſſes of what he advances [h]. As for Julian's ſo much boaſted moderation, Ammianus himſelf acknowledges, that it was ſometimes owing more to policy, than to the natural mildneſs of his temper [i]. Libanius charges him with want of judgment in the choice of miniſters, and of due care in watching ing their conduct; whence ſome of them, concludes that writer, brought no ſmall diſgrace upon his government [k]. Libanius writes, that Julian was appriſed of, but winked at, their faults, that he might not ſeem inconſtant in his friendſhip [l]. Ammianus owns, that his court was not quite free from bribery and corruption [m]. In what related to the Divinity, ſays the ſame writer, he was rather ſuperſtitious than religious, ſacrificing daily innumerable victims procured at a vaſt expence; which proved very burdenſome to the ſtate, and at the ſame time highly prejudicial to the military diſcipline, the ſoldiers, with whom he feaſted on the victims, returning almoſt every day drunk to their quarters [n]. Had he returned victorious from his Perſian expedition, continues the ſame writer, he would ſcarce have left a bullock alive in the whole empire [o]. We need not therefore recur to the teſtimony of the chriſtian writers, to ſhew, that the many virtues aſcribed to him by the pagans, were not without the allay of ſeveral vices and imperfections. In ſhort, he did not perhaps deſerve the bitter reproaches with which he was traduced as the worſt of princes by the chriſtians, nor the mighty encomiums beſtowed upon him as the beſt of princes by the pagans.

[y] Socrat. l. iii. c. 21. p. 193. [z] Greg. Naz. orat. iv. p. 138. [a] Panegyr. xi. p. 230. [b] Liban. orat. xii. p. 292. [c] Ammian l. xxv. p. 292. [d] Idem, l. xvi. p. 72. [e] Julian. ep. 40. p. 184. [f] Codin. antiq. Conſt. p. 19. [g] Panegyr. xi. p. 231. [h] Chry. in gent. p. 676. [i] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 226, 227.

THE news of his death was received with inexpreſſible joy by the chriſtians, and with the deepeſt concern by the pagans. The meſſenger who brought it to Carrhæ, was either ſtoned to death by the populace [w], or with much-ado eſcaped the fury of the enraged multitude [x]. Several cities placed the image of the deceaſed prince amongſt thoſe of their gods, and paid it the ſame honours. Libanius, tranſported with grief when he firſt heard of his death, determined to lay violent hands on himſelf, not caring to outlive him; but, upon ſecond thoughts, he changed his mind, and choſe to live, that he might have the ſatisfaction, as he himſelf tells us, of compiling his funeral oration. He wrote two diſcourſes on this occaſion, the one to expreſs his own grief [y], the other to ſet forth the praiſes of Julian [z]. From the latter, which contains the whole hiſtory of Julian's life, and from the two orations written much about the ſame time, and on the ſame ſubject, by Gregory Nazianzen, an impartial reader will conclude, that both writers were ſtrangely biaſſed and prejudiced, the one

[k] Eutrop. p. 519. [l] Liban. p. 307. [m] Idem, p. 220.
[n] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 294. [o] Idem, l. xxii. p. 225. [w] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 733. [x] Lib. or. xii. p. 330. [y] Lib. or. xi.
[z] Idem, or. xii.

one in his favour, the other againſt him. Julian not only renounced the chriſtian religion, whence he was ſurnamed the Apoſtate, but betrayed a mortal hatred to thoſe who profeſſed it, traducing them with the name of Galileans, as he impiouſly ſtyled our Saviour the Galilean, debarring them from all honours and employments, both civil and military, and prohibiting them either to teach or learn the ſciences, which to Ammianus himſelf ſeemed inconſiſtent with the laws of humanity [a]. But we refer our readers to the eccleſiaſtic writers for a more particular account of the perſecution he raiſed againſt the church, and of his wild attempt to reſtore Judaiſm, and rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem, which is ſaid, by Ammianus and others, to have been miraculouſly defeated by balls of fire iſſuing out of the earth, and deſtroying both the work and the workmen. Of the ſeveral writers who flouriſhed unper Julian, the reader will find a ſuccinct account in note (I).

[a] Ammian. l. xxii. p. 222. & l. xxv. or. 294.

(I) Ammianus Marcellinus, in his hiſtory of the emperors, gives us a more particular account of Julian's reign, than any other writer. As he was a pagan, he beſtows great encomiums upon a prince who did all that lay in his power to reſtore paganiſm. However, he was not ſo prejudiced in his favour, as not to blame in him what he thought blame-worthy. Eunapius, a moſt zealous ſtickler for the antient religion of the Romans, that is, for idolatry, often mentions and highly commends Julian in his hiſtory of the ſophiſts. He had written the hiſtory of his reign in ſeveral books (1); but whether that was a different work from his general hiſtory of the emperors, is what we are no-where told. But of Ammianus Marcellinus and Eunapius, we ſhall ſpeak at the end of the reign of Valens. Calliſtus, one of Julian's officers, wrote in verſe, according to Socrates (2), the hiſtory of that prince; but his work has not reached our times. Voſſius tells us, that Calliſtus attended Julian in his Perſian expedition (3), which muſt be a conjecture of his own; for we find no ſuch thing in Socrates, the only writer who mentions him. Julian himſelf deſerves to be ranked among the writers of his life; for he wrote the hiſtory of his wars in Gaul (4), which has been long ſince loſt; and gives us an account of the moſt remarkable paſſages of his life in his Miſopogon, in his letter to the Athenians, (of which two pieces we have ſpoken above) and in

(1) Eunap. c. 5. p. 76, 77. (2) Socr. l. iii. c. 21. p. 195. (3) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. iv. c. 18. p. 486. (4) Lib. or. v. p. 178.

in the writings which he publiſhed in the year 362, the one upon Cybele, the other againſt a Cynic philoſopher (5). He wrote another diſcourſe againſt the Cynics, particularly againſt one Heraclius or Heraclitus (6). From that piece it appears, that he was ſtrangely importuned by thoſe philoſophers, and that he entertained no better opinion of them, than of the chriſtian monks, to whom he compares them. His diſcourſe to Themiſtius is, properly ſpeaking, a letter, in which he anſwers that philoſopher, who had written to him from Conſtantinople, magnifying the hopes and expectation of the people, in ſeeing one raiſed to the empire, who profeſſed the ſtudy of philoſophy. Julian tells him in his anſwer, that when he reflects on the duties incumbent on a prince, and the great difficulty of diſcharging them well, the mighty hopes that the world entertained of him, ſerved rather to diſhearten than encourage him (7). This is the whole ſubject of the letter, which ſeems to have been written ſoon after Julian was raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar. In the manuſcript copy of this letter are ſeveral paſſages, which ſeem quite foreign to the purpoſe, and are thought by ſome to be fragments of a treatiſe, containing ſeveral inſtructions, addreſſed to a pagan pontiff, concerning the duties of his office (8). Petavius is of opinion, that they were addreſſed to Arſaces, pontiff of Galatia, to whom Julian wrote his forty-ninth letter (9). But the moſt famous of all Julian's works is that intituled the Cæſars, which in reality is a ſatire on all the emperors from Julius Cæſar to Conſtantine and his children. It begins with a kind of dialogue (10). From the injurious and abuſive manner he ſpeaks of Conſtantine, we may conclude, that he wrote it after the death of Conſtantius, or at leaſt after he had openly declared againſt him. Socrates aſcribes to a vanity, unworthy of a prince, his thus ridiculing all his predeceſſors, without ſparing even M. Aurelius (11), whom he had propoſed to himſelf for his pattern (12). Voſſius aſſures us (13), that in the antient copies this work is ſtyled Saturnalia, and the banquet; a title which well ſuits it; for it was written during the Saturnalia, or the feaſts of Saturn, that is, about the end of December, in 361, or 362, and Julian in the work introduces Romulus entertaining the gods at a banquet in the time of the Saturnalia (14). But Suidas ſuppoſes the Cæſars and the Saturnalia to be two different works, and quotes ſome things out of the latter, which are not to be found in the former (15). Julian himſelf ſpeaks of

(5) Julian. or. vii. p. 382. Suid. p. 1248. (6) Julian. ibid. p. 716—718. (7) Julian. ad Themiſt. p. 490, &c. (8) Idem, frag. p. 528. (9) Julian. ep. xlix. p. 202. (10) Idem, Cæſ. p. 3—5. (11) Socr. l. iii. c. 1. & 23. p. 179, 198. (12) Julian. ad Themiſt. p. 466. (13) Voſſ. hiſt. Græc. l. ii. c. 18. p. 250. (14) Julian. Cæſ. p. 3—5 (15) Suid. p. 1247.

of his Saturnalia as addreſſed to Salluſt (16), which cannot be ſaid of the Cæſars. He quotes the former work in a diſcourſe which he wrote on the ſun, and likewiſe inſcribed to Salluſt. This piece he compoſed in three nights, perhaps about the twenty-fifth of December, when the pagans celebrated the feaſt of the ſun; for Julian honoured that luminary as his chief deity (17). Suidas aſcribes two other works to him, the one on the three figures, which he does not explain, and the other on the origin of evils; but both theſe works, as well as that which he wrote againſt the chriſtians, have been long ſince loſt. He wrote ſeveral letters, of which ſixty-four have reached our times, not counting thoſe which, by reaſon of their length, have been ranked among his diſcourſes. Libanius, who pretends to have brought the epiſtolary ſtyle to its greateſt perfection, ſhares that glory with Julian, the elegance of whoſe letters he greatly commends and admires (18). Under Julian flouriſhed Proereſes, a chriſtian ſophiſt, highly eſteemed for his learning and eloquence. Eunapius, who was his diſciple, gives us the following account of him: He was a native of Armenia, deſcended of a noble family, but reduced to poverty; exceeding well-ſhaped, though of a gigantic ſtature, and reſembling a coloſſus (19). He left his native country when very young, and ſtudied firſt at Antioch, under one Ulpianus, and afterwards at Athens, where he was diſciple to one Julian, who in dying bequeathed him his houſe. He likewiſe ſucceeded Julian in his employment, and taught eloquence with ſuch reputation and applauſe, that the other profeſſors, jealous of his great credit, prevailed upon the proconſul to baniſh him from Athens (20); but he was ſoon recalled by the emperor's order, and reſtored to his former employment. All thoſe who came from Pontus, and the other parts of Aſia Minor, or from Egypt and Libya, ſtudied under him (21). Among theſe we may reckon the great Baſil and Gregory Nazianzen; for they came from Cappadocia to ſtudy eloquence at Athens while he taught there. He was afterwards invited into Gaul by Conſtans, who received him with extraordinary marks of eſteem, perhaps becauſe he paſſed for a chriſtian, ſays Eunapius (22); but St. Jerom aſſures us, that he was truly a chriſtian (23). Suidas confounded Conſtantine with Conſtans, when he wrote, that Conſtantine paid him great honours (24). The Gauls, ſays Eunapius, who were no judges of his genius, nor capable of reliſhing his eloquent ſpeeches, admired his ſtature and mein, and, above all, his patience in bearing the cold of their country, though he uſed no ſhoes, (16) Julian. ibid. p. 303. & or iv. p. 294. (17) Idem, or. iv. p. 291, 292. (18) Lib. or. v. p. 184. (19) Eunap. c. 1. p. 102. (20) Idem, c. 7. p. 96—101. (21) Idem. p. 110, 111. (22) Idem, p. 121, 122. (23) Hier. ad ann. 363. (24) Suid. p. 596.

ſhoes, and was only defended againſt the inclemency of that climate by a thin cloak (25). He was afterwards ſent by Conſtan to Rome, where the ſenate cauſed a ſtatue to be erected to him with this inſcription; Rome, the queen of cities, to the king o eloquence. When he left Rome, about the year 349, to retur to Athens, Conſtans beſtowed great revenues upon him, with the honorary title of general of the Roman armies. The Romans upon his departure, begged him to ſend one of his diſciples tc teach eloquence at Rome. He complied with their requeſt, an ſent them one Euſebius, a native of Alexandria; a perſon fit tc live at Rome, ſays Eunapius, becauſe well verſed in the art o flattery (26). Julian, who had, no boubt, been acquainted with Proereſes at Athens, wrote a very kind and obliging letter to him, which is ſtill extant (27). When that prince publiſhed the famous edict, forbiding all chriſtians to learn or teach the ſciences, he excepted Proereſes; but he, ſcorning to accept the favour, reſigned of his own accord his profeſſorſhip; which greatly provoked Julian, who, out of pique to Proereſes, heaped great honours upon Libanius (28). The generous conduct of Proereſes on this occaſion makes us queſtion the truth of what we read of him in Eunapius; viz. that he had recourſe to the pontiff of Eleuſine, to know whether Julian was to reign long; and that, being aſſured his reign would prove ſhort, he took courage, and reſolved not to renounce the chriſtian religion (29). Eunapius betrays on all occaſions ſuch an inveterate hatred againſt the chriſtian religion, that we cannot give credit to any thing he writes on that head. After the death of Julian, Proereſes was, it ſeems, re-inſtated in his profeſſorſhip, when Eunapius ſtudied under him for the ſpace of five years, and then returned to Lydia, his native country. He owns, that Proereſes inſtructed him with no leſs care than if he had been his own ſon. Proereſes died ſoon after, perhaps in 368, being then about ninety-two years old; for he was eighty-ſeven when Eunapius began to ſtudy under him, in the end of 363, which was the firſt of Jovian's reign (30). He left no works behind him, beſides his declamations (31). Oribaſus, a famous phyſician, was a native of Pergamus in Aſia, according to Eunapius (32); of Sardis, according to Philoſtorgius (33) and Suidas (34). He ſtudied phyſic under Zeno o Cyprus, to whom Julian wrote a letter, inviting him back to A lexandria; whence George, the famous Arian biſhop, had cauſe him to be baniſhed (35). When Julian was created Cæſar, h

tool

(25) Idem. p. 222, 223. (26) Idem, p. 25. (27) Ju lian. ep. ii. p. 116. (28) Suid. p. 596. (29) Eunap. c 8. p. 26. (30) Idem. ibid. (31) Suid. p, 59 (32) Eunap. c. 5. p. 76. & c. 19. p. 139. (33) Philoſ. vii. c. 15. p. 205. (34) Suid. p. 329. (35) Julian. ep xiv. p. 198.

took Oribaſus with him into Gaul, and repoſed ſuch confidence in him, ſays Eunapius (36), as to make him privy to his greateſt ſecrets, that is, to his idolatry; for Oribaſus was himſelf a pagan. The ſame author writes, that Oribaſus was famous, not only for his ſkill in phyſic, but for his other extraordinary talents, which procured the empire to Julian (37); but explains himſelf no farther. Oribaſus, at the requeſt of Julian, abridged, firſt, the works of Galen, and afterwards thoſe of all the moſt able phyſicians. Both theſe works were inſcribed to Julian, as appears from the prefaces, which have been tranſmitted to us by Photius (38). Photius prefers the ſecond work to the firſt; nay, and to all the books of phyſic which had been publiſhed till his time. It conſiſted of ſeventy books; but only the firſt fifteen, with the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth, printed at Paris in 1555, have reached our times. Oribaſus himſelf, by a ſecond abridgment, reduced his ſeventy books to nine, which he addreſſed to his ſon Euſtathius (39). The reader will find an abſtract of this work in Photius (40), who obſerves, that they may prove very uſeful to thoſe who are already acquainted with phyſic, by refreſhing the memory of what they have learnt; but may lead new beginners into great miſtakes (41). Oribaſus wrote another abridgment of the ſame nature in four books, which he inſcribed to Eunapius, probably the author of the lives of the ſophiſts, at whoſe requeſt he had undertaken it (42). This work is ſtill extant. To theſe Photius adds four other books of phyſic inſcribed to one Eugenius; but ſo like thoſe addreſſed to Eunapius, that he ſuſpects them to be a ſuppoſititious work (43). Beſides the works we have already mentioned, Photius ſuppoſes Oribaſus to have publiſhed ſeven more on the ſame ſubject (44). He would not have us to mind the ſtyle of that writer, becauſe his works, ſays he, are abſtracts of different authors; and beſides, elegancy of ſtyle is what we muſt not expect from a phyſician (45). Suidas ſuppoſes Oribaſus to have inſcribed to Julian ſeventy-two books, and to have publiſhed, beſides four books on the doubts and difficulties of phyſicians, a work on royalty, and another on maladies (46). He adds, that Oribaſus was created by Julian quæſtor of the city of Conſtantinople; an employment unknown to other writers. He attended Julian into Perſia, and did all that lay in his power to cure his wound, but without ſucceſs. After the death of that prince, his patron and benefactor, he was ſtripped of all his wealth, and baniſhed to the countries countries of the barbarians (47), or abandoned, to uſe the expreſſion of Eunapius, to the barbarians, who were moſt noted for their cruelty (48.) However, he was greatly reſpected by them, and honoured by their princes, on account of the art he profeſſed. At length the Roman emperors recalled him, and reſtored to him his eſtate and all his effects (49). He gave ſome eaſe to Chryſanthus in his laſt malady at Sardes; but could not cure him (50). He was ſtill living when Eunapius wrote the lives of the ſophiſts, that is, about the year 400. Among Julian's letters, there is one to him, written about the year 358 (51). Himeras, a celebrated ſophiſt in Julian's time, was a native of Bithynia, and the ſon of Aminius, who taught rhetoric at Pruſa in the ſame province (52). Himeras and Proereſes, of whom we have ſpoken above, were at the ſame time profeſſors of eloquence at Athens and rivals (53). Photius ſuppoſes him to have likewiſe taught at Corinth (54). Julian invited him afterwards to Conſtantinople, and received him upon his arrival with extraordinary marks of friendſhip and eſteem. He continued in court till the death of that prince, and then returned to Athens (55). He lived to a great age, in which he loſt his ſight, and was beſides afflicted with a leproſy. He left behind him ſeveral declamations, and other pieces of that nature (56). He was, as plainly appears from his writings, a pagan. Eunapius commends his ſtyle (57), as does likewiſe Photius, who has tranſmitted to us abſtracts of ſome of his works (58). In the hiſtory of Julian's reign, we have mentioned the philoſopher Maximus, who firſt inclined that prince to idolatry and the ſtudy of magic. He was a native, either of Smyrna, as we read in Eunapius (59); or of Epheſus, as Ammianus will have it (60); and brother to the philoſopher Claudianus, who taught at Alexandria, and to the ſophiſt Nymphidianus, profeſſor of rhetoric at Smyrna, and afterward ſecretary to Julian. Maximus muſt have been well verſed in polite learning, ſince Julian ſubmitted all his compoſitions to his judgment (61); and Eunapius has placed his life among thoſe of the ſophiſts, tho' he is commonly ſtyled Maximus the philoſopher. Julian invited him to court about the beginning of the year 362, where he behaved, as Eunapius himſelf owns owns (62), in a manner altogether unworthy of a philoſopher. He returned to his native country, as appears from Julian's letters (*) for the recovery of his health; but came again to court, and, together with Priſcus, attended Julian in his Parthian expedition (63). Theſe two were, without all doubt, in the number of thoſe obſtinate and ignorant philoſophers, who, according to Ammianus, bore great ſway at court, and put the emperor upon that wild enterprize, againſt the ſentiments of the officers of the army (64). Hence, when news of Julian's death was brought to Antioch, the people, in the tranſports of their joy, cried out, Thus are the predictions of the falſe prophet Maximus fulfilled (65). Eunapius writes, that Jovian continued to honour Maximus, and the other philoſophers, who had followed Julian (66). Be that as it will, they were treated in a very different manner by Valentinian and Valens, who hated all the friends of Julian; and, above the reſt, theſe two philoſophers accuſed, as they were addicted to the ſtudy of magic, of having brought upon the princes the maladies with which they were both ſeized about the beginning of April in 364 (67). Priſcus, however, was cleared; but the ſoldiery and populace were, with much ado, reſtrained by Salluſtius Secundus from tearing Maximus to pieces. Having eſcaped the rage of the multitude, he was condemned to pay a greater fine than he was able to diſcharge, and kept a cloſe priſoner till the end of the year 365 (68); when, by the mediation of Themiſtius, who recommended him to Valens, in a ſpeech pronounced before that prince, and by the intereſt of Clearchus, a zealous pagan, he was ſet at liberty, and not only forgiven the fine, but reſtored to his eſtate, and ſuffered to come to Conſtantinople, where he was very well received (69). But his happineſs was ſhort-lived; for he was accuſed, with ſeveral other philoſophers, as a magician in 371, found guilty of magical practices; and, being ſentenced to death with the reſt, was beheaded at Epheſus the ſame year (70). Suidas aſcribes to Maximus, the maſter of Julian the apoſtate, ſeveral rhetorical and philoſophical pieces, ſome of which were addreſſed to Julian himſelf; but adds, that he was a native of Epirus or Byzantium (71): on the other hand, Socrates warns us not to confound Maximus of Byzantium, the father of Euclid, with Maximus of Epheſus, who induced induced Julian to embrace the worſhip of the gods (72). Chryſanthus was a native of Sardes in Lydia, in which city his father was ſenator. He ſtudied with Maximus under Edeſus of Cappadocia, a Platonic philoſopher and magician; and then returned to his native city, where he continued, notwithſtanding the repeated and preſſing ſolicitations of Julian and Maximus, inviting him to court. Julian created him pontiff of Lydia, in which employment he had the prudence not to diſoblige the chriſtians, as we have obſerved already; and therefore was ſuffered by the chriſtian emperors to live unmoleſted (73). He lived to the age of eighty (74). After his death, Eunapius, who was his wife's couſin, and had been his diſciple, wrote his life, and frequently mentions him in his hiſtory of the ſophiſts, which he had undertaken at his requeſt (75). Suidas likewiſe ſpeaks of him, but does not inform us whether or no he left any works behind him (76). Priſcus was born in the country of the Moloſſi, or Theſproti, in Epirus; and ſtudied under Edeſus, with Maximus and Chryſanthus. Afterwards he retired to Greece, whence he was invited by Julian to court, and complied with the invitation. He was perhaps more eſteemed by that prince than Maximus himſelf. He attended the emperor to Antioch, and there prevailed upon him to admit Libanius, to his preſence, and even to receive him in a friendly manner, though he was not a little prejudiced againſt him (77). He followed Julian into Perſia, and was accuſed, with Maximus, of magical practices under Valens; but diſcharged, and ſuffered to return to Greece, where he lived to the age of ninety, and upwards (78); and was killed, with many others, by the barbarians (79), that is, we ſuppoſe, by the Goths, who, in 395, or 396, ravaged Greece under the conduct of the famous Alaric. Julian in his letters, beſtows great commendations on one George, a receiver of the public revenues; on the philoſopher Eugenius, whom ſome take to be the father of Themiſtius; and on Ecebolus, under whom he ſtudied rhetoric (80). As the celebrated ſophiſt Libanius lived long after Julian's time, we ſhall ſpeak of him in a more proper place.

(36) Eunap. c. 29. p. 140. (37) Idem, ibid. (38) Phot. c. 216, 217. p. 556, 557. (39) Idem, c. 218. p. 557. (40) Idem, p. 560. (41) Oribaſ. p. 2. (42) Phot. c. 219. p. 561. (43) Idem, p. 564. & c. 216. p. 564. (44) Idem ibid. (45) Idem ibid. (46) Suid. p. 329.

(47) Philoſtorg. l. vii. c. 15. p. 105. (48) Eunap. c. 19. p. 140. (49) Idem, p. 141, 142. (50) Idem, c. 21. p. 160. (51) Julian. ep. xix. p. 135. (52) Phot. c. 165. p. 363. Eunap. c. 12. p. 129. (53) Eunap. c. 8. p. 119. (54) Phot. c. 165. p. 352. (55) Eunap. p. 129. (56) Idem c. 12 p. 129. Suid. p. 1239. (57) Eunap. p. 129. (58) Phot. c. 165. p. 352. & c. 243. p. 1076, 1144. (59) Eunap. c. 5. p. 67. & 16. p. 137. (60) Ammian. l. xxix. p. 390. (61) Julian. ep. xvi. p. 131.

(62) Eunap. c. 5. p 77, 79. (*) Julian. ep. xv. xvi. xxxviii. (63) Eunap. c. 5. p. 81. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 291. (64) Ammian. l. xxiii p. 245. (65) Theodoret. l. iii. c. 22. p. 659. (66) Eunap. c. 5. p. 82. (67) Zoſ. l. iv. p. 734, 735. (68) Idem, p. 374. Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 315. Eunap. c. 5. p. 83. Themiſt. or. vii. p. 100. (69) Themiſt. ibid. p. 99, 100. Eunap. p. 84—87. (70) Ammian. l. xxix. p. 390. Socr p. 39. Eunap. p. 87. (71) Suid. p. 92.

(72) Socr. l. iii. c. 1. p. 165. (73) Eunap. c. 5. p. 69, 80. & c. 12. p. 144—149. (74) Idem, p. 152. (75) Idem, p. 153. (76) Suid. p. 1155. (77) Eunap. c. 5. p. 59. Lib. vit. p. 42. (78) Eunap. ibid. c. 81. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 291. (79) Eunap. c. 5. p. 75. (80) Julian. ep. viii. p. 121, 314. ep. liv. p. 218. ep. xviii. p. 135. ep. xix. xliii. p. 136, 196.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Roman hiſtory, from the death of Julian, to the death of Valens.

THE death of Julian was no ſooner known, than the chief officers of the army aſſembled, and, with one conſent, choſe Jovian to ſucceed him [b], who was accordingly ſaluted with the title of Jovianus Auguſtus, the day after Julian's death; that is, the twenty-ſeventh of June of this year 363. He was the only ſurviving child of Verronianus, who was a native of Singidunum in Pannonia, or rather in Mœſia [c]; and had lately reſigned the eminent poſt of comes domeſticorum, to lead a private and retired life. He was reckoned one of the beſt commanders of his time, and the reputation, which he had acquired in the army, greatly contributed to the promotion of his ſon [d]. The firſt thing Jovian did after his election was, to name him for his collegue in the conſulſhip againſt the enſuing year; for Verronianus was ſaid to have been foretold in a dream, that his ſon ſhould be one day raiſed to the empire, and he to the conſulſhip; but he died before he had the honour of diſcharging that office, or the ſatisfaction of ſeeing his ſon emperor, though he had been informed of his promotion [e]. Jovian, or Flavius Claudius Jovianus, as he is ſtyled on an antient coin, was born about the year 331, and married Carito, the daughter of Lucillianus, a commander of great renown, often mentioned by Ammianus. By her he had, according to Philoſtorgius [f], a ſon named Verronianus, who was born about the time Jovian was created emperor, and a daughter, of whom we find no farther mention; nay, Zonaras tells us in expreſs terms, that Verronianus was his only child [g]. As Jovian was not only a true, but a pious and zealous, chriſtian, we ſhall not copy his character from the chriſtian writers, who may be ſuſpected of partiality, but from the pagans, who cannot be thought to have been biaſſed in his favour. Among theſe Eutropius commends his affable, mild, and generous temper; and adds, that no one could, with juſtice, accuſe him of neglect or imprudence in the diſcharge of his duty [h]. Ammianus Marcellinus [i] and Victor the younger [k] deſcribe him as well-ſhaped in his perſon, of a majeſtic air, of a gay and agreeable aſpect, of an even, affable, and courteous temper, naturally inclined to mercy, and a great encourager of learning, being himſelf pretty well acquainted with the ſciences. From the few officers he preferred during his ſhort reign, we may judge, adds Ammianus, how careful and circumſpect he would have been in the diſtribution of offices, had he lived longer. Themiſtius beſtows upon him ſtill greater encomiums [l]; but we lay no great ſtreſs upon them, as coming from a panegyriſt. On the other hand, Suidas [m] paints him in quite different colours, following therein, as we imagine, Eunapius, who, by his implacable hatred to the chriſtian religion, was often led into groſs miſtakes. Ammianus does not forget to mention his vices, as well as his virtues, telling us, that he was naturally timorous, a great eater, and much addicted to wine and women [n].

[b] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 226. [c] Vict. epit. [d] Ammian. ibid. p. 308. Themiſt. orat. v. p. 65. [e] Ammian. Themiſt. ibid. Socrat. l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. [f] Philoſtorg. l. viii. c. 8. p. 112. [g] Zon. p. 25.

Jovian's character.

The ſame author obſerves, that Jovian had a great reſpect and veneration for the law of the chriſtians [o]; and truly he had always made an open profeſſion of the chriſtian religion, even in the reign of Julian, deſpiſing both his threats and promiſes [p]. Socrates [q], Suidas [r], and Nicephorus [s], tell us, that Julian having ordered all the chriſtian officers in his army, either to renounce their religion, or quit the ſervice, Jovian, at that time tribune, reſigned his poſt without the leaſt heſitation; but Julian would not ſuffer him to retire, nay, he afterwards employed him in the Perſian war; for he was at the emperor's death, the firſt among thoſe officers who were ſtyled domeſtici [t]. Zoſimus writes, that he was raiſed to the empire by the chief officers, at the requeſt of the whole army [u]; for Suidas himſelf owns him to have been an excellent commander, though, at the time of his election, he was ſcarce thirty-two years old [w]. His promotion was no-ways agreeable to the pagans, as appears from the manner in which Ammianus Marcellinus ſpeaks of it. Rufinus [x], Socrates [y], Sozomen

[h] Eutrop. p. 589. [i] Ammian. p. 296. [k] Vict. p. 79. [l] Themiſt. orat. v. p. 63. [m] Suid. p. 1244. [n] Ammian. p. 300, 308. [o] Idem, l. xxi. p. 201. [p] Theodoret. l. iv. c. 1, p. 660. [q] Socrat. l. iii. c. 22. p. 195. [r] Suid. ibid. [s] Niceph. l. x. c. 38. p. 94. [t] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 226. [u] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 729. [w] Suid. ibid. [x] Ruf. l. xi. c. 1. p. 177. [y] Socrat. l. iii. c. 22. p. 195.

zomen [z], and Theodoret [a], aſſure us, that he would not accept the empire, and the command of the army, till all the ſoldiers had declared themſelves chriſtians, and ſolemnly renounced the impious ceremonies which they had practiſed under Julian; on which account he is honoured by Rufinus with the title of confeſſor. It is not therefore probable, that he paid any regard to the anſwer of thoſe, who, having conſulted, ſurely without his conſent, the entrails of the victims, promiſed ſafety, if the army decamped; but inevitable deſtruction if he continued in the ſame place [b]. The army was, as we have related, in a ſtrange country, far from home, with a provoked enemy round them, quite deſtitute of neceſſaries, and conſequently reduced to the neceſſity of periſhing, either with hunger, or by the arms of the incenſed Perſians. Jovian, who was obliged to ſtruggle with two ſuch formidable enemies, did not ſo much dread the latter as the former; nay, he repulſed the Perſians with great ſlaughter as often as they ventured to attack him, as Ammianus tells us in expreſs terms [c]; which is ſufficient to refute what Libanius writes of the great advantages gained over Jovian by the Perſians [d]. But the valour and experience of Jovian was no proof againſt the famine which raged in his camp, and would not have left one man alive in the whole army, had not heaven unexpectedly declared in his favour, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus, by inclining the enemy to offer conditions of peace at ſo critical a conjuncture [e]. That writer is of opinion, that the Perſians, out of mere pity and compaſſion, ſet on foot a treaty [f]; and Libanius cannot conceive what could induce them to think of a peace, when they had reaſon to promiſe themſelves the greateſt advantages from the continuation of the war [g]. The negotiations laſted four days, which proved more inſupportable to the Romans, ſays Ammianus [h], than the greateſt torments, by reaſon of the famine which raged in the camp. Beſides the dreadful extremity to which the army was reduced, Jovian was apprehenſive, and not without reaſon, of the deſigns of Procopius, Julian's kinſman. No wonder therefore that he ſubmitted to a peace upon terms diſhonourable, we own, in themſelves, but abſolutely neceſſary to extricate himſelf, and ſo many brave brave men, out of the difficulties, into which the temerity and imprudence of Julian had led them. A peace was agreed on for thirty, or, as Rufinus will have it [k], for twenty-nine, years, upon Jovian's promiſing to abandon and yield up to the Perſians the five provinces on the Tigris, which had been taken from them in the reign of Dioclefian, with ſeveral caſtles, and the cities of Niſibis and Singara. To this article was added another, in itſelf no leſs, if not more, ſhameful, which was, not to lend any aſſiſtance to Arſaces king of Armenia againſt the Perſians, though Arſaces was a faithful friend and ally of the empire. Jovian however, with much-ado, prevailed upon the king of Perſia to ſuffer the inhabitants of Niſibis and Singara to withdraw with their effects into the Roman territories [l]. The loſs of Niſibis, which was the bulwark of the empire againſt the Perſians, chiefly affected the Romans; and Ammianus takes great pains to exaggerate that loſs, in order to raiſe the public odium againſt Jovian, to whom he is favourable on no occaſion. Both that writer [m] and Eutropius [o] obſerve, that, from the foundation of Rome, no conſul or emperor had ever yielded to the enemy an inch of ground. But therein they are certainly miſtaken; for Adrian abandoned to the barbarians a far greater extent of country than Jovian. Aurelian relinquiſhed all the countries conquered by Trajan beyond the Danube; and Dioclefian an immenſe tract towards the borders of Egypt and Æthiopia, as Tiberius had done long before the large provinces, conquered at a vaſt expence of blood and treaſure by the brave Druſus. 'Tis true, that theſe countries were not given up by virtue of a treaty, but becauſe they could not be kept without an immenſe charge. However, if it was thought commendable in thoſe princes to abandon them on that ſcore, we ought not to join Ammianus and Eutropius in condemning Jovian for abandoning, even by treaty, provinces, which he could not keep, without expoſing to certain death or captivity, the flower of the whole forces of the empire, when the enemy would with great eaſe have conquered more than they acquired by the treaty. His giving up by treaty what others had abandoned of their own accord, does not render the action leſs neceſſary, nor conſequently leſs prudent. Ammianus pretends, that Jovian might have reached the province of Corduene belonging to the empire, in Jovian not be blamed for the peace concluded with the Perſians.

The army reduced to great ſtreights.

Jovian obliged to ſubmit to the terms propoſed by the Perſians.

[z] Soz. l. vi. c. 3, p. 635. [a] Theodor. l. iv c. 1. p. 660, 661 [b] Ammian. p. 297. [c] Idem. ibid. & p. 298. [d] Lib. or. xii. p. 324. [e] Ammian. p. 299. [f] Idem ibid. [g] Lib. pro templis, &c. p. 24, 25. [h] Ammian. ibid. [i] Idem l. xxiii. p. 240.

[k] Ruf. p. 177. [l] Ammian. p. 300. Zoſ. p. 730. Ruf. p. 177. Greg. Naz. orat. iv. p. 118. [m] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 303. [n] Idem, p. 205. [o] Eutrop. p. 731.

in the four days which he ſpent in negotiations [p]. But between them and that province flowed the Tigris, which even after the peace, and when oppoſed by no enemy, they paſſed with the utmoſt difficulty, and not without the loſs of many perſons, who were carried away by the violence of the ſtream, as Ammianus himſelf informs us [q]. Zoſimus ſuppoſes them to have paſſed the Tigris before the treaty [r]; but his authority is of no weight when he diſagrees with Ammianus, who ſerved in this expedition. Between the Tigris and Corduene lay a deſert ſeventy miles in extent, deſtitute of all ſorts of proviſions, even of water, which reduced them to the neceſſity of feeding upon their horſes, and conſequently of leaving behind them great part of their baggage and arms [s]. Libanius owns, that moſt of them returned without either arms or money [t]. What therefore muſt have become of them, had they at the ſame time been inceſſantly haraſſed by a formidable enemy? Agathias, who lived two hundred years after, writes, that Jovian, impatient to get out of the Perſian dominions, betrayed Niſibis [u]; but Eutropius, who was an eye-witneſs of what he writes, does not indeed approve of the peace; but owns, that it was neceſſary [w]: and Philoſtorgius, a chriſtian writer, but an Arian, and conſequently noways favourable to Jovian, tells us, that there was no other means of ſaving the army, already reduced to the tenth part [x]. The only thing Eutropius blames in Jovian, is his faithfully obſerving the articles, to which neceſſity alone obliged him to ſubmit, inſtead of following the example of the antient Romans, who never ſcrupled to break a diſadvantageous treaty, extorted from them by force or fear [y]. But his religiouſly executing the articles of a treaty, however diſadvantageous, when he was under no other reſtraint but that of his oath, reflects no leſs honour on him, than glory on the religion which he profeſſed. He was not acquainted with the maxim, which, to the great diſgrace of our religion, prevails now-a-days with the moſt chriſtian princes, that no treaties, how ſolemnly ſoever entered into, are binding, when the leaſt advantage may be reaped from the breach of them; as if perjury were not a crime of as deep a dye in the greateſt prince, as in the meaneſt of the people. We ſhall now reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

He obſerves the articles with great exactneſs.

[p] Ammian. p. 300. [q] Idem. p. 301. 302. [r] Zoſ. p. 730. [s] Ammian. ibid. [t] Lib. orat. xii. p. 325. [u] Agath. l. iv. p. 135, 136. [w] Eutrop. p. 589. [x] Philoſt. l. viii. c. 1. p. 106. [y] Eutrop. p. 589.

JOVIAN, after the concluſion of the treaty, purſued his retreat; and having paſſed the Tigris and the above-mentioned deſert, without being in the leaſt moleſted by the enemy, he arrived at Ur, a Perſian fortreſs between the Tigris and the city of Niſibis, where he was met by Caſſianus governor of Meſopotamia, and Mauritius a tribune, with ſuch proviſions as the army commanded by Procopius and Sebaſtian could ſpare them; for he had ſent the two former officers to acquaint the latter with the extremity to which he was reduced [z]. From Ur he diſpatched meſſengers into Illyricum and Gaul, with the news of Julian's death, and his own promotion. At the ſame time he appointed Lucillianus his father-in-law commander in chief of the horſe and foot in Illyricum and Italy, and Malericus general of the troops in Gaul, in the room of Jovinus [a]. Then, continuing his march, he entered at laſt the Roman territories at a place called Thiſalphata, and was there met by Procopius and Sebaſtian, who commanded the army which Julian had left in Meſopotamia. The emperor received them in a very obliging manner, and ſoon after ſent Procopius, who was Julian's kinſman, to attend the corſe of that prince to Tarſus, in the ſuburbs of which city he was buried, purſuant to the orders he had given a little before he expired. When the funeral ceremonies were over, Procopius privately withdrew from Tarſus; and, tho' diligent ſearch was made after him in all parts of the empire, he never could be heard of, till he aſſumed the purple in 365 [b]. From Thiſalphata the emperor advanced to Niſibis; but encamped without the walls, though greatly importuned by the inhabitants to lodge in the palace, as his predeceſſors had always done. He was aſhamed, ſays Ammianus, to enter a city, which he was about to deliver up to the enemy [c]. The next day Bineſes, a Perſian lord of great diſtinction, who attended Jovian in the quality of an hoſtage, demanded the city to be delivered up to him, purſuant to the articles of the treaty. The inhabitants did all that lay in their power to divert the emperor from complying with his demand; they earneſtly entreated him to give them leave to defend the place of their nativity, which they undertook to do, without putting the public to the leaſt charge, telling the emperor, that they were well acquainted with the fatigues of a ſiege, and knew how to check the Jovian purſues his march to the Roman dominions.

[z] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 301. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 730. [a] Ammian. p. 302. [b] Idem, p. 303—306. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Idem ibid.

the Perſian pride. But Jovian inſiſting upon the faith of the treaty and the obligation of his oath, Bineſes was, by his order, admitted into the city, of which he took poſſeſſion in his maſter's name, by ſetting up the Perſian ſtandard. At the ſame time, the inhabitants were ordered to quit their native city, and retire elſewhere, with what effects they could carry with them. This order occaſioned the moſt melancholy ſight, ſays Ammianus, the ſun ever beheld [e]. Chryſoſtom likewiſe deſcribes their departure in a very affecting manner [f]. But the emperor, alledging the ſanctity of his oath, was deaf to their cries, entreaties, and lamentations; ſo that the city was evacuated in three days time, every one curſing, as they departed, a peace, which had proved more fatal to them than the moſt bloody wars. All the roads were crouded with theſe forlorn exiles, loaded with what they could carry; but greatly grieved for the loſs of many valuable things, which, for want of convenient carriages, they had been obliged to leave behind them. Moſt of them retired to Amida, and were placed by the emperor in the ſuburbs of that city, which, by this means, repaired all the loſſes it had ſuſtained in the time of Conſtantius, and by degrees became the metropolis of what remained to the Romans in Meſopotamia [g]. Jovian did not leave Niſibis, according to Ammianus [h], till all the inhabitants were retired. Others tell us, that he marched away in the night-time, after he had been two days encamped before it; two months, we read in Suidas, which muſt be a miſtake of the tranſcriber [i]. He then continued his march to Antioch, paſſing through Edeſſa, where he was on the twenty-ſeventh of September, as appears from the date of one of his laws [k]. Zoſimus writes, that he was no-where received with the demonſtrations of joy uſual on ſuch occaſions [l]. However, it is not unlikely that his arrival was agreeable to the people of Antioch, who hated Julian, and conſequently muſt have been pleaſed to ſee his ſucceſſor arrive in their city. During his ſtay at Antioch, which was not long, he revoked all the laws that had been enacted by Julian againſt the chriſtians, and made it his chief ſtudy to reſtore the chriſtian religion to its former luſtre [m]. Themiſtius, a pagan philoſopher, tells us, Niſibis delivered up to the Perſians.

Jovian revokes all the laws againſt the chriſtians.

[e] Idem, p. 304. [f] Chryſ. in gent. tom. 1. p. 696. [g] Ammian. ibid. Zoſ. p. 733. Chron. Alex. p. 696. [h] Ammian. p. 305. [i] Suid. p. 1244. [k] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 67. [l] Zoſ. p. 733. [m] Ruf. l. xi. c. 1. p. 177. Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640.

us, that he publiſhed a law, granting to every one full liberty to hold what religion he pleaſed; and, after having beſtowed great encomiums upon him on that ſcore, he adds, that he ſuffered the temples to be opened, and the uſual ſacrifices and ceremonies to be performed in them [n]. On the other hand, Sozomen aſſures us, that, by a law enacted at Antioch, he ſuppreſſed all religions, except the chriſtian, ordered the temples to be ſhut up, and prohibited, under ſevere penalties, the offering of victims, and all manner of idolatrous worſhip [o]; inſomuch, that the pagans were obliged, according to Socrates [p], to creep into holes and corners, and thoſe who, in Julian's time, had wore the philoſophical cloak, to quit it, and to appear in the common attire. What the two latter authors write, is confirmed by the pagan ſophiſt Libanius, who ſays, that, after the death of Julian, thoſe were heard with applauſe, who inveighed againſt the gods; that the pontiffs and philoſophers were dragged to the tribunals as criminals; that they were obliged, by the moſt exquiſite torments cruelty itſelf could invent, to confeſs what ſums they had received of Julian for the worſhip of their gods, and forced either to reſtore what they had received, or to languiſh in dungeons; that the temples were pulled down, and the ſophiſts, who, in Julian's reign, had been entertained with the greateſt reſpect by the governors of provinces, were now driven away from their gates like criminals and homicides [q]. The emperor was even adviſed to put Libanius to death, for commending Julian; but a Cappadocian, who had a great aſcendant over Jovian, adviſed him to take no notice of ſuch trifles [r]. As for the chriſtians, Jovian wrote to all the governors of provinces, ſtrictly enjoining them to take care, that they were not diſturbed in their uſual aſſemblies. He reſtored to the churches, to the eccleſiaſtics, to the virgins and widows, all the privileges, immunities, and exemptions, which had been granted to them by Conſtantine and his children; but lately revoked by Julian [s]. He likewiſe ordered the yearly allowance of corn, which had been given by Conſtantine to the churches, for the ſupport of the poor, to be continued to them; but as the famine ſtill raged, only the third part of Conſtantine's donation could be ſpared. Jovian promiſed them the other two parts as ſoon as the famine abated: but he dying in the mean time, his his ſucceſſors did not make good his promiſe; whence the churches thenceforth received only one third of what Conſtantine had allotted to them [t]. Jovian likewiſe reſtored the labarum, or the ſtandard with the croſs, and obliged one Magnus, a comes or count, to rebuild at his own expence the church of Berytus, which, by his order, had been burnt; nay, the emperor had commanded his head to be cut off, but was with much a-do prevailed upon by his friends to ſpare him [u]. As in Julian's time ſeveral ſacred virgins had married, ſome by choice, others by conſtraint, Jovian, by a law addreſſed to the prefect Salluſtius Secundus, declares thoſe guilty of death, who ſhall mention marriage to the ſacred virgins, or utter a ſingle word in their preſence repugnant to the rules of modeſty [w]. This law is ſtill extant, and dated from Antioch, the nineteenth of February of the enſuing year 364 [x]; which is a groſs miſtake, it being certain, that Jovian was dead before that time, and that he left Antioch before the end of the preſent year. Jovian not only eſpouſed the cauſe of the chriſtians againſt the pagans, but that of the orthodox believers againſt the Arians; for, by the firſt law he publiſhed after he had entered the Roman dominions, he commanded the churches to be every-where reſtored to thoſe, who had inviolably adhered to the faith of the council of Nice, and recalled all the biſhops who had been baniſhed on that ſcore, and Athanaſius in particular, to whom he wrote with his own hand a very obliging and friendly letter [y], which has reached our times [z]. Some time after he wrote a ſecond letter to him, deſiring him to draw up and ſend him a rule of faith, by which he might regulate his belief in the great variety of opinions that prevailed then in the church. Athanaſius readily complied with the emperor's requeſt, and ſent him a creed or rule of faith, ſuppoſed to be that which ſtill paſſes under his name, approved of and ſubſcribed by all the biſhops of Egypt [a]. Jovian ſoon after invited Athanaſius to court, received him, upon his arrival at Antioch, with the greateſt demonſtrations of eſteem and veneration imaginable, often conferred with him touching the articles of religion then in debate, and was by him thoroughly confirmed in the doctrine doctrine defined and eſtabliſhed by the council of Nice [b]. After this, Athanaſius took his leave of the emperor, and returned to his dioceſe. Socrates tells us, that the emperor no ſooner entered the Roman dominions upon his return from Perſia, than he was met by the leading men among the Arians, Macedonians, Achaians, and other ſectaries, all ſtriving to ingratiate themſelves with the new prince, and prepoſſeſs him in their favour; but that he received them coldly, telling them, that he was an enemy to contention, and ſhould eſteem and countenance thoſe only who promoted unity and concord. However, as Jovian himſelf openly profeſſed the faith of the council of Nice, that doctrine was embraced by many, who, till that time had been very ſanguine in oppoſing it, and was ſoon after ſolemnly confirmed in a council held at Antioch this year [c]. Jovian, after a ſhort ſtay at Antioch, ſet out for Conſtantinople, though the winter was already far advanced, to prevent the diſturbances, which he had reaſon to apprehend in the weſt. As he paſſed through Tarſus in Cilicia, he ordered ſome ornaments to be added to the tomb of Julian; on which account he is blamed by ſome chriſtian writers [e]. From Tarſus he proceeded to Tyana in Cappadocia, where he was informed, that Malaricus, whom he had appointed general of the troops in Gaul, having declined that poſt, Lucilianus, the emperor's father-in-law, and general of the troops in Illyricum and Italy, had haſtened into Gaul; and taking upon him there, when matters were not yet ſettled, to examine the accounts of ſome officers, one of them, conſcious of his frauds, had fled for protection to the Batavians who ſerved in the Roman army; and by perſuading them that Julian was ſtill alive, had ſo incenſed them againſt Lucilianus as a traitor, that in a tumult they killed him, and a tribune, by name Seniauchus, whom he had brought with him into Gaul. Valentinian, afterwards emperor, but then only tribune, and one of the attendants of Lucillianus, narrowly eſcaped undergoing the ſame fate. This tumult, which happened at Rheims, did not prevent the troops in Gaul, nor their general Jovinus, from declaring for Jovian, and proclaiming him emperor. They even ſent deputies to him, to congratulate him upon his promotion, and acquaint him, that they were ready to obey his commands.

[n] Themiſt. p. 67, 68. [o] Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640. [p] Socrat. l. iii. c. 25. p. 205. & c. 24. p. 202, 203. [q] Lib. or. xii. p. 327. [r] Lib. vit. p. 46. [s] Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640.

He eſpouſes the cauſe of the orthodox chriſtians againſt the Arians.

[t] Theodor. l. i. c. 10. p. 552. & l. iv. p. 664. [u] Idem, l. iv. c. 19. p. 689. [w] Soz. p. 640. [x] Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 25. leg. 2. p. 197. [y] Theodor. l. iv. c. 2. p. 661. Greg. Naz. p. 394. Socr. p. 202. [z] Athan. tom. 2. p. 33, 34. [a] Theodor. p. 661. Ruf. l. xi. c. 1. p. 177. Greg. Naz. p. 394.

He ſets out for Conſtantinople.

A tumult in Gaul.

[b] Theodor. l. iv. c. 3. p. 661—664. Epiphan. c. 10. p. 726. Soz. l. vi. c. 5. p. 642. [c] Socr. l. iii. c. 24 p. 202. & c. 25. p. 205. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Idem, l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. Baron. ad ann. 364.

commands. The deputies met the new emperor at Aſpona in Galatia, who received them in a very obliging manner, and continued Jovinus in the poſt of general, charging him not to ſuffer the death of Lucillianus to go unrevenged. From Aſpona Jovian purſued his journey to Ancyra, the metropolis of Galatia, where he took upon him his firſt conſulſhip. We have obſerved above, that he had named his father for his colJovian enters upon his firſt conſulſhip.
legue; but he dying in the mean time, he took in his room his own ſon, whom, though then only an infant, he diſtinguiſhed with the title of nobiliſſimus, or moſt noble [f]. The diſcourſe which Themiſtius is ſaid to have pronounced on occaſion of the emperor's conſulſhip, has reached our times [g]; but Socrates aſſures us, that he pronounced it ſix weeks after at Dadaſtana, and a ſecond time at Conſtantinople [h]. Jovian, haſtening to reach the latter city, left Ancyra, and continued his journey, though the cold was then ſo ſevere and intenſe, that ſome of his retinue died on the road. Upon his arrival at Dadaſtana, a town on the borders of Galatia and Bithynia, but belonging to the latter province, he was met by Themiſtius, and other perſons of diſtinction, ſent by the ſenate of Conſtantinople to attend him. But before he left that place, He dies at Dadaſtana.
he was found dead in his bed, on the ſixteenth or ſeventeenth of February of this year 364, after he had lived thirty-three years, and reigned ſeven months and twenty days [i]. His ſudden death gave occaſion to various reports; ſome aſcribe it to the dampneſs of his chamber, which had been newly plaiſtered; others ſay, he was ſtifled with the vapours of charcoal placed in the room to dry it. Some write, that he died of a ſurfeit; others, that his death was owing to bad and poiſonous muſhrooms. Socrates ſays, he was carried off by an obſtruction; and Chryſoſtom, that he was either poiſoned or murdered by his guards. Ammianus likewiſe ſeems to have believed, that he died a violent death; for he compares his end with that of Scipio Æmilianus, who was ſtrangled in his bed; and adds, that no enquiry was made after the death of either of them [k]. But Jovian had not yet diſobliged any man, nor does it appear, that he had any enemies, except perhaps Procopius, who took no advantage of his death, nor even ſhewed himſelf on that occaſion. The body of the deceaſed emperor was carried to Conſtantinople, and there interred with with the uſual ſolemnity in the church of the Apoſtles, where his tomb was to be ſeen many years after [l]. His wife was coming to meet him, according to Zonaras [m], with her ſon Vérronianus, and a retinue worthy of an empreſs, when ſhe received the news of his death. Cedrenus likewiſe tells us, that ſhe never ſaw him after his promotion [n]; but Themiſtius writes, that the ſon, and conſequently, in all likelihood, the mother too, was with the emperor at Dadaſtana; and adds, that by his crying and ſtruggling when he was to be carried, according to cuſtom, in the conſular chariot, he ſeemed to portend what happened ſoon after, that is, the death of his father [o]. The empreſs was ſtill living in 380 [p], and was buried after her death by her huſband [q]. Of her ſon we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Jovian is greatly commended by all the eccleſiaſtic writers, among whom Theodoret ſays, that heaven raiſed him to the ſovereignty to reward, even in this life, his virtue; but that the world did not deſerve to enjoy long ſo great a bleſſing [r].

[f] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 306, 307. Socrat. l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. Zoſ. p. 733. Zonar. p. 25. [g] Themiſt. or. v. p. 71. [h] Socrat. ibid. p. 205. [i] Ammian. p. 308, Socrat. ibid. Zoſ. ibid. Zonar. ibid. [k] Ammian. p. 308.

Jovian being dead, the chief officers, both civil and military, aſſembled in order to chuſe a new emperor, when ſome propoſed Equitius, tribune of the firſt company of the ſhield-men of the emperor's guard; and others Januarius, a kinſman of the deceaſed emperor, at that time commander of the troops in Illyricum: but the former was rejected on account of his ſurly and ruſtic temper, and the latter becauſe he was at too great a diſtance [s]. Zoſimus, ever favourable to the pagans, tells us, that the electors, with one voice, named to the empire Salluſtius Secundus, prefect of the eaſt; a man, ſays he, of great worth and long experience in war, by religion a pagan, but no great enemy to the chriſtians. He adds, that Salluſt, excuſing himſelf on account of his old age and infirmities, they were for naming his ſon; but that the father oppoſed his election, alledging, that he was too young, and conſequently not equal to ſo great a charge [t]. At length, after an inter-regnum of nine or ten days, Valentinian was, by univerſal conſent, choſen emperor; which unanimity Ammianus aſcribes to a particular inſpiration from heaven [u]. The prefect

Valentinian is choſen emperor.

Salluſtius

[l] Philoſt. l. viii. p. 413. Zonar. ibid. Du Cange urb. Conſtant. deſcript. l. iv. p. 110. [m] Zonar. ibid. [n] Cedren. p. 309. [o] Themiſt. or. v. p. 71. [p] Chryſ. ad vid. junior. tom. iv. p. 463. [q] Zonar. p. 25. [r] Theodoret. l, iv. c. 4. p. 664, 665. [s] Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 310. [t] Zoſ. l. iii. p. 734. [u] Ammian. p. 310.

Salluſtius Secundus, Arintheus, one of the generals of the army, Dagalaiphus, general of the horſe, and Datianus, a patrician, who had been conſul in 358, are ſaid to have been the chief authors of his election [w]. The latter had been left by Jovian on account of his old age, and the ſeverity of the winter, in Galatia; whence he wrote to the army, adviſing them to chuſe Valentinian, as a man well qualified for that high ſtation [x]. This election was made at Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, whither the army that attended Jovian had, after his death, removed from Dadaſtana [y]. Valentinian was the ſon of Gratianus, a native of Cibale in Pannonia: his anceſtors were no-ways conſpicuous; but Gratianus himſelf being admitted into the army on account of his extraordinary ſtrength, and great addreſs at all manner of exerciſes, raiſed himſelf by degrees to the dignity of the count of Africa; of which honourable employment he was afterwards deprived, upon a ſuſpicion of his having embezzled the public money. However, he was many years after appointed commander of the troops in Britain; in which office he acquitted himſelf with great reputation. On his return from thence, he withdrew to his eſtate in the country, leading there a retired life, till it was confiſcated by Conſtantius, incenſed againſt him for having entertained Magnentius as he paſſed that way, with a deſign to uſurp the empire. But he continued, notwithſtanding his diſgrace, to be greatly beloved and eſteemed by the army [z]; and the eſteem and affection they all had for the father did not a little contribute to the promotion of the ſon [a]. The ſenate of Conſtantinople decreed him a ſtatue in the beginning of the reign of Valens [b]. We do not find that he had any other children beſides Valentinian and Valens, who are ſuppoſed to have been both born in the city of Cibale, the birth-place of their father. The former is ſtyled on ſome medals [c] Flavius, which prænomen became common to all thoſe who, after Conſtantius's time, were raiſed to the empire. Valentinian had by his firſt wife, named Valera Severa, the emperor Gratian, born in the year 359. Of his ſecond wife, Juſtina, the mother of Valentinian II. and of three daughters, we ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Valentinian was baptized, as we read in St. Ambroſe [d], and held the doctrine of the council of Nice, though that of Arius generally prevailed in His parentage, education, employments, &c.

[w] Philoſtrog. l. viii. c. 8. p. 113. [x] Idem ibid. [y] Ammian. ibid. [z] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 428. Vict. epit. p. 545. [a] Vict. ibid. [b] Theodoret. p. 171. Themiſt. or. vi. p. 81. [c] Pirag. p. 501, 505. [d] Ambroſ. ep. xiii. p. 204.

in Pannonia [e]. He is ſaid by moſt writers to have been altogether illiterate; and Themiſtius ſeems to inſinuate, that neither he, nor his brother Valens, had any knowledge of the Greek tongue [f]. But Auſonius allows him ſome erudition [g]. He betook himſelf early to the profeſſion of arms, and on ſeveral occaſions gave remarkable proofs of his courage, prudence, and experience [h]. In Gaul he commanded a body of horſe, in quality of tribune; but that command was taken from him by Conſtantius, as we have related in the reign of that prince, upon a falſe charge brought againſt him by Barbetio. Philoſtorgius writes, that while he was in Gaul, it was conjectured from ſome omens, that he ſhould attain one day to the empire; which induced Conſtantius to ſend him into Meſopotamia, to ſerve againſt the Perſians [i]. Under Julian he was tribune of one of the bands of the guards, called Joviani, who conſtantly attended the emperor [k]. We are told, that being one day obliged, as tribune of the guard, to attend the emperor into a temple, and the miniſter of the idols ſprinkling thoſe who entered with water, which was ſuppoſed to purify them, Valentinian, who was a zealous chriſtian, ſeeing a drop of it upon his habit, not only reviled and upbraided the pontiff as an impoſtor, but ſtruck him, and in the preſence of Julian cut out that part of his habit on which it had fallen, and threw it contemptuouſly on the ground. This provoked Julian to ſuch a degree, that he immediately ordered Valentinian either to ſacrifice to the gods, or lay down his employment: he choſe, without heſitation, the latter; but Julian, not ſatisfied therewith, confined him, according to Philoſtorgius, to Thebes in Egypt; according to Sozomen, to Melitene in Armenia, charging him with ſome neglect of duty, to deprive him of the glory which he was appriſed would accrue to him from ſuffering on account of his religion [l]. If what theſe authors write be true, Julian muſt have recalled him ſoon after, perhaps to employ him in the Perſian war; for he is ſuppoſed to have been baniſhed in 362, and on the other hand it is plain from Ammianus Marcellinus [m], that, at the death of Julian, he ſerved in the army in quality of tribune. Upon the promotion of Jovian, Lucillianus, father-in-law to that prince, took him with him into Gaul, as one capable of eſtabliſhing, by his prudence and known

His ſteadineſs in the chriſtian religion, and averſion to idolatry.

[e] Socr. l. iv. c. 1. p. 210. [f] Themiſt. or. vi. p. 71. [g] Auſon. idyll. xxxviii. p. 339. [h] Zoſ. p. 734. [i] Philoſt. l. vii. c. 7. p. 93. [k] Theodor. l. iii. c. 12. [l] Soz. l. vi. c. 6. p. 644. Philoſtorg. p. 93. Theodoret. p. 950. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 735. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 32. Ruf. l. ii. c. 2. p. 178. [m] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 302.

known abilities, the authority of the new emperor in that province. Lucillianus was killed, as we have related above, in a tumult at Rheims; and Valentinian narrowly eſcaped undergoing the ſame fate. Upon his return into the eaſt, Jovian preferred him to the command of the ſecond company of the ſcutarii, or ſhield-men of the guard; and left him at Ancyra, when he ſet out from thence on his march to Conſtantinople, with orders to follow him ſome time after [n]. Valentinian was ſtill at Ancyra, when Jovian died at Dadaſtana; and he was choſen, in the manner we have related above, to ſucceed him. Upon his election, meſſengers were immediately diſpatched to acquaint him with it; and in the mean time, Equitius and Leo ordered to prevent diſturbances or tumults in the army. Valentinian, ſoon after the arrival of the meſſengers, ſet out from Ancyra, and reached Nice, where the army then was, on the twenty-fourth of February; but did not appear abroad till the twenty-ſixth, perhaps becauſe he was in ſuſpenſe, whether he ſhould accept the empire or no, as we read in Victor the younger [o]. This, at leaſt, ſeems more probable to us than the conjecture of Ammianus Marcellinus [p], viz. that out of ſuperſtition he avoided tranſacting any thing on the twenty-fifth, that being the biſſextile, and conſequently an unlucky day. Be that as it will, orders were given in the evening, by the advice of the prefect Salluſtius Secundus, that no perſon, who might, on account of his poſt or quality, be ſuppoſed to aſpire at the empire, ſhould, on pain of death, be ſeen abroad the next morning. As ſoon as it was light, the whole army was drawn up in a plain near the city of Nice; and Valentinian, appearing at their head, was deſired to aſcend the tribunal; which he had no ſooner done, than he was, with loud ſhouts, ſaluted Valentinianus Auguſtus, and adorned, in the ſight of the whole army, with all the enſigns of ſovereignty, that is, with a purple robe and a diadem [q]. When this ceremony was over, the new emperor was preparing to harangue the army, according to cuſtom, and had already ſtretched out his hand to begin his ſpeech, when he was ſtopped by a ſeditious noiſe of the ſoldiery, requiring him to take that inſtant a colleague in the ſovereignty, that the empire might not for the future remain, as it had happened twice in a few months, without an head. Valentinian, though a man of great reſolu-

He is ſaluted by the army with the title of Auguſtus.

tion

[n] Idem ibid
[o] Vict. epit. p. 545.
[p] Ammian p 312.
[q] Idem ibid. Zoſ. l. iii. p. 734.

tion and intrepidity, was at first somewhat alarmed; but soon resuming his usual courage, he first reproved, with an air of authority, those who appeared the most forward and seditious; and then, without any interruption, addressed himself to the army in the following terms: "It was in your power a "few days ago to chuse for your emperor whom you plea- "sed; but since you have raised me to that high station, "I must tell you, that power is no longer in your hands: "you are not to prescribe laws to your sovereign; it is my "province to command, and yours to obey: I am to judge, "and not you, what may be useful and conducive to the "public welfare. However, I do not say, that I will not "take a collegue; but in an affair of such importance, I "must proceed with the utmost care and precaution imagina- "ble, lest both you and I may hereafter have occasion to re- "pent of our rashness." This resolute speech, uttered with all the authority of a sovereign, stopped the mouths of the mutineers; and no one daring to oppose a man, who seemed born to command, he was again, with a general acclama- tion, saluted with the title of Augustus, and conducted, or, as Philostorgius will have it, carried on a large shield, to the imperial palace [r].

His firmness and intrepidity in quelling a tumult in the army.

VALENTINIAN being thus declared emperor at Nice on the twenty-sixth of February of this year 364, left that city on the twenty-eighth of the same month, and set out for Constantinople. His march was very expeditious; for he made his public entry into Nicomedia on the first of March, and there created his brother Valens præfectus stabuli, that is, according to the modern phrase, master of the horse, with the title of tribune; and, after his arrival at Constantinople, declared him his collegue in the empire on the twenty-eighth of March, according to the most probable opinion. This ce- remony was performed at a place called Hebdomon or the seventh, because it was seven miles distant from Constanti- nople. In this place, which was a village, with an imperial palace, and several churches, the emperors who succeeded Valens were commonly crowned, and that prince embellish- ed it with several edifices, and with a stately tribunal or throne; whence it took the name of the tribunal [s]. Ammia- nus tells us, that Valentinian having summoned a council at Nice, as soon as he was declared emperor, to deliberate about a col-

He declares his brother Valens his collegue in the empire.

[r] Ammian. p. 312. Theodoret. l iv. c. 5. p. 665. Sozom. p. 645. Philostorg. p. 113. [s] Du Cange urb. Const. descript. l. ii. p. 140.

a collegue ; and the other officers being all ſilent, through fear of diſobliging the emperor, Dagalaiphus addreſſing him with great liberty, If you are partial, ſaid he, to your own family, you will make choice of your brother ; but if you love your people, you will prefer ſome other. Ammianus adds, that when he named Valens, his choice was univerſally applauded, becauſe no one dared to diſapprove or oppoſe it [t]; which ſhews, that no great advantages to the ſtate were expected from Valens. However, Ammianus, who neither condemns him as a bad prince, nor thinks him worthy of a place among the good ones [u], obſerves to his praiſe, that he ever kept up a good underſtanding with his brother ; that he undertook nothing without his advice ; and obeyed him, not only as his elder brother, but as his ſovereign [w]. Some time after, both princes were ſeized with a violent fever, which was by ſome aſcribed to the magical practices of Julian's friends, eſpecially of the philoſophers Maximus and Priſcus, who thereupon were apprehended, with many others, and carried in chains to Conſtantinople. Priſcus was ſoon diſcharged ; but Maximus, who was univerſally hated, and ſuppoſed to have ſtirred up Julian againſt Valentinian, on account of his zeal for the chriſtian religion, was condemned to pay an heavy fine, and to lie in priſon till he had paid it. Many eminent perſons were accuſed on this occaſion ; but the prefect Salluſtius Secundus, with his uſual addreſs, prudence, and good-nature, ſtifled ſuch accuſations, and put a ſtop to all further enquiries [x]. The two emperors were no ſooner recovered, than they left Conſtantinople ; and paſſing through Adrianople, where they were on the twenty-ninth of April [y], arrived at Philippopolis ; whence they proceeded to Sardica, and from that city to Naiſſus in Dacia, where they were on the third of June, and ſeem to have continued till about the eighteenth of the ſame month, partly at Naiſſus, partly at a caſtle named Mediana, about three miles from that city [z]. As the empire was threatened with a general invaſion from the barbarous nations that ſurrounded it, Valentinian, the better to make head againſt them, thought it adviſeable to divide the provinces between himſelf and his brother ; and accordingly made this famous partition at Mediana, committing to the government of Valens the eaſt, that is, all Aſia, with Egypt and Thrace, and reſerving to himſelf Illyricum, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Britain, and Africa, that is, all the weſt. After this partition, both princes repaired to Sirmium, where they parted, Valentinian for Milan, and Valens for Conſtantinople [a]. In the mean time, the barbarians broke into the empire from all quarters, the Germans into Gaul and Rhætia, the Sarmatians and Quadians into Pannonia, the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacotti into Britain, and the Auſturians, with other Mooriſh nations, into Africa. But the latter province was not ſo much haraſſed by the barbarians as by Romanus, who had been ſent by Jovian to protect it; for the Auſturians had in his reign made frequent inroads into Libya Tripolitana, and the neighbouring countries. Romanus ſurpaſſed the barbarians themſelves in oppreſſing and pillaging that unhappy province, and even refuſed to march againſt the enemy, who, roving up and down the country, committed every-where dreadful ravages, becauſe the inhabitants would not comply with his exorbitant demands; for he required, beſides immenſe ſums, no fewer than four thouſand camels, without which, he ſaid, he could not take the field. The Africans, finding they could have no protection from Romanus, charged the deputies, whom they ſent with the uſual preſents to Valentinian upon his acceſſion to the empire, to lay before the new emperor the miſerable ſtate of their affairs; which they did accordingly, offering to prove the particulars contained in the memorial, which they preſented to the emperor; but Remigius, who was then magiſter officiorum, and ſhared with Romanus, his kinſman and confident, the ſpoils of the province, by repreſenting things in a quite different light, managed his friend's cauſe with ſo much cunning and addreſs, that the emperor, not knowing whom to believe, referred the matter to a further enquiry; which Remigius got eaſily put off from time to time, as there was then a great hurry of buſineſs at court. However, they prevailed upon the emperor to give the command of the troops to Ruricius, governor of Libya Tripolitana; but, by the intereſt of Remigius, it was ſoon after reſtored to Romanus. In the mean while, the Auſturians came down in greater numbers than ever, laid waſte the fruitful territories of Leptis and Oea; from which cities, and that of Sebrata, the province is ſaid to have been named Tripolis, that word importing three cities. As Romanus continued the whole time unconcerned and inactive, the barbarian

He puniſhes ſome of Julian's friends.

He divides the empire with his brother Valens.

[t] Ammian. p. 314. [u] Idem, l. xxx. p. 428. [w] Idem, l. xxvi. p. 315. [x] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 735 Eunap. c. 5. p. 82, 83. [y] Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 315. Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 69. [z] Idem ibid.

Libya Tripolitana haraſſed by the Auſturians, and oppreſſed by Romanus.

Romanus accuſed, but continued in his command.

[a] Ammian. p. 316. Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 69, 70.

rians ſcoured the country without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, ravaged it in a moſt miſerable manner, put many perſons of all ranks to the ſword, took an incredible number of priſoners, and had even the confidence to lay ſiege to Leptis, a ſtrong and populous city, but were not able to reduce it. The noiſe of theſe devaſtations reaching the emperor's ears, he diſpatched Palladius to pay the troops their arrears, and bring him a true account of the ſtate of the province. Romanus, being immediately acquainted by his friend Remigius with the errand on which Palladius was ſent, perſuaded the principal officers of the army, with whom he maintained a good underſtanding, to preſent Palladius, whom he repreſented as a man of great authority at court, with a great ſhare of the money which he had brought to pay them. Palladius accepted the preſent, and proceeded to Leptis, where he heard the complaints of the inhabitants, and was by them conducted to view the country, that he might be an eye-witneſs of the miſerable condition to which it was reduced, and of the dreadful havock the barbarians had made, without being in the leaſt curbed or reſtrained. Palladius, at that ſight, could not help exclaiming againſt Romanus, telling him in plain terms, that he would not fail to acquaint the emperor with his unaccountable conduct, and upbraiding him with his cruelty and avarice. But Romanus ſoon ſtopt his mouth, by upbraiding him in his turn with converting to his private uſe the money with which he was to pay the ſoldiers, and threatening to let the emperor know he had betrayed his truſt. This put Palladius into ſuch a fright, that he agreed with Romanus to conceal the whole from the emperor, whom accordingly he aſſured on his return, that the city of Leptis, and the Tripolitan province, complained without reaſon; which was believed, Palladius being generally eſteemed a man of great integrity, and above all bribery and corruption. Nay, the emperor was by him ſo miſled, and ſhamefully impoſed upon, that he ſent him back into Africa to try and puniſh the authors of the ſuppoſed calumnies and falſe informations brought againſt Romanus. In the diſcharge of this ſcandalous office, he tampered ſo cunningly with the inhabitants of Leptis, that they diſowned the complaints which Jovinus, one of their deputies, had laid before the emperor in their name, maintaining, that they had given him no ſuch commiſſion. Jovinus himſelf, to gain the favour of Palladius and Romanus, and by that means avoid the danger that threatened him, owned he had made a falſe report to the emperor, who thereupon ordered him to Palladius ſent to enquire into the ſtate of province.

He is gained over by Romanus.

His accuſers punished.

be put to death, with ſome of the chief citizens of Leptis, and the governor Ruricius, who had confirmed the truth of the informations brought againſt Romanus. The latter was executed at Stephæ in Mauritania, and the others at Utica. Erectheus and Ariſtomenes, two other citizens of Leptis, who had complained of Romanus, were condemned to have their tongues cut out; but they found means to make their eſcape, and lay concealed till the reign of Gratian, when this ſcene of iniquity was brought to light [b].

THE following year, 365, both princes entered upon their firſt conſulſhip, the one at Milan, the other at Conſtantinople. Valentinian ſeems to have continued at Milan till the month of Auguſt, and then to have viſited ſeveral cities of Italy, viz. Verona, Aquileia, and Luceria [c]. From Italy he paſſed into Gaul, and was either at or near Paris in his way to that city in the latter end of October, when he received certain intelligence, that the Germans had made an irruption into that province; and that Procopius had revolted in the eaſt. Of the latter we ſhall ſpeak in the reign of Valens. As for the Germans, they had ſent embaſſadors to congratulate Valentinian upon his acceſſion to the empire; but Urſacius, then magiſter officiorum, having received them in a very diſobliging manner, and ſent them back with far leſs preſents than were uſually given them, they had thrown them away with ſcorn and indignation; and upon their return, ſtirred up their nation to take arms, and revenge the affront that had been offered them. They broke therefore into Gaul, and laid waſte the country bordering on the Rhine. Valentinian diſpatched Dagalaiphus againſt them, and advanced in perſon as far as Rheims to ſupport him. But the

The Germans break into Gaul;

But retire at the approach of the emperor.

Germans retiring at his approach, he returned to Paris, and there took up his winter-quarters [d]. He was for returning into Illyricum to make head there againſt the rebel Procopius; but his friends, and the deputies that were ſent to him from all the cities in Gaul, earneſtly entreating him not to leave that province expoſed to the inroads of the Germans, he complied with their requeſt, conſidering, ſays Ammianus, that Procopius was only an enemy to his family, whereas the Germans were declared enemies to the whole Roman empire [e]. Being therefore reſolved not to ſtir out of Gaul, he diſpatched Neotherius, at that time only a notary, but afterwards, wards, that is, in 390, conſul, into Africa, to prevent Procopius from making himſelf maſter of that province; and at the ſame time enjoined Equitius to cover Illyricum, and watch the motions of the uſurper on that ſide [f]. St. Jerom writes, that Equitius abuſed his authority in oppreſſing and plundering the people whom he was ſent to protect [g]. Equitius was already comes or count, to which dignity the emperor added on this occaſion that of magiſter or general [h].

[b] Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 316. & l. xxvii. p. 347—380. [c] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 75. [d] Ammian l. xxvi. p. 315—317. [e] Idem, l. xxvii. p. 334.

THE next conſuls were Gratian and Dagalaiphus; the latter was general of the horſe, and had been comes domeſticorum under Julian: his name gives us room to believe, that he was by birth a barbarian. As for his collegue, he was the ſon of the emperor Valentinian, and then an infant; whence in the dates of the laws enacted this year he is marked thus NB. P, that is, Nobiliſſimus Puer. The Germans, who had made an irruption into Gaul, the preceding year, and retired at the approach of the emperor, as we have obſerved above, returned this year, 366, and having paſſed the Rhine on the ice, defeated the Romans in a pitched battle, took the ſtandards of the Batavians and Heruli, and killed the two counts Charietto and Severianus, ſays Zoſimus, who commanded the Roman forces [i]. That the Romans were defeated, and Severianus killed, is owned by Ammianus [k]; but Charietto muſt have eſcaped, ſince we find a law dated the ſeventeenth of May addreſſed to him [l]; whereas this battle was fought in the depth of winter, when the Rhine was frozen over [m]. Zoſimus adds, that Valentinian, who, according to him, was preſent at this battle, highly provoked againſt the Batavians for having given ground the firſt, ordered them to be caſhiered and ſold for ſlaves, but ſuſpended the execution of his orders, upon their promiſing to retrieve their reputation by ſome ſignal enterprize; which they did accordingly, attacking the enemy's camp in the dead of the night, and committing there a dreadful ſlaughter [n]. What Zoſimus writes touching the Batavians may be true; but as for Valentinian, it is plain from Ammianus, that when this battle was fought, he was at Paris; whence he immediately diſpatched Dagalaiphus, to prevent the evil conſequences that were likely to attend the defeat of the other generals. Dagalaiphus, pretending he had not ſufficient ſtrength to engage the enemy, who were roving about the country in ſeveral great bodies, did not ſo much as offer to reſtrain them. Hereupon he was recalled, and Jovinus, general of the troops in Gaul, was ſent in his room; who having carefully informed himſelf of the motions of the barbarians, fell upon one of their parties at a place called Scarponna, between Toul and Metz, and cut them all off, without loſing one man. Being attended with the like ſucceſs againſt another party, which he ſurpriſed, he advanced with incredible expedition againſt the main body of their army. attacked them, though far ſuperior to him in number, and, after a long and bloody conteſt, put them to flight. The fight continued the whole day, and the Romans were once in great danger of being utterly defeated, the ſudden flight of a tribune, named Balchobaudes, who was a great boaſter, and conſequently, as it generally happens, a downright coward, having diſanimated the troops under his command. However, Jovinus, inſpiring them, more by his example than by words, with freſh courage, led them on to the charge, while they were ready to turn their backs; and, preſſing with great reſolulution and intrepidity upon the enemy, obliged them to give ground, and betake themſelves to a diſorderly flight. On the enemy's ſide, ſix thouſand were killed on the ſpot, and four thouſand wounded; and of the Romans only two hundred killed, and as many wounded [o]. The enemy withdrew in the night-time, but were intercepted in their retreat by ſeveral parties ſent out by Jovinus for that purpoſe, inſomuch, that few of them had the good luck to eſcape. Jovinus followed them the next morning with the whole army; but finding he could not overtake them without haraſſing his troops, he returned to his camp, where he was informed, that their king, who had been taken by a party ſent to plunder their camp, had been hanged in his abſence. Being greatly provoked at ſo baſe an action, he reſolved to puniſh with death the tribune, who commanded the party; but he found upon examination, that the ſoldiers did it in the height of their rage, which the tribune had in vain attempted to reſtrain [p]. Valentinian had advanced as far as Rheims to ſupport Jovinus, as we conjecture from ſeveral laws enacted this year in that city, and dated the ſeventh of April, the ſeventeenth of May, and the fourteenth of June [q]: but he muſt have returned to Paris before the end of the campaign; for Jovinus marching back back to Paris with his victorious army, the emperor to do him honour, went out to meet him, and for his eminent services named him conſul for the enſuing year . The public joy for the happy ſucceſſes of this glorious campaign was greatly heightened by the arrival of meſſengers from Valens, with the head of Procopius, killed in Aſia on the twenty-ſeventh of May, as we ſhall relate hereafter. Valentinian was returned to Rheims on the twenty-ſeventh of November [r], and ſeems to have continued there all winter . He made it his chief ſtudy to fortify the banks of the Rhine, cauſing a great number of forts to be erected on the German, as well as on the Roman, ſide of that river; by which means, and by augmenting his forces, he prevented the barbarians, ſays Zoſimus [s], from ever breaking into the Roman territories during the nine remaining years of his reign. But that writer muſt be underſtood of the Alemans; for we ſhall have ſoon occaſion to ſpeak of the irruptions of Franks and Saxons into Gaul.

The Romans defeated by the Germans.

[f] Idem ibid. [g] Hier. ad. ann. 373. [h] Ammian ibid. [i] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 740. [k] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 354. [l] Cod. Theodoſ. l. v. tit. 5. leg. 1. p. 440. [m] Ammian. & Zoſ. ibid. [n] Zoſ. ibid.

Jovinus gains a complete victory over the Germans.

[o] Ammian. p. 334, 335. [p] Zoſ. ibid. [q] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 77.

Valentinian fortifies the banks of the Rhine.

THE next conſuls were Lupicinus and Jovinus, both generals, the former under Valens in Syria, and the latter under Valentinian in Gaul. Jovinus is by the ableſt critics thought to be the ſame perſon with Valens Jovinus, general of the horſe, who was ſucceeded in that employment by Theodoſius in 370, as we read in Ammianus [t]. He was ſent this very year into Britain, and attended Valentinian in his expedition againſt the Germans in 368 [u]. Flodard, in his hiſtory of the church of Rheims, produces the epitaph of one Jovinus, who had been twice general of the Roman horſe and foot, and yet was more illuſtrious for his piety than his employments [x]. He was baptized and buried at Rheims, in the church of St. Agricola, now the abbey of St. Nicaſius, or St. Nicaiſe, as the natives call it. The ſtately tomb, ſtill to be ſeen there, is thought to have been his [y]. The epitaph ſeems to inſinuate, that he was the founder of that church, which, in the laſt will of the holy biſhop Rhemigius, is ſtyled the Jovinian church [z]. Moſt authors take this Jovinus to be the conſul of this year, which we can hardly believe, ſince in the epitaph no notice is taken of the conſulſhip, a dignity far ſuperior perior to the others mentioned in it. Beſides, we are nowhere told, that Jovinus, the conſul of this year, was a chriſtian; nay, from Julian's preferring him to the firſt employments both civil and military, we may well conclude, that he did not profeſs the chriſtian religion, at leaſt in that prince's reign. All the laws of this year to the third of June are dated from Rheims [b]; a plain proof that the emperor continued there till that time: one dated the ſixth of Auguſt was enacted at Nemæſia, ſaid to have been a place in the neighbourhood of Rheims [c]. From Nemæſia the emperor removed to Amiens, as appears from a law dated the eighteenth of Auguſt, and addreſſed to Prætextatus, prefect of Rome [d].

[r] Ammian. ibid. [s] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 77, 79. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 742. [w] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 369. [x] Idem, l. xxvii. p. 346. [y] Flodard Remenſ. eccleſ. hiſt. l. i. c. 6. p. 33. [z] Marlot. metropol. Remenſ. hiſt. l. i. c. 28. p. 101. [a] Flodard. p. 32, 33.

Valentinian falls ill,

He was probably kept ſo long at Rheims by a violent diſtemper, with which he was ſeized this year. As his recovery was deſpaired of, the great officers of the court began to form cabals, and to think of naming him a ſucceſſor. The chief candidates for the imperial dignity were Ruſticus Julianus and Severus, both dreaded on account of their ſeverity and rigour, but the former much more than the latter: he afterwards betrayed a moſt cruel and ſavage temper, when he was proconſul of Africa in 371, and 372. Symmachus is thought to have addreſſed to him the firſt fifteen letters of his third book. As for Severus, he was in the judgment of Ammianus, in every reſpect preferable to Julianus [e].

But recovers, and creates his ſon Gratian emperor.

But the emperor's unexpected recovery put an end to the hopes and intrigues of the courtiers; for he, being probably informed of what had been tranſacted, reſolved to prevent any farther diſputes, by raiſing his ſon Gratian to the empire. Having therefore before-hand gained the ſoldiery, he aſſembled them in the neighbourhood of Amiens; and, with their conſent and approbation, declared him his collegue in the empire, veſting him with the purple, and other enſigns of ſovereignty, amidſt the loud acclamations of the multitude [f]. Thus was Gratian created emperor on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, 367, at the city of Amiens, for which he is ſaid to have ever ſhewed a very particular regard: he was then about eight years old, having been born in 359, on the eighteenth of April, or, as others will have it, on the twenty-third of May. Every one was ſurpriſed, ſays Ammianus, at the emperor's raiſing him at once to the ſovereignty, inſtead of creating him firſt Cæſar, purſuant to the cuſtom, which had prevailed till that time [g]. Victor

[b] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 78, 79. [c] Idem ibid. [d] Idem ibid. [e] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 342. [f] Idem ibid. p. 343. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 742. Socr. l. iv. c. 11. p. 219. [g] Ammian. ibid.

Victor writes, that he was induced thereunto by his mother-in-law and his wife. Of the former, we find no farther mention in hiſtory. As to the latter, ſhe was, without all doubt, the mother of Gratian, Valentinian's firſt wife, called by Socrates, Severa [h], and ſtyled on ſome medals Valeria Severa Auguſta [i]. That princeſs was then certainly at court, and in favour; but ſeems to have been ſoon after diſgraced. We read in the chronicle of Alexandria, that the empreſs Severa having purchaſed an eſtate at a very low rate, the emperor, ſuſpecting ſome foul dealing, was ſo provoked, that, not ſatisfied with obliging her to reſtore the eſtate to the former owner, he drove her out of the city [k]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Valentinian divorced her, and married Juſtina, a native of Sicily, and the daughter, as is ſuppoſed, of one Juſtus, whom Conſtantius ordered to be put to death, while he was governor of Picenum, becauſe he had bragged, giving credit to ſome omens, that he ſhould one day be the father of an emperor [l]. Zoſimus writes, that ſhe had been married before to Magnentius, killed in 352 [m]. She favoured the doctrine of Arius, but craftily concealed her ſentiments in the emperor's life-time [n]. She had two brothers, viz. Conſtantianus, who was raiſed to the dignity of tribunus ſtabuli, but killed by a band of robbers in 369, and Cerealis, on whom the emperor conferred the ſame dignity after the death of his brother [o]. By Juſtina the emperor had four children, viz. Valentinian II. Juſta, Grata, and Galla, of whom the latter was married to the emperor Theodoſius [p]. Socrates writes, that the empreſs Severa having taken Juſtina, upon the death of her father, under her protection, and brought her up at court, the emperor was ſo taken with her charms, that he reſolved to marry her; but on the other hand, being unwilling to divorce his wife Severa, he cauſed a law to be publiſhed in all the cities of the empire, allowing his ſubjects to have two wives at a time: he adds, that Valentinian himſelf being the firſt who made uſe of his own licence, married Juſtina without diſmiſſing Severa [q]. Thus Socrates. But as neither Ammianus Marcellinus, who is no-ways favourable to Valentinian, nor Zoſimus, an avowed enemy to all the chriſtian princes, take any notice of ſuch a remarkable law,

He divorces Severa, and marries Juſtina.

we

[h] Socr. l. iv. c. 31. p. 249. [i] Goltz. p. 132. [k] Chron. Alex. p. 702, 704. [l] Socr. p. 249. [m] Idem ibid. Jorn. p. 652. Zoſ. ibid. p 746. [n] Ruin. l. ii. c. 15. p. 184. [o] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 367. [p] Socr. p. 150. [q] Socr. l. iv. c. 32.

we cannot help looking upon the account of Socrates as an arrant fable. Jornandes indeed relates the ſame thing [r]; but he copied it from Socrates, whom, for the moſt part, he follows.

The city of Mentz taken and plundered by the Alemans.

About the cloſe of this year, the city of Mentz was unexpectedly attacked, taken, and plundered, by Rhando, one of the princes of the Alemans, while the emperor, ſays Ammianus, was employed in ſome other expedition [s]; but in what expedition, we are no-where told. The ſame writer obſerves, that Rhando ſurprized the place, while the inhabitants, for the moſt part chriſtians, were celebrating a ſolemn feſtival.

The treachery of the Romans.

The Romans, to revenge this inſult, had recourſe to treachery, and cauſed Vithicabius, a prince of the ſame nation, to be aſſaſſinated by one of his own people, whom they had gained over by their emiſſaries. Vithicabius, was the ſon of Vadomarius, king of the Alemans, of whom we have had frequent occaſion to ſpeak in the reign of Conſtantius. The death of Vithicabius, who was a prince of great addreſs, intrepidity, and reſolution, put a ſtop for ſome time to the incurſions of the Alemans [t]. Valentinian, ſoon after the promotion of Gratian, left Amiens, and repaired to Treves, in which city he paſſed the winter, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws of this and the following year [u]. Before he reached that place, he was alarmed with diſmal tidings from Britain, viz. that the Picts, Scots, and other northern nations, had broke into the Roman territories; and having killed Nectaridus, count of the maritime tract, and Fullofaudes, who is diſtinguiſhed with the title of dux or duke, had committed every-where dreadful ravages, and reduced the province to a moſt deplorable condition. Hereupon the emperor immediately diſpatched into Britain, Severus, at that time comes domeſticorum; but receiving ſtill worſe news of the ſtate of affairs in that iſland, he ſoon after recalled him, and ſent Jovinus in his room, who having acquainted the emperor with the miſerable condition to which the iſland was reduced, and the ſtill greater evils with which it was threatened, if a powerful reinforcement both of horſe and foot were not ſent with all poſſible expedition to its relief, Valentinian made choice of Theodoſius, father to the emperor of the ſame name, and committed to him the whole management of this troubleſome war. Theodoſius, who was an officer of great experience and known abilities, haſtened to Boulogne, and embarquing there, landed at Rutupiæ; whence, as ſoon as his

The Picts and Scots break into the Roman territories.

[r] Jornand. reg. c 40. p. 652. [s] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 349.
[t] Idem ibid. [u] Cod Theodoſ. chron. p. 81.

his forces arrived from the continent, he marched to Lundonium or London, which Ammianus ſtyles an antient city; and there dividing his troops into ſeveral parties, he advanced againſt the enemy, who were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, obliged them to quit the booty and priſoners they had taken, and recovered an entire province, which they had ſeized and held as their own. To this province which compriſed the ſouthern parts of Scotland, the emperor gave the name of Valentia, perhaps from his brother Valens. Thus was the number of the provinces in this iſland encreaſed, Valentia being added to the four former, which were Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Maxima Cæſarienſis, and Flavia Cæſarienſis [w]. Theodoſius, at the ſame time, cruſhed in its beginning the revolt of Valentine or Valentinian, who, being baniſhed into Britain, prevailed upon ſome of the inhabitants to proclaim him emperor; which Theodoſius no ſooner underſtood, than he marched againſt the uſurper, and having got him and ſome of his confederates into his power, he delivered them up to the civil magiſtrates; but would not ſuffer them to be examined concerning their accomplices, leſt that ſhould give occaſion to new troubles [x]. The ſame year, the Franks and Saxons broke into Gaul, but were repulſed with great ſlaughter by Theodoſius on his return from Britain [y]: it was probably on account of the advantages gained on this occaſion, that Valentinian aſſumed the title of the conqueror of the Franks, which is given him in an inſcription of the year 369 [z]. Ammianus, among the other tranſactions of this year 367, relates ſeveral inſtances of the exceſſive ſeverity and injuſtice of Valentinian, who had hitherto with great care concealed the cruelty of his temper. He condemned Diocles, who had been comes largitionum in Illyricum, to be burnt alive for very inconſiderable faults; and ordered Diodorus, who had been agens in rebus, to be put to death, with three apparitors of the vicar of Italy, for no other reaſon, but becauſe Diodorus had commenced a ſuit againſt a count, who was going to court, and the apparitors had, purſuant to their office, ſummoned him to appear. The memory of Diodorus, and the three apparitors, is ſtill honoured, ſays Ammianus, by the chriſtians at Milan, who call the place where they were

But are repulſed by Theodoſius.

The revolt of Valentine in Britain ſuppreſſed.

Inſtances of Valentinian's cruelty.

[w] Ammian. l xxvii. p. 346 & l. xxviii. p. 368. Uſſer. Britannicar. eccleſiar. antiq. p. 538. [x] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 368. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 742. [y] Idem. l. xxvii. p. 346. [z] Valeſ. rer. Fran. l. i. p. 46.

" were buried the innocents [a]." To this probably the quæſtor Euphraxius alluded, when, upon the emperor's commanding another perſon to be put to death for cauſing the ſentence of a lawful judge to be executed, he told him, that the chriſtian religion honoured thoſe as martyrs whom he condemned as guilty [b]. St. Jerom tells us, that this year, in the country of the Atrebates, now the Artois, wool fell from heaven mixed with rain [c]. Oroſius adds, that it was true wool [d]; and Bucherius, that ſome of it is ſtill to be ſeen at Arras, where it is called manna [e].

Several laws enacted by Valentinian.

THE following year, the two emperors, Valentinian and Valens, were conſuls for the ſecond time. The former enacted this year ſeveral excellent laws; and among the reſt one commanding all pleaders, or lawyers, to forbear, in pleading, abuſive terms, invectives, and injuries, and to content themſelves with ſuch fees as their clients ſhall be pleaſed to give them, without making any bargain or agreement beforehand: as for ſuch lawyers as have been honoured with any public employment, he will have them to be ſatisfied with the glory of protecting the innocent, without debaſing themſelves to accept of any other reward [f]. By another law, he eſtabliſhes a phyſician in each of the fourteen quarters, into which the city of Rome was divided, who was to take care of the poor, and be maintained at the public expence. By this law the phyſician is allowed to accept what the patient ſhall think fit to give him, when entirely recovered, but not what he had promiſed during his illneſs [g]. By a third law, he commands ſome ſoldiers to remove from a ſynagogue, where they were quartered, that being contrary to the reſpect due to a place ſet apart for the worſhip of God [h].

Valentinian enters the territories of the Alemans.

Valentinian, having ſpent the winter at Treves in making vaſt preparations with a deſign to attack the Alemans in their own country, took the field on the ſeventeenth of June; and, having aſſembled all his troops, croſſed the Rhine, attended by his ſon Gratian, by the two generals Jovinus and Severus, and by count Sebaſtian, a man notorious in the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory for his cruelty to the orthodox chriſtians in Egypt, while he was governor of that province. The emperor was, as appears from the date of one of his laws, at Worms on the thirty-firſt of of July [i]. From thence he advanced into the enemy's country, and marched ſome days without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, though he committed every-where moſt dreadful ravages. At length he came to a place called Solicinium, where the Alemans had poſted hemſelves on an high and ſteep mountain, which ſeemed inacceſſible on every ſide, except that which looked to the north; and thither he ſent Sebaſtian to intercept them in their flight, if he ſhould have the good luck to diſlodge them from any other quarter. As he advanced to view their ſituation, he narrowly eſcaped falling into an ambuſcade; but having with much difficulty got ſafe to the main body of his army, he led them on to the attack. The Romans on this occaſion behaved with ſuch courage and reſolution, as can hardly be expreſſed: they were ſeveral times repulſed, the Alemans defending themſelves with equal courage and bravery. But the Romans, notwithſtanding the diſadvantage of the place, and the deſpair of the enemy, gained at length the top of the mountain, and put all to the ſword who oppoſed them. Some of the Alemans made their eſcape by the favour of the night; but the far greater part were cut in pieces, either in the fight or the purſuit, Sebaſtian having cut off their retreat [k]. This memorable battle was fought, as we have hinted above, at Solicinium, which the modern geographers take to be the city of Sultz on the Neckar, at a ſmall diſtance from the head of that river, in the dutchy of Virtemberg [l]. As the ſeaſon was already far advanced, after this victory, the ſoldiers were ſent into winter quarters, and the emperor returned with his ſon Gratian to Treves, which he entered in a kind of triumph [m]. Bucherius deſcribes at length the rout which he ſuppoſes the emperor to have taken on his return from Germany [n]. We find no laws dated from Treves till the firſt or the ſecond of December; but one publiſhed at Cologne the thirtieth of September; whence we conjecture Valentinian, on his return from Germany, to have marched againſt the Franks, who had broken into Gaul, as we have obſerved above.

[a] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 345. [b] Idem ibid. [c] Hier. chron. ad ann. 367. [d] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 32. p. 218. [e] Buch. Belg. p. 349. [f] Cod. Theodoſ. l. ii. tit. 10 leg. 2. p. 140 & Cod. Juſt. l. ii. tit. 6. leg 6. p. 187. [g] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xiii. tit. 3. leg. 8. p. 34. [h] Cod. Juſt. l. i. tit. 9. leg. 4. p. 101.

Whom he defeats with great ſlaughter.

VALENTINIAN ſeems to have ſpent the greater part of the following year, when Valentinian the ſon of Valens, and Victor, one of that prince's generals, were conſuls, in fortifying the banks of the Rhine with an incredible number of forts, towers, and caſtles, from the mouth of that river quite

He fortifies the banks of the Rhine.

to

[i] Cod. Theodoſ. l. xiii. tit. 6. leg. 3. p. 94. [k] Ammian. p. 250 - 252. Baud. p. 209. [m] Idem, l. vii. p. 352. [n] Buch. Belg. p. 351—353. [o] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 89.

to Rhætia, where it riſes [p]. He even built ſome caſtles on the other ſide of that river in the enemy's country, and one among the reſt at the conflux of the Rhine and the Neckar, where the preſent city of Manheim ſtands [q]. He likewiſe ordered a fort to be built on an hill called by our hiſtorian Piri [r]; which Bucherius takes to be the hill of Heidelberg. But the Germans, after having by their deputies entreated the emperor in vain to forbear that undertaking, fell upon the ſoldiers who were employed in the work, and cut them in pieces with the two dukes, Arator and Hermogenes, who commanded them. Syagrus, a notary or ſecretary, the only perſon who eſcaped the general ſlaughter, brought the news of it to the emperor, and was on that account diſgraced [s]; but ſoon after taken again, it ſeems, into favour; for we ſhall ſee him conſul in 381. The emperor, to animate with his preſence the ſoldiers in carrying on the above-mentioned works for the defence of the Rhine, and the ſafety of Gaul, paſſed great part of the preſent year on the banks of that river, as appears from ſeveral laws of different dates enacted at Marciaticum, which moſt geographers take to be Manheim; at Altrip, between Manheim and Spire, and at Briſac [t]. This year, the emperor cauſed ſeveral ſenators, governors of provinces, judges, and other officers, to be put to death for receiving bribes, and oppreſſing the people committed to their care, and among the reſt the eunuch Rhodanus, his chief chamberlain, whom, upon the complaint of a widow named Berenice, whoſe eſtate the eunuch had ſeized unjuſtly, he cauſed to be immediately apprehended, and to be burnt alive in the circus, where the people were aſſembled to behold the ſports [u]. The next conſuls were the two emperors Valentinian and Valens, both the third time. The former continued all this preſent year 370, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, partly at Treves, partly at Alteia, which is ſuppoſed to have been an imperial palace or country ſeat near that city. In an inſcription of this year, which is ſtill to be ſeen at Vienna in Auſtria, we read, that Equitius, general of the troops in Illyricum, erected by the emperor's orders a fort in that country; and from another inſcription of the following year found near Strigonium or Gran, in Lower Hungary, it appears, that another fort was built by his Several perſons put to death by the emperor's orders.

[p] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 966. [q] Bech. Belg p. 353. [r] Ammian. p. 766, 767. [s] Idem ibid Cod Theod. chron. p. 85, 86. [u] Zonar. p. 26. Chron. Alex. p. 700. Suid. p. 706, 707.

his orders in that neighbourhood, for protecting the trade carried on by the ſubjects of the empire in thoſe parts [w]. The emperor cauſed likewiſe a bridge to be built this year over the Tiber at Rome, which was then called the bridge of Gratian, afterwards the bridge Ceſtius, and is by the preſent inhabitants ſtyled Ponto di S. Bartolomeo, or the bridge of St. Bartholomew, being near the porch of St. Bartholomew's church [x]. In the inſcription it is ſaid to have been built in the ſeventh year of the tribuneſhip, that is, of the reign, of Valentinian and Valens, and the third of Gratian, which was the preſent year: nevertheleſs the two former princes are marked there conſuls the ſecond time; whereas it is certain, that, in the ſeventh year of their reign, and the third of Gratian's, they were both in their third conſulſhip. Valentinian and Valens are, in the ſame inſcription, ſtyled emperors for the ſeventh time, and Gratian for the ſecond, and are all three honoured with the title of conquerors of the Germans, Alemans, Franks, and Goths; which ſhews, that each of them ſhared with his collegues the glory of his victories and conqueſts. Their victories, or rather the victories of Valentinian over the Franks, muſt have been very inconſiderable, ſince Ammianus takes no notice of them. This year is remarkable in hiſtory for an irruption of the Saxons, who dwelling on the coaſts of the ocean amongſt inacceſſible marſhes, left their country in great numbers, and landing on the Roman territories, committed there dreadful ravages. Count Nauneinus, who commanded in thoſe parts, endeavouring to make head againſt them, was dangerouſly wounded, and put to flight. Hereupon the emperor diſpatched Severus againſt them, who, as he was an officer of great experience and addreſs, ſo diſtreſſed and harraſſed them, that they were forced to ſue for peace; which was granted them, with leave to return unmoleſted into their own country, after the Romans had picked out their beſt men to ſerve among their troops. But as they were returning, without the leaſt apprehenſion of any danger, the Romans, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut them all to a man in pieces. Though the Saxons were no-ways on their guard, yet they fought with incredible bravery, and ſuch preſence of mind and reſolution, that victory for ſome time inclined to their ſide *. Ammianus Marcellinus is not aſhamed to ſtyle this black piece of treachery a ſucceſsful attempt. But for ſuch breaches of the public faith, and violations of the right of nations,

The Saxons break into the empire.

Are treacherouſly cut off by the Romans.

[w] Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 291. [x] Gruter. p. 160. Baron. ann. 312. * Ammian. l. xviii. p. 375. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 32.

tions, practiſed by the Romans more frequently under the chriſtian than the pagan princes, we ſhall ſee them abandoned by heaven to thoſe very barbarians, whom they thus treacherouſly endeavoured to cruſh and utterly ſuppreſs. The Saxons were thus ſlaughtered, according to St. Jerom [y] and Oroſius [z], on the territories of the Franks, at Deuſona, ſays the former, which was a caſtle on the other ſide the Rhine, over-againſt Cologne, and is now known by the name of Tuits or Duits. The ſame year the Burgundians, to the number of eighty thouſand fighting men, appeared on the banks of the Rhine, being invited thither by Valentinian, who maintained a private intelligence with their kings, and had promiſed to paſs the Rhine, and, in conjunction with them, fall upon the Alemans, with whom they were then at variance on account of ſome ſalt-pits. But the emperor being then buſied in building the above-mentioned forts, and not caring to interrupt that work, and join them, as he had promiſed to do, they put to the ſword all the priſoners they had taken, and returned to their own country, highly enraged againſt the emperor, by whom they had been thus diſappointed and deluded [a]. However, Theodoſius, general of the horſe, to which poſt he had been raiſed for his gallant and prudent conduct in Britain, taking advantage of the conſternation the Alemans were in, made an irruption into their country, and returned with a conſiderable number of captives, to whom the emperor allotted lands and ſettlements on the banks of the Po [b]. Ammianus, in ſpeaking of the Burgundians, informs us of ſeveral particulars relating to their government and religion. He ſeems not to doubt but they were deſcended from the Romans; and Oroſius ſpeaks of them as the deſcendents of thoſe Romans, who were left by Tiberius and Druſus, the adopted ſons of Auguſtus, in the caſtles and boroughs of Germany; nay, he ſuppoſes them to have been named Burgundiones, from the Latin word burgus, ſignifying a borough [c]. But from the word burgus they ought perhaps to have been called Burgiones, as Valeſius obſerves [d]. Pliny the elder takes them to be originally a German nation, ſprung from the Vindili; that is, as is generally ſuppoſed, the Vandals [e]. Valeſius diſtinguiſhes the Burgundiones of Germany from thoſe of the ſame name, who dwelt more to the

An army of 80,000 Burgundians on the banks of the Rhine.

[y] Hier. chron. [z] Oroſ p. 219. [a] Idem, p. 377.
[b] Idem, ibid. [c] Oroſ. l. vii. c. 32. p. 219. [d] Valeſ. rer. Francic. p. 48. [e] Plin. l. iv. c. 14. p. 86.

the eaſt on the banks of the Danube [f]. Ammianus gives us a pathetic account of the horrible cruelties practiſed this year at Rome by Maximinus, or, as others ſtyle him, Maximus, a man of a moſt inhuman and ſavage temper. He was brother-in-law to Valentine or Valentinian, who attempted to uſurp the ſovereignty in Britain; but nevertheleſs of a mean deſcent, and by birth a barbarian. However, he raiſed himſelf by degrees to the firſt employments in the ſtate. He was made firſt governor of Corſica and Sardinia, and afterwards of Tuſcia or Tuſcany. From the latter government he was preferred to the honourable employment of præfectus annonæ at Rome, whoſe province it was to ſupply the city with proviſions; which he did at firſt with great prudence and moderation, but in the end betrayed a moſt cruel, inhuman and revengeful temper, which he began to do on the following occaſion: One Chilo, who had been vicar to the prefects, and his wife Maxima, having accuſed Sericus, Aſbolius, and Campenſis, three perſons of mean condition, before Olybrius, prefect or governor of the city, for having, by magical practices and enchantments, endeavoured to take away their lives, Olybrius began to enquire into this matter; but he falling ſick, the complainants, impatient of delay, petitioned and obtained, that the cauſe might be referred to the præfectus annonæ, who readily undertook it, being glad of any opportunity that offered to ſatisfy his cruel temper, no more capable of pity or moderation, ſays Ammianus, than that of a wild beaſt let looſe upon the prey. He had ſcarce begun his examinations, when he wrote to the emperor, that innumerable perſons were guilty of magical practices, but could not be convicted without racks and tortures. Hereupon the emperor, who was himſelf naturally inclined to cruelty, appointed Maximinus vicar to the prefects in the room of Aginacius, and impowered him by an edict to put ſuch perſons, if thought neceſſary, to the rack, as had been by other princes exempted from it on account of their rank, or only ſubjected to it in caſes of treaſon. With Maximinus he joined in commiſſion one Leo, at that time only a notary, but afterwards raiſed to the dignity of magiſter officiorum. He was by birth a Pannonian, of mean parentage, but no leſs blood-thirſty, according to Ammianus, than his collegue Maximinus [g]. Theſe two implacable judges executed their commiſſion with that cruelty which every one may imagine: perſons of all ranks and ages were dragged to their tribunal, tortured tortured without mercy, and either executed like public malefactors, or ſtript of their eſtates, and ſent into baniſhment. Among the former were Marinus, a famous pleader, Cethegus, Paphius, and Cornelius, all three ſenators, and many other eminent perſons of both ſexes. Alypius, a young nobleman of great diſtinction, was, for a very ſmall fault, ſent into exile. Lollianus, the ſon of Lampadius, who had been governor of Rome in 366, and præfectus prætorio under Conſtantius, being accuſed of having copied, when he was yet very young, a book of magic, his father, finding Maximinus inclined to condemn him to baniſhment, adviſed him to appeal to the emperor; which he did accordingly: but Valentinian having referred the cauſe to Phalangus governor of Bætica, who ſurpaſſed Maximinus himſelf in cruelty, the youth was by him ſentenced to death, and publicly beheaded. As Maximinus continued raging without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition, the ſenate diſpatched deputies to the emperor, earneſtly entreating him, as he tendered the lives of his innocent ſubjects, to revoke the power he had given to Maximinus. Valentinian complied with their requeſt, which put an end for the preſent to thoſe bloody executions. Maximinus was called to court, and received with great marks of eſteem and affection by the emperor, who two years after created him prefect of Gaul, in which office he continued at leaſt three years (for he was ſtill prefect in 376); but ſoon after put to death by Gratian, with ſome of the miniſters of his cruelty [h].

The great cruelties of Maximinus at Rome.

Perſons of all ranks tortured and executed.

[f] Valeſ. ibid. [g] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 358—360.

Laws enacted by Valentinian.

THE following year, when Gratian and Sex. Petronius Probus were conſuls, the emperor enacted ſeveral remarkable laws, and among the reſt one dated the eleventh of February, and addreſſed to Viventius prefect of Gaul, enacting, that ſuch players and comedians as ſhould have received at the point of death the ſacrament of baptiſm, ſhould not be obliged, if they ſhould recover, to act again on the ſtage [i]. From this law it appears, that the profeſſion of a player, always deemed infamous among the Romans, was, under the chriſtian princes, thought inconſiſtent with chriſtianity; and likewiſe, that it was not free and voluntary, but ſervile, and hereditary in certain families. By another law, dated the ſeventh of September, the emperor declares, that the daughters of players ſhall not be obliged to follow the profeſſion of their mothers, if they have behaved in any other calling ſo as to deſerve a good character [k]. By a third law, dated the twenty-[h] Idem, p. 361—366. [i] Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 7. leg. 1. p. 361. [k] Idem ibid. p. 363.

twenty-ninth of May, and addreſſed to the ſenate, he allows the free exerciſe of the pagan religion; and by a fourth, dated the twenty-eighth of June, ſeveral privileges are granted or reſtored to the pagan pontiffs, and the ſame honour and reſpect is ordered to be paid to them as to the comites or counts [l]. It is ſurpriſing, that an emperor, who is ſaid to have been not only an orthodox, but a zealous, chriſtian, ſhould have thus favoured the pagan pontiffs and religion. By a law dated the ſeventeenth of May, he exempts from all civil offices ſuch as had been admitted among the clergy before his time; but obliges the reſt to diſcharge them, notwithſtanding the privileges and immunities granted by other princes to all eccleſiaſtics. All the laws enacted this year before the twenty-eighth of June, are dated from Treves, whence he removed to Cantionacum, a place unknown to geographers, but which muſt have been but at a ſmall diſtance from Treves, ſince the emperor was in that city on the twenty-eighth of June, and the very next day at Cantionacum, where he ſtaid till the fifteenth of Auguſt. On the ſixth of September he was at Mentz, probably on his march into the country of the Alemans: for this year he undertook an expedition againſt them, hoping to ſurpriſe Macrianus their king, a brave and reſolute prince; but he, having received timely notice of his approach, ſaved himſelf by flight; and the emperor, greatly concerned for his diſappointment, returned to Treves, after having laid waſte the country round Mentz belonging to the Alemans called Bucinobantes, to whom he gave one of their own nation, by name Fraomarius, for king, who ſoon after exchanged his new dignity for the command of ſome of his countrymen then quartered in Britain. Valentinian was returned to Treves, with his two generals, Severus and Theodoſius, on the ſixth of December [m]. Ammianus Marcellinus [n] and St. Jerom [o] obſerve, among the tranſactions of this year, that Octavianus, who had been proconſul of Africa under Julian, having concealed himſelf, while he was purſued by the officers of juſtice, in the houſe of an eccleſiaſtic, the magiſtrates commanded the eccleſiaſtic to deliver him up; which he refuſing to do, was by the emperor's orders beheaded at Sirmium. The ſame year Hymecius, who had been vicar of Rome under Julian, and raiſed by Valentinian to the proconſulſhip

He attempts to ſurpriſe the king of the Alemans.

Other inſtances of his ſeverity.

[l] Idem ibid. [m] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 397. & l. xxx. p. 398. Cod. Theod. p. 89. [n] Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 238. & l. xxix. p. 396. [o] Hier. chron.

conſulſhip of Africa, being accuſed of evil practices, (our hiſtorian explains himſelf no farther) was brought to Ocricolum, about thirty miles from Rome, to be tried there by Ampelius, governor of that city, and his vicar Maximinus. A letter was produced againſt him, written with his own hand to a pagan prieſt, named Amantius, deſiring him to offer ſacrifices to the gods, that the cruel and avaricious emperor might in the end be reconciled to him; for part of his eſtate had been already confiſcated for ſome real, or, as Ammianus believed, ſuppoſed, crime. When this letter was produced, Hymecius, well appriſed of the cruelty of Maximinus, appealed to the emperor, who referred the whole affair to the ſenate, by whom Hymecius was baniſhed to the iſland of Boas on the coaſt of Dalmatia. The emperor was highly diſſatisfied with the ſenate for not ſentencing him to death; but did not think it adviſeable to make the leaſt alteration in their decree [p]. The next conſuls were Modeſtus and Arintheus, during whoſe adminiſtration nothing happened in the weſt, which authors have thought worthy of tranſmitting to poſterity. From the dates of ſeveral laws it appears, that the emperor paſſed the whole year, partly at Treves, and partly at Nazonacum, which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from that city [q].

THE next conſuls were Valentinian and Valens, both for the fourth time. This year Maximinus was created prefect of Gaul; and the firſt againſt whom he exerted his new authority, was a perſon guilty of no leſs enormous crimes than himſelf, viz. Remigius, who, being magiſter officiorum, had ſcreened his kinſman Romanus from the puniſhment due to the many cruelties, murders, and extortions which he had committed in Africa, as we have related above. Leo, upon his return to Rome, where he had been joined in commiſſion with Maximinus, being raiſed to the poſt of magiſter officiorum, Remigius, who held it before him, retired to his eſtate in the neighbourhood of Mentz, his native city, to lead there a retired life. But Maximinus, deſpiſing him now that he was out of power, ſeized and put to the rack one of his domeſtics, by name Cæſarius, in order to make him diſcover the evil practices of his maſter, and what ſums he had received of Romanus to defend and ſupport him at court. This Remigius no ſooner underſtood, than, overcome by fear, he ſtrangled himſelf, to avoid a public and more ignominious Remigius and Palladius, the accomplices of Romanus, ſtrangle themſelves.

[p] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 359. [q] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 90, 91.

minious death [r]. Palladius, who was no leſs guilty than Remigius, had been, it ſeems, diſgraced before, for ſome other miſdemeanour, though he aſcribed his misfortune chiefly to his having impoſed upon the emperor in an affair of ſuch importance. Of this Valentinian had ſome ſuſpicion, and therefore ordered him to be arreſted; but while the ſoldiers who guarded him were paſſing the night (no doubt the eve of ſome feſtival) in a church, he ended his life in the ſame manner as Remigius had done his [s]. Romanus himſelf was then under arreſt, for having, by his unaccountable conduct, driven Firmus, a Mooriſh prince, to revolt. Theodoſius, who was ſent to ſuppreſs the rebellion, had ſeized Romanus, with all his domeſtics and papers, among which were found ſome relating to the affair of Leptis. Upon this Palladius had been arreſted; but both he and Remigius having laid violent hands on themſelves, Romanus was ſome time after ſet at liberty, and the matter dropped for the preſent, but reſumed under Gratian, when Romanus was convicted of high miſdemeanours; but nevertheleſs, by the intereſt of Merobaudus, allowed to come to court to plead his own cauſe before the emperor [t]. What was the iſſue of this affair, we are no-where told. Firmus, whom we have mentioned above, was the ſon of Nubel, the moſt powerful of all the Mooriſh princes, who looked upon him, though ſubject to the Romans, as their king and ſovereign. He left ſeveral ſons behind him, and among the reſt Firmus and Zamma. The latter being privately murdered by his brother Firmus, Romanus, with whom Zamma lived in great intimacy, to revenge the death of his friend, did all that lay in his power to incenſe the emperor againſt Firmus, being backed therein by his kinſman Remigius, then magiſter officiorum. Hereupon Firmus, appriſed of the danger that threatened him, and no longer able to bear the haughty and inſolent behaviour of Romanus, and the officers of the army, reſolved to revolt in his own defence; and accordingly, having animated the other Mooriſh nations to ſhake off the yoke, under which they had long groaned, he aſſumed the purple and the other enſigns of royalty, with the title of king, a Roman tribune, who had taken part with him, laying his collar upon the head of the new king inſtead of a diadem [u]. Some antiquaries will have this to be the Firmus, who, on an antient medal, bears the title of Auguſtus [y]; but their opinion is rejected by others. Firmus, finding himſelf in a ſhort time at the head of a conſiderable body of Moors, who flocked to him from all quarters, ravaged the provinces of Africa and Mauritania without oppoſition, and even made himſelf maſter Takes Cæſarea and other places.

Firmus revolts in Africa.

[r] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 417. [s] Idem, l. xxviii. p. 381. & l. xxix. p. 399. [t] Idem, l. xxviii. p. 381, 382. [u] Idem, l. xxx. p. 429. Oroſ. l. vii. c. 33. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 744.

of Cæſarea, now Algier, the metropolis of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, where he found a conſiderable ſum belonging to the exchequer, but left in the hands of the magiſtrates of that city. The officers of the treaſury ſued the magiſtrates for the money which had been left with them in truſt; but were ordered by the emperor to drop the proſecution, Clemens, biſhop of the place, having prevailed upon him to iſſue that order, and by that means ſaved his country from certain ruin [z]. The famous Symmachus, of whom hereafter, wrote on this occaſion to Titianus, then vicar of Africa, preſſing him to cauſe the order which the biſhop had obtained to be put in execution [a]. Firmus took likewiſe the city of Rucata, betrayed to him as was believed, by the biſhop of the Donatiſts, upon his promiſing not to moleſt any of that ſect [b]. The Donatiſts looked upon Firmus, not as an uſurper, but a lawful prince; whence they were in thoſe parts ſtyled Firmiani [c]. The emperor was no ſooner informed of the revolt of Firmus, than he diſpatched againſt him Theodoſius, the beſt general of his time, with the troops that were quartered in Pannonia and Upper Mæſia, and a detachment out of thoſe that attended the court, and were thence called comitatenſes. Theodoſius embarqued at Arles in the latter end of the year 372, or the beginning of 373, and having had a favourable paſſage, landed ſoon after at a place called Igilgitanum in Mauritania Sitifenſis. His firſt care, upon his arrival, was to arreſt Romanus, who, by his haughty and arbitrary conduct, had, as it were, forced the Moors to revolt. Firmus in the mean time, hearing that ſo renowned a commander was ſent againſt him, began to deſpair of ſucceſs; and thereupon diſpatched deputies to Theodoſius, declaring, that he had been in a manner forced to revolt; that he did not pretend to juſtify what he had done, but, on the contrary, was ready to ſubmit, and quit the enſigns of royalty, provided the emperor would forget his paſt conduct. Theodoſius, thinking it adviſeable to admit of his ſubmiſſion and excuſe, aſſured him of his pardon, upon his delivering ing up to him ſome of the chief men among the Moors, by way of hoſtages. This Firmus promiſed to do; but as he put off from day to day the execution of his promiſe, Theodoſius, ſuſpecting his ſincerity, marched from Panchariana, the place of the general rendezvous, to Tubuſuptius, in the neighbourhood of mount Ferratus, where Maſcezel, brother to Firmus, lay encamped with a conſiderable body of Moors. He was there met by a ſecond embaſſy from Firmus; but, as the deputies brought no hoſtages along with them, he would not ſo much as admit them to his preſence, but fell unexpectedly upon the Tyndenſes and Maſiniſſenſes, two Mooriſh nations, commanded by Maſcezel; and having defeated them with great ſlaughter, he laid waſte the country, razed the caſtle of Petra, which had been lately built, and made himſelf maſter of another ſtrong-hold, which he made choice of for a magazine, ſtoring it with all ſorts of proviſions, that they might be nearer at hand, in caſe he ſhould think fit to penetrate farther into the country. In the mean time, Maſcezel, having rallied his broken forces, ventured a ſecond engagement, in which he was attended with no better ſucceſs than in the former, great numbers of his troops being cut off, and he himſelf narrowly eſcaping. Hereupon Firmus ſent at laſt the promiſed hoſtages, and with them ſome biſhops to intercede with Theodoſius in his behalf. The Roman general received them with the utmoſt civility and reſpect, and upon their promiſing in the name of Firmus, that the booty and priſoners he had taken ſhould be reſtored, and the Roman army ſupplied with proviſions, he granted a general pardon to him and all his followers; which ſo encouraged the Moor, that he came in perſon to wait on Theodoſius; and, bewailing his folly and raſhneſs, promiſed to make amends for both by his future conduct and fidelity. Theodoſius received him in a moſt obliging manner, gave him all the encouragement he expected or deſired, and diſmiſſed him, extremely pleaſed with his reception. Firmus, at his departure, left ſome of his relations behind him for hoſtages; and two days after delivered up to the Romans a place called Icoſium, with the priſoners, military enſigns, and the booty he had taken. From thence Theodoſius advanced to Tipaſa, where he was met by the embaſſadors of the Mazices, a nation inhabiting the eaſtern parts of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, who had joined Firmus in his revolt. They came to ſubmit in the name of the whole nation, and to beg pardon for their revolt; but Theodoſius returned them no other anſwer, than that their perfidy deſerved to be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. From Tipaſa

Theodoſius is ſent againſt him.

Firmus pretends to ſubmit.

[y] Spanh. l. vii. p 599. [z] Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 389. Symmach. l. i. epiſt. 58. p. 39. [a] Sym. ibid. [b] Auguſt. ep. 164. p. 296. [c] Idem in par. l. i. c. 10, 11.

Theodoſius defeats ſome nations in alliance with Firmus.

Firmus pretends anew to ſubmit.

Tipaſa he proceeded to Cæſarea, now Algier, which Firmus had taken in the beginning of the rebellion, and delivered up to be plundered by his ſoldiers. There he received certain intelligence, that Firmus was preparing under-hand for war; that he had never had any real intention of concluding a peace with the Romans; and that he only watched an opportunity of falling upon them at the beſt advantage. Hereupon Theodoſius, leaving at Cæſarea the firſt and ſecond legions, who were to repair the fortifications, and ſecure it in the beſt manner they could againſt any further attempts of the enemy, marched to Sugabarri, a town of Mauritania Cæſarienſis, where he ſurpriſed a Roman cohort, who had joined the rebels. Their tribunes he put to death; but contented himſelf with condemning the common ſoldiers to the meaneſt offices in the army. From thence he advanced farther into the country; and having made himſelf maſter of Gaionatis and Tingitanum, two places of great ſtrength, he paſſed the mountain Ancorarius, and entering the country of the Mazices, gained a ſignal victory over them. They made at firſt a vigorous reſiſtance; but were at length utterly defeated, and almoſt all put to the ſword. But, notwithſtanding this victory, the Moors poured down upon him from all quarters in ſuch multitudes, that he thought it adviſeable to retire, rather than penetrate farther into the country, his army being only three thouſand five hundred ſtrong. But the enemy, appriſed of his deſign, not only harraſſed him inceſſantly on his march, but, by ſtopping up all the paſſes, cut off his retreat; inſomuch, that the whole army muſt inevitably have periſhed, had not the Moors unexpectedly betaken themſelves to flight, and left the paſſes open, at the ſight of a great body of their own countrymen, whom they miſtook, obſerving ſome Roman deſerters at their head, for a reinforcement coming to relieve Theodoſius. The Romans, having thus, by a happy miſtake, eſcaped death or ſlavery, retired in good order to Muzucanum, and from thence to Tipaſa; where Theodoſius, reflecting on the poſture of his affairs, reſolved to manage the war after another manner, and to try, whether he could, by menaces or promiſes, prevail upon the nations in alliance with Firmus to make a ſeparate peace, and deliver him up to the Romans. With this view he diſpatched embaſſadors to the ſeveral nations that had joined him; which Firmus, who was well acquainted with the fickle temper of the Moors, no ſooner underſtood, than, dreading the iſſue of ſuch negotiations, he abandoned his army; and taking the advantage of a dark night, retired privately

But prepares for war.

Theodoſius gains great advantages over his confederates.

vately to the mountains called Caprarienſes, which, by reaſon of the rocks and precipices, were deemed inacceſſible. The multitude, ſtruck with amazement at his unexpected flight, and now without a head, ſoon diſperſed; and Theodoſius, ſeizing their camp, made himſelf maſter of the neighbouring countries without the leaſt oppoſition, placing ſuch governors over them, as had given him evident proofs of their fidelity. He then marched without delay in purſuit of Firmus, who, as he was informed, had taken ſanctuary in the country of the Iſaflenſes. That warlike nation refuſing to deliver him up, ſeveral battles were fought, in one of which Mazaca, Firmus's brother, was taken priſoner, but died the ſame day of the wounds he had received. Evaſius, a perſon of great authority among the Iſaflenſes, and his ſon Florus fell likewiſe into the hands of the Romans; and as they had been remarkably zealous in the cauſe of Firmus, they were both, by Theodoſius's orders, burnt alive. The Romans, overpowered by numbers, were often reduced to great ſtreights; but having in the end utterly defeated the enemy in a battle which laſted from morning to night, ſome nations, that had joined the Iſaflenſes, began to be weary of the war, and deſert them. Hereupon Igmazen, prince of the country, finding himſelf abandoned by his allies, and no-ways in a condition to make head againſt the Romans with his own forces alone, privately agreed with Theodoſius to betray Firmus into his hands, and accordingly ordered him to be ſecured, while he was preparing to make his eſcape. But Firmus, to avoid the diſgrace of the puniſhment, which he apprehended from the Romans, ſtrangled himſelf while his guards were aſleep, to the great grief of Igmazen, who had propoſed to ingratiate himſelf with the Romans, by carrying him alive to their camp. However, he immediately ſent the body to Theodoſius, who received it with great joy, and ſoon after returned to Sitifis, which city he entered in a kind of triumph. The ſeveral Mooriſh nations, that had ſided with Firmus, ſent deputies to ſue for peace; which Theodoſius readily granted them, upon their delivering up to him ſome of their leading men, whom he cauſed to be put to death [q]. In this war Gildo, one of Firmus's brothers, took party with the Romans, and gave ſignal proofs of his fidelity; but afterwards revolted under Honorius, and was attended with no better ſucceſs than his brother. When the war was ended, Theodoſius wrote to Symmachus; but in his letter he ſpoke only Firmus abandons his army and flies to the Iſaflenſes.

Who are defeated by Theodoſius.

Firmus ſtrangles himſelf.

[q] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 398—408. Zoſ. l. iv p. 744 only in general terms of his victory, referring him to public fame for a more particular account of it. Symmachus, in his anſwer, commends his modeſty, which to him ſeemed the more worthy of praiſe, as Theodoſius was no leſs qualified for writing than fighting [r].

Cruelties exerciſed at Rome by Simplicius.

THE following year, when Gratian was conſul the third time with Equitius, many eminent perſons of both ſexes were cruelly racked and put to death by Simplicius, vicar of Rome, who, being raiſed to that employment by the intereſt of Maximinus, put, under various pretences, all thoſe to death to whom his patron bore the leaſt grudge, and among the reſt Aginacius, a patrician of an illuſtrious and antient family, who had been conſular or governor of Byzacene under Julian, and vicar of Rome in the preſent reign. He was accuſed of adultery; and though the informer could not make good the charge, yet he was ſentenced to death, and executed with Anepſia, a lady of great diſtinction, who, being accuſed of the ſame crime, had impeached Aginacius, hoping by that means to ingratiate herſelf with Simplicius, and eſcape the danger that threatened her [s]. As for the emperor, he paſſed the winter at Milan, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, but was again at Treves on the twenty-firſt of May, and the twentieth of June [t]. From thence he marched into Germany; and, after having ravaged the country bordering on the Rhine, returned to Baſle, in the neighbourhood of which city he ordered a fort to be built named Robur: from this fort we find a law dated the tenth of July [u]. While the emperor was encamped there, news was brought, that the

The Quadi and Sarmatians break into Illyricum.

Quadi had with great violence broken into Illyricum, upon the following provocation: Valentinian, perhaps over-careful in fortifying the borders of the empire, had ordered ſome forts to be built beyond the Danube, in the territories of the Quadi, who, alarmed thereat, prevailed upon Equitius, then general of the troops in Illyricum, to ſuſpend the work till he received further orders from the emperor, to whom they had ſent ſome of the chief men of their nation to complain of that violence. But in the mean time, Maximinus, prefect of Gaul, upbraiding Equitius with cowardice and irreſolution, bragged that, in ſpite of the Quadi, the forts ſhould be ſoon finiſhed, provided his ſon Marcellianus, though yet very young, was but created duke of Valeria, a province of Illyricum. Marcellianus being accordingly advanced to that dignity, upon his arrival arrival in Illyricum, ordered the work, which had been for ſome time diſcontinued, to be carried on a-new, without taking the leaſt notice of the complaints of the Quadi. Hereupon Gabinius, their king, came in perſon to wait upon him, entreating him, with the greateſt modeſty and reſpect imaginable, not to give any motives of jealouſy or miſunderſtanding between his people and the ſubjects of the empire. Marcellianus received him in a very obliging manner; and pretending to hearken to his juſt remonſtrances, invited him to a banquet, during which he cauſed him, without any regard to the ſacred laws of hoſpitality, or the right of nations, to be inhumanly murdered. This black piece of treachery alarmed and incenſed both the Quadi and their neighbours the Sarmatians, who, flying to arms, paſſed the Danube in the utmoſt rage; and falling upon the reapers, it being then harveſt-time, cut moſt of them in pieces, laid waſte the country to a great diſtance, and returned loaded with an immenſe booty. In this confuſion, Conſtantia, the daughter of Conſtantius, who was then paſſing through Illyricum, in order to be married to Gratian, had fallen into their hands, had not Meſſala, governor of the province, who attended her, put her into a chariot in great haſte, and conveyed her with all poſſible ſpeed to Sirmium [w]. Conſtantia was born after the death of her father, and therefore was at that time in the thirteenth or fourteenth year of her age [x]. She is ſtyled on the antient coins Flavia Maxima Conſtantia. Probus, the prefect of Illyricum, reſided then at Sirmium; but as he was a man of no courage, though deſcended of an illuſtrious family, he was ſo alarmed at the report of the many murders and unheard-of cruelties committed by the incenſed enemy, that he had already provided himſelf with ſwift horſes to make his eſcape; but being with much-ado prevailed upon to ſtay, more out of regard to his own ſafety, than the publick good, he took all imaginable care to put the city in a condition to withſtand the efforts of the barbarians; who thereupon, inſtead of laying ſiege to it, reſolved to purſue Equitius, whom they looked upon as the chief author of the murder of their king. He had fled into Valeria, and thither they followed him, committing dreadful ravages in the countries through which they paſſed. In their way they met two legions, the Pannonian and the Mœſian, who had been ſent to oppoſe them, and were of ſufficient ſtrength to Gabinius, king of the Quadi, murdered by the Romans.

[r] Sym l. x. epiſt. 1. p. 389. [s] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 363—366. [t] Cod. Theodoſ. chron. p. 93, 94. [u] Idem ibid.

The Quadi invade Pannonia, and commit dreadful ravages.

[w] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 408, 409. Zoſ. l. iv. p. 745.
[x] Chryſ. ad vid. junior. p. 463.

to reſtrain their fury, had they not fallen into an unſeaſonable contention about precedency, each of them claiming the honour of charging the firſt. The barbarians, appriſed of their diſagreement, without waiting for the ſignal of battle, fell firſt with great fury upon the Mœſian legion, before they had time to put themſelves in a poſture of defence; and having cut moſt of them in pieces, attacked, and in like manner put to the ſword, the other legion, only a ſmall number of them by flight eſcaping death or captivity [y]. Thus all the open country was abandoned to the barbarians, the Romans remaining maſters only of the fortified places, where they committed, ſays Zoſimus [z], as great diſorders as the barbarians themſelves in the other parts. But the Sarmatians, having entered Upper Mœſia, were repulſed with incredible ſlaughter by Theodoſius, afterwards emperor, but at that time very young, and only duke of Mœſia. The barbarians, who were infinitely ſuperior to him in number, thought to have overpowered him; but he, with a courage and conduct far above his years, made ſuch a dreadful havock of them, as to ſatiate with the bodies of the ſlain, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus, the birds of prey, and the moſt ravenous among the wild beaſts [a]. The Sarmatians, deſpairing of ſucceſs againſt ſo brave a leader, ſent deputies to ſue for peace, which they obtained, and for ſome time obſerved, being kept in awe by ſome troops, which Valentinian had ſent into Illyricum upon the firſt notice of the irruption of the barbarians into that province. He was for leaving Gaul, and marching in perſon againſt them; but as the autumn was already far ſpent, and Macrianus king of the Alemans, with other princes, ſeemed ready to break into Gaul upon the departure of the emperor, he was with much-ado prevailed upon to put off his march to a more convenient ſeaſon. However, as he was determined to leave Gaul early in the ſpring, and march into Illyricum, he invited Macrianus, whoſe valour he chiefly dreaded, to an interview in the neighbourhood of Mentz. Macrianus complied with his invitation, and though at firſt he betrayed a great deal of pride in ſeeing his friendſhip thus courted by the Roman emperor, yet in the end he accepted the advantageous terms that were offered him, and continued to his death a faithful friend to the Romans [b]. He was in the end killed by Merobandes king

They defeat two Roman legions.

The Sarmatians defeated by Theodoſius.

The emperor concludes a peace with the king of the Alemans,

[y] Ammian. & Zoſ. ibid. [z] Zoſ. p. 745. [a] Ammian. p. 410, 411. [b] Idem, l. xxx. p. 417, 418.

king of the Franks, whoſe dominions he had invaded [c]. Valentinian, having thus concluded a peace with the brave king of the Alemans, returned to Treves, where he paſſed the winter [d]; and the following ſpring ſet out from thence for Illyricum, attended by his wife Juſtina and Valentinian her eldeſt ſon. Gratian was left at Treves, with a numerous body of troops, to keep the German nations in awe. The preſent year 375, is marked in the faſti thus; the year after the third conſulſhip of Gratian and his collegue Equitius. St. Jerom writes, that no conſuls were named this year, on account of the diſturbances raiſed in Pannonia by the Sarmatians [e]. The emperor was ſtill at Treves on the ninth of April [f]; but left that city ſoon after [g]. He was met on his march by embaſſadors from the Sarmatians, who, throwing themſelves at his feet, earneſtly entreated him not to give credit to the reports that had been ſpread abroad concerning the ravages and cruelties ſaid to have been committed by thoſe of their nation; they aſſured him, that, upon examination, he would not find them guilty of the crimes that were by their enemies urged againſt them. The emperor anſwered, that he would determine nothing for the preſent; but ſuſpend his judgment till his arrival in thoſe parts, which had moſt ſuffered by their late irruption. Having thus diſmiſſed the embaſſadors, he purſued his march; and arriving in Illyricum, took up his quarters at Carnuntum, once a flouriſhing city, but then in decay. Moſt geographers take it to be the city of Hainburgh on the Danube in Auſtria, about thirty-three miles eaſt of Vienna. The emperor choſe it, as being moſt conveniently ſituated for the defence of the country, and continued there three months, making the neceſſary preparations for his intended expedition againſt the Quadi and Sarmations [h]. He was ſtill at Carnuntum on the twelfth of Auguſt [i]. Ammianus blames him for not enquiring how Gabinius king of the Quadi came to be murdered, nor puniſhing thoſe, who, through treachery or cowardice, had abandoned the defence of the frontiers; both which things were expected from a prince of his exactneſs and ſeverity [k]. Probus the prefect was the only perſon againſt whom he ſhewed any reſentment; for he, to ſatisfy the avarice of the emperor, had, according to Ammianus, oppreſſed the people committed to his care in a manner

And marches into Illyricum.

[c] Idem ibid. [d] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 64. [e] Hier. chron. [f] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 94. [g] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 418. [h] Idem ibid. [i] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 94. [k] Ammian. p. 425.

The people of Illyricum oppreſſed by Probus.

manner hardly to be expreſſed, putting to death, baniſhing, or condemning to dungeons, the moſt wealthy among them, that he might ſeize their eſtates; inſomuch, that all the perſons of rank in the country, dreading the avarice and unheard-of cruelties of their governor, had privately diſpoſed of their effects, and abandoned their country. All this the emperor learnt of a philoſopher, by name Iphicles, who had been ſent by the Epirots his countrymen, to thank Probus for his prudent and mild adminiſtration. The emperor, informed of the errand on which he was ſent, aſked him, whether his countrymen were really ſatisfied with their governor? and whether their thanks and commendations were ſincere? They thank and commend him, anſwered frankly the philoſopher; but with tears in their eyes, and ſore againſt their will. Hereupon Valentinian made a ſtrict enquiry into his conduct, and, finding him guilty of moſt enormous extortions, and unheard-of barbarities, reſolved to depoſe him; but was prevented by death from putting his deſign in execution [l]. Thus Ammianus. But St. Jerom writes, that Illyricum was plundered, and tyrannically oppreſſed, by Equitius, without ſo much as mentioning Probus [m]; and Ammianus himſelf owns, that Leo, then magiſter officiorum, exaſperated the emperor againſt Probus, hoping to be made prefect in his room [n].

An account of the family of Probus.

Probus was deſcended from one of the moſt illuſtrious families in Rome, and reckoned amongſt his anceſtors the emperor Marcus Aurelius. The families of the Probi, of the Anicii, and of the Olybrii, were, according to St. Jerom [o], Auſonius [p], and Prudentius [q], the moſt conſpicuous in Rome. Probus, who had embraced the chriſtian religion, with his whole family [r], lived in great intimacy with St. Ambroſe, the celebrated biſhop of Milan. When the latter was by the emperor appointed governor of Liguria and Æmilia, Probus, in taking his leave of him, gave him the following memorable advice: Acquit yourſelf in your office, not like a governor, but like a biſhop [s]. St. Ambroſe was then by profeſſion a pleader or advocate. Probus was firſt proconſul of Africa in 358, afterwards four times prefect of Italy or Gaul, and in 371, Gratian's collegue in the conſulſhip. He was no leſs famous for his wealth, than his birth and employments; for he is ſaid to have owned immenſe poſſeſſions in all the provinces of [l] Idem ibid. [m] Hier. chron. [n] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 424, 425. [o] Hier. ep. 8. p. 63. [p] Auſon. ep. 3. p. 422. [q] Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 221. [r] Idem ibid. [s] Ambroſ. vit. p. 79.

of the empire [t]. Paulinus Diaconus tells us, that two Perſian lords of great diſtinction, being come to Milan to viſit St. Ambroſe, went from thence to Rome, on purpoſe to behold the grandeur and pomp in which Probus lived [u]. He died, as appears from Claudian, before the end of the year 394, being then in the ſixtieth year of his age [w], after having received the ſacrament of baptiſm; and was buried in a magnificent monument near the church of St. Peter at Rome, of which monument ſome remains were ſtill to be ſeen in the time of pope Nicolas V [x]. Several letters written to him by Symmachus have reached our times [y], and a poem addreſſed to him by Auſonius in 372. Ammianus commends him in ſeveral places of his hiſtory, but more frequently taxes him with great vices, perhaps becauſe he profeſſed the chriſtian religion [z]. Claudian, though a pagan as well as Ammianus, highly commends him; but it is in a panegyric on his children [a]. Both writers agree in extolling his generoſity. His wife Proba, named in the antient inſcriptions Anicia Faltonia Proba, was no leſs eſteemed on account of her birth and extraordinary qualities, than her huſband, being adorned with every virtue becoming her ſex, and deſcended from the Anician family, equalled by Caſſiodorus [b], St. Auſtin [c], St. Jerom [d], and St. Ambroſe [e], to the imperial families. Some of her anceſtors bore the firſt employments in the times of the republic; and one of them is ſaid to have been honoured with a triumph for reducing Illyricum [f]. Ammianus [g] and Zoſimus [h] take notice of their immenſe wealth; and St. Jerom, writing to Demetrias the grand-daughter of Probus, ſays, that it was the peculiar prerogative of her family to poſſeſs riches, and deſpiſe them [i]. Anicius Julianus, on whom Symmachus beſtows great encomiums [k], was the firſt Roman ſenator that embraced the chriſtian religion [l]. Ammianus obſerves, that, in the reign of Conſtantius, the Anicians bore the chief ſway in Rome [m].

But

[t] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 352. [u] Ambroſ. vit. p. 83. [w] Claud. de conſulat. Olyb. & Prob. p. 2. [x] Baron. ad ann. 395. [y] Sym. l. iii. epiſt. 50—55. p. 36. [z] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 352, 353. l. xxviii. p. 362. l. xxxii. p. 423, 424. [a] Claud. ibid. [b] Caſſiod. l. x. ep. 12. p. 162. [c] Auguſt. ep. 179. p. 305. [d] Hier. ep. 11. p. 162. [e] Amb. ep. 33. p. 263. [f] Auſon. p. 422. [g] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68. [h] Zoſ. l. vi. p. 828. [i] Hier. ep. 8. p. 68. [k] Sym. p 299. [l] Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 221. [m] Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68.

But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory: Valentinian, during his ſtay at Carnuntum, cauſed Fauſtinus, nephew to Viventius, a few years before prefect of Gaul, to be firſt inhumanly racked, and afterwards publicly executed, being accuſed of magical practices, and of having anſwered one Nigrinus, deſiring him in jeſt to make him a notary, Make me firſt emperor. They were joking; but the joke coſt both of them their lives. From Carnuntum the emperor diſpatched Merobandes and count Sebaſtian, with a party of foot, to lay waſte the enemy's country, while he, with the main body of the army, advanced to Acincum, now Gran, or, as others will have it, Buda, in Lower Hungary [n]. There he paſſed the Danube, and having ravaged the enemy's country far and near, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, he returned to Acincum, when the autumn was already far advanced. Being deſirous to find out ſome convenient winter-quarters in that frozen climate, he proceeded from thence to Sabaria, now Servar; but that place not anſwering his expectation, he purſued his march along the Danube to Bregetio, which ſome take to be a village now called Bregnitz, and others a place in the iſle of Schut, where the preſent city of Komare ſtands, or a little below that of Markelhaz [o]. There he gave audience to the embaſſadors of the Quadi, come to ſue for peace; but while he was ſpeaking to them with great warmth, and threatening to extirpate their whole nation, he all on a ſudden fell to the ground, as if his life and voice had failed him at once. He was conveyed into his chamber by thoſe who attended him, where he was ſeized with convulſion fits, and violent contorſions of all his limbs, in the agonies of which he expired on the ſeventeenth of November of this year 375, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, after having reigned twelve years, wanting an hundred days [p]. Victor writes, that he died of a ſurfeit [q]. St. Jerom aſcribes his death to a violent vomiting of blood [r]. Socrates tells us, that being affronted at the meanneſs and beggarly appearance of the embaſſadors of the Quadi, he aſked them, If their country afforded men of no better quality to appear before him? They anſwered, That the firſt men in the nation were in his preſence. Hereupon he fell into a great paſſion, upbraiding their whole nation with arrogance, for preſuming to inſult the majeſty of the Roman emperor and Fauſtinus executed.

Valentinian ravages the country of the Quadi.

He dies ſuddenly.

[n] Vide Baudr. p. 55. [o] Vide Sanſ. & Baud. p. 129, 130.
[p] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 427. Vict. epit. Philoſt. l. ix. c. 16. p. 130. [q] Vict. epit. [r] Hier. ep. 3. p. 26.

and people. He delivered this with ſo much heat and violence, that, his veins burſting, he was inſtantly ſuffocated in his own blood [s]. The reader will find in Socrates part of the ſpeech which he made, or is ſuppoſed to have made, to the embaſſadors [t]. His death was preſaged, according to Ammianus, by ſeveral omens: A blazing ſtar, which in the opinion of that writer, ever forebodes the death of ſome great perſonage, had appeared a few days before: at Sirmium the palace court, and forum were conſumed by lightning: the night before he died, he ſaw, or imagined to ſee, his wife, then abſent, ſitting by him, in a melancholy poſture and in a mourning dreſs, with her hair diſhevelled. This Ammianus takes to have been his genius forſaking him [u]. On the day he died, his horſe, while he was about to mount, rearing with great fury, his ſtrator or equerry, ſtriving to place the emperor in the ſaddle, happened to give him a blow; which he reſenting with his uſual brutality, ordered the equerry's hand to be cut off; but Cerealis, tribunus ſtabuli, or maſter of the horſe, put off the execution of ſo cruel and unjuſt an order at the peril of his own life [w]. The year before, the Tiber overflowed its banks, and laid all the lower parts of Rome under water, the inhabitants being obliged to ſave themſelves upon the hills, where they had periſhed with hunger, had not Claudius, prefect of the city, ſent them a ſeaſonable ſupply of proviſions in boats. Theſe overflowings of the Tiber were generally looked upon as the forerunners of ſome public diſaſter. The body of the deceaſed emperor was embalmed, and ſent to Conſtantinople, to be interred there amongſt the other chriſtian princes. It arrived in that city on the twenty-eighth of December of the enſuing year 376, but was not buried till the twenty-firſt of February of the year 382, when Theodoſius paid it that laſt duty [x]. Some pretended in 1174 to have diſcovered his body at Andernach on the Rhine; but it is evident from hiſtory, that he was buried at Conſtantinople. As to his character, Ammianus taxes him with ſeveral vices. He was, according to that writer, naturally inclined to cruelty, puniſhing even the ſmalleſt faults with the utmoſt ſeverity, and ſuffering his miniſters, or rather encouraging them, to exerciſe unheard-of cruelties. He was covetous to a great degree, uſing all poſſible methods to raiſe money; which, however, ſome excuſe in him, as he found, on Several omens preceding Valentinian's death.

His character.

[s] Socr. p. 248, 249. [t] Idem ibid. [u] Ammian. p. 426.
[w] Idem ibid. [x] Idem, p. 433. Marc. chron.

his acceſſion to the empire, the exchequer quite exhauſted by his predeceſſors, eſpecially by Julian, who had ſpent immenſe ſums in the Perſian war. He had a mighty opinion of his own accompliſhments and abilities, and therefore hated all who were eminent for learning, valour, ſkill in the military art, or any other prerogative; nay, even ſuch as had a genteel fancy in dreſs. He pretended to be a great enemy to cowards, and nevertheleſs, on ſeveral occaſions, betrayed more fear than was becoming a man, who, from his infancy, had borne arms; inſomuch, that his miniſters, who were well acquainted with his temper, when he was in a paſſion, and they could by no other means appeaſe him, uſed to pretend certain intelligence from the frontiers, that the barbarians were up in arms, and ready to break into the empire; which never failed to allay his wrath, and make him appear, to uſe the expreſſion of Ammianus, as mild as ever was Antoninus Pius [y]. He ſuffered himſelf to be ſtrangely impoſed upon by his miniſters, repoſing an entire confidence in thoſe who deſerved it the leaſt; whence the provinces were often oppreſſed, and the people reduced to beggary, while he, miſled and deceived by thoſe about him, believed they enjoyed an entire happineſs [z]. Had he not been deceived in the choice of his miniſters, ſays Victor, he would have reigned with great glory, and been ranked after his death amongſt the beſt princes [a]. And truly he was, even according to Ammianus, a writer no-ways partial to him, or any of the chriſtian princes, endowed with many excellent qualities; well acquainted with the military art, and no leſs with the art of governing; careful in protecting the ſubjects of the empire againſt the incurſions of the barbarians; an exact obſerver of the military diſcipline; enured from his infancy to hardſhips, and no-ways biaſſed by favour in diſpoſing of the great offices. Tho' he had many relations, who, upon his advancement, expected great preferments, yet he employed none of them, except his brother Valens, whom he aſſumed for his collegue, and with whom he reigned in perfect concord. In his entertainments he was ſplendid, but not profuſe; in his perſon comely, and well-ſhaped; in his converſation agreeable; of an extraordinary memory, and ready elocution, knowing well how to accommodate himſelf to all times and occaſions [b]. He ſuffered no places to be bought or ſold during the whole time of his reign; and tho' he was often miſtaken taken in the choice of his officers and miniſters, yet his intention was to prefer only the moſt deſerving, and for that reaſon he neglected his own relations. He abated the taxes, and eaſed his people, as far as the ſtate of his affairs would allow, of the heavy burdens laid upon them by his predeceſſors [c]. He was an utter ſtranger to debauchery and unlawful pleaſures, which he endeavoured to reſtrain by ſeveral excellent laws [d]. As to his religion, in the great variety of opinions, which at that time divided the world, he inviolably adhered to the orthodox faith; but avoiding all diſputes, he allowed to the reſt of his ſubjects, even to the pagans, an entire liberty of conſcience. He is blamed by the eccleſiaſtic writers, for ſuffering his brother Valens to perſecute the orthodox chriſtians; but ſome alledge in his defence, that the condition of his affairs would not allow him in prudence openly to oppoſe Valens, ſince that perhaps might have kindled a civil war, which, at that time, would have proved fatal to the empire. To conclude, he was endowed, according to Ammianus, with ſuch excellent qualities, that had they not been allayed with the mixture of the above-mentioned vices, eſpecially with that of cruelty, he had been no-ways inferior to the excellent emperors Trajan and M. Aurelius [e]. Amongſt his other laws he enacted one addreſſed to Maximus vicar of Rome, relating to the ſtature or ſize of ſuch as were to be admitted into the army, which was not to be under ſix foot ſeven inches [f].

[y] Ammian. l. xxx. p. 431, 432. [z] Vict. ibid. p. 345.
[a] Idem ibid. [b] Ammian. p. 433.

The reign of Valens in the eaſt.

We ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of the reign of Valens in the eaſt, which, to avoid confuſion, we have thought proper to deliver ſeparately, there being no other connection, but that of time, between the reigns and tranſactions of the two princes. After the diviſion of the provinces made at Mediana in the neighbourhood of Naiſſus in Dacia in 364, Valens returned to Conſtantinople, where he enacted a law dated the twenty-ſixth of December, forbidding the meſſengers of good news to exact, according to the abuſe which then prevailed, or even to accept, any thing of the people; but allows them to receive what perſons of rank and fortune ſhall think proper to offer them of their own accord [g]. The following year 365, Valens was ſtill at Conſtantinople on the nineteenth of March [h]; but ſoon after ſet out for Syria, the Perſians being in motion, with a deſign, as was apprehended, to break the peace which they had lately concluded with Jovian. Being informed, as he entered Bithynia, that the Goths were ready to invade Thrace, he dispatched messengers to his officers in those parts, warning them to be upon their guard, and pursued his march to Cæsarea in Cappadocia, where he was on the fourth of July, and continued there till the latter end of the summer [i]. During his stay in that city, a dreadful earthquake happened, which was felt in most provinces of the empire, and overturned several cities in Sicily, Palestine, and above all in the island of Crete, where the shock was most violent [k]. When Valens was upon the point of departing from Cæsarea, news was brought him of the revolt of Procopius, who, after having paid the last duty to the body of his kinsman Julian, had privately withdrawn, through fear of Jovian, into Chersonesus Taurica; but not trusting those barbarians, and finding himself destitute even of the necessaries of life, he left that inhospitable country, and returning in disguise into the territories of the empire, he reached undiscovered the city of Chalcedon, where he was received by one Strategius, his trusty friend, and by him carefully concealed at his country-house. From thence he went frequently in a mean dress to Constantinople; and finding that the people there were generally dissatisfied with the present government, on account of the cruelties practised by Petronius, whose daughter, Albia Dominica, the emperor had married, he resolved to improve that dissatisfaction to his own advantage. Having therefore gained over an eunuch of great wealth, by name Eugenius, lately disgraced by Valens, and some of the officers who commanded the troops that had been sent into Thrace against the Goths, and were then quartered at Constantinople, he boldly ventured to discover himself, and lay before the people and soldiery the title he had to the empire, as being nearly related to Julian. Hereupon the officers, whom he had gained before-hand, proclaimed him emperor; and the rest, following their example, saluted him with the title of Augustus, and carried him in triumph to the imperial palace, whither he was attended only by the dregs of the people. However, the next and the following days, several persons of distinction joined him, and at length the whole city of Constantinople [l]. The news of this revolt struck Valens with such terror and dismay,

[c] Idem, p. 423. [d] Vict. p. 651. [e] Ammian. p. 432.
[f] Cod. Theod. l. iii. de tyronib. [g] Cod. Theod. l. viii. tit. [illegible] l. leg. 1. p. 602, 603. [h] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 73.

Procopius revolts,

And is acknowledged by the city of Constantinople.

[i] Idem, p. 74. Ammian. p. 322. [k] Ammian. p. 331, 333. Hier. chron. p. 258. [l] Ammian p. 320. Zos. l. iv. p. 239. Themist p. 91.

diſmay, that he was for quitting the imperial purple and reſigning the empire; but being, with powerful arguments, perſuaded by his friends not to part with the imperial dignity, he detached ſome troops againſt his new rival, hoping to cruſh him before he was in a condition to make any reſiſtance. This detachment met Procopius at Mygdus in Phrygia, attended by a promiſcuous multitude of fugitive ſlaves, deſerters, and perſons of deſperate fortunes, who, upon the approach of the emperor's forces, put themſelves in a poſture of defence. But Procopius, diſtruſting their courage, while both parties were ready to engage, ſtept boldly forward, as if he deſigned to challenge one of the adverſe party to a ſingle combat; and taking Vitalianus, one of the officers, by the hand, mildly upbraided him and his fellow-ſoldiers, for ſiding with a Pannonian robber againſt one allied to the family of Conſtantine the Great. His ſpeech made ſuch a deep impreſ- He is joined by a party of the emperor's troops.
ſion upon them, that they immediately paſſed over to his party, and, with loud acclamations ſaluting him emperor, carried him in triumph to the imperial pavilion [k]. This defection brought a very ſeaſonable acceſſion of ſtrength to Procopius, who thereupon detached a ſtrong party, under the conduct of Rumitalca a tribune, to ſeize on Nice; which they did accordingly, without the loſs of a ſingle man [l]. Valens, alarmed at the uſurper's unexpected progreſs, diſpatched Vadomarius, formerly king of the Alemans, to recover that important place, while he went in perſon to lay ſiege to Chalcedon, from which city one of his laws is dated the firſt of December [m]; but he met with ſo vigorous a reſiſtance, that he was obliged to give over the enterprize, the beſieged inſulting him from the walls as he retired, and reviling him with the nickname of Sabaiarius, that is, Beer-drinker, ſabaia being a kind of ſmall drink made of barley, and common in Pannonia, where Valens was born. Rumitalca, who commanded in Nice, being informed of his retreat, ſallied out with great boldneſs, and bearing all down before him, had utterly defeated the emperor, had not Valens, upon timely notice of his approach, taken a quite different rout by the lake Sunona, and the windings of the river Gallus. Thus was the emperor obliged to abandon Bithynia to the enemy, and retire with all expedition to Ancyra, where he continued waiting the arrival of the troops which Valens obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Chalcedon.

Lupicinus

[k] Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 322, 324. [l] Idem, p. 325. [m] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 75, 76. [n] Ammian ibid. Socrat. l. iv. c. 8. p. 216.

Lupicinus was leading out of the eaſt to his aſſiſtance. In the mean time, Arintheus, one of his chief commanders, an officer of great proweſs and renown, meeting a party of the rebels, commanded by one Hyperechius, formerly an apparitor, and ſcorning to enter the liſts with ſuch a contemptible enemy, commanded, with an air of authority, Hyperechius's own men to bring to him in chains their vile and deſpicable leader ; which they did accordingly, ſtruck with the awful and majeſtic mein of that renowned commander [o].

Procopius ſeizes on Cyzicus, and the treaſure lodged there.

But, in the mean time, Procopius, being informed, that the money allotted for the pay of the ſoldiers who ſerved in the eaſt, was lodged in the city of Cyzicus, haſtened thither, laid ſiege to the place, and in the end reduced it, though defended with great reſolution and intrepidity by Seronianus, at that time comes domeſticorum, who found means to make his eſcape, as Zoſimus informs us [p] ; but was afterwards taken in Lydia, carried priſoner to Nice, and there by Marcellus, governor of the place, put to death. Procopius being, by the reduction of this place, become maſter of the Helleſpont, he appointed Hormiſda governor of that province, with the title of proconſul. He was the ſon of Hormiſda, brother to Sapor king of Perſia, who, as we have related elſewhere, had, in the year 323, taken refuge in the court of Conſtantine the Great, and ever after ſerved the Romans with great fidelity. Procopius ſpent the beſt part of the winter in endeavouring to draw over to his party the cities of Aſia ; but his deſigns were in great meaſure defeated by Clearchus vicar of that province, and more by his own conduct ; for having hitherto behaved with great moderation and humanity, he all on a ſudden grew proud, haughty, and tyrannical, loading the provinces that had ſubmitted to him with exorbitant taxes, tho' he knew, that their averſion to Valens was chiefly owing to that prince's avarice. But nothing more prejudiced the people againſt him, than his commanding the houſe of Arbetio to be ſtripped of the moveables of ineſtimable value, and of the immenſe riches, which that antient and brave commander had amaſſed under Conſtantius. He gave him this unſeaſonable proof of his indignation, tho' he had formerly lived in great friendſhip with him, upon his declining to wait upon him, on account of his great age, and the infirmities attending it [q]. The following year 366, Valens, upon the arrival of the troops from the eaſt under the command of

He grows tyrannical.

[o] Ammian. ibid. [p] Zoſ. p. 328. [q] Ammian. p. 327. Eunap. c. 5. p. 84. Themiſt. orat. 7. p. 92-99.

of Lupicinus, left Galatia, whither he had retired from before Chalcedon, and marched into Lycia, with a deſign to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle. As the ſoldiers of Procopius were greatly animated by the preſence of Fauſtina, Conſtantius's widow, and her little daughter Conſtantina, whom Procopius carried about with him, and often expoſed to the view of the army, Valens, to defeat that artifice, prevailed upon Arbetio, who had commanded the forces under Conſtantius, and was beloved by the ſoldiery, to join him, not doubting, but the preſence and intereſt of one of that prince's chief commanders, would draw great numbers of the rebels over to his party. He was not therein deceived; for the preſence of Arbetio, and the high opinion they all entertained of him, quite turned the hearts of Procopius's men; which Gomoarius, one of his chief commanders, being well appriſed of, thought it adviſeable to abandon the tyrant, and ſubmit to Valens [r]. This happened, according to Zoſimus, in the neighbourhood of Thyatira in Lydia, in the heat of a battle, while Valens was in imminent danger of being utterly defeated by the couragcous behaviour and prudent conduct of young Hormiſda [s]. We queſtion whether this can be reconciled with what we read in Ammianus. After this, Valens advanced to Sardes, and from thence to Nicolia, a city of Phrygia, where he gave the rebels battle, the iſſue whereof continued doubtful, till Agilo, by nation a German, one of Procopius's chief commanders, with many others, went over to Valens; which ſo diſheartened Procopius, that, quitting his horſe, he fled into an adjoining wood, attended by Florentius and Barchalbas a tribune. There they wandered about, till the moon ſhining out with great brightneſs, they began to apprehend they might be diſcovered. Hereupon Procopius's two companions, ſeizing him to ſave themſelves, carried him bound to the emperor, who immediately ordered his head to be ſtruck off, and ſent it to Valentinian then in Gaul [t]. Florentius and Barchalbas were likewiſe put to death by the emperor's orders; but, in the opinion of Ammianus, contrary to the rules of juſtice and equity: for had they betrayed, ſays that writer, a lawful prince, their treaſon had deſerved to be puniſhed with death; but as he was a rebel and uſurper, they had great reaſon to expect another ſort of reward for their faithleſs ſervice.

Procopius abandoned by ſome of his chief officers.

Defeated, taken, and put to death.

[r] Ammian. p. 327, 328. [s] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 739. [t] Ammian. p. 329. Philoſt. l. vii. c. 5. p. 145.

ſervice [u]. Philoſtorgius writes, that the army cauſed Florentius to be burnt alive, for his cruelties to thoſe of their party at Nice [w], he having been appointed by Procopius governor of that city; but from Ammianus it is evident, that Marcellus, of whom anon, and not Florentius was governor of that city. What Socrates writes [x] of the cruel death to which the emperor condemned Procopius, and likewiſe his two generals, Agilo and Gomoarius, tho' they had abandoned him before his defeat, deſerves no credit, ſince Ammianus, who never ſpares Valens, in diſplaying with great minuteneſs his other cruelties, takes no notice of this; nay, he tells us in expreſs terms, that Araxes, father-in-law to Agilo, by his intereſt obtained his pardon, tho' he had been præfectus prætorio to Procopius [y]. Such was the end of this uſurper, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, after he had borne the title of emperor for the ſpace of about eight months. He was put to death, according to Idatius and Socrates, on the twenty-ſeventh of May; but on the twentieth of June, according to the chronicle of Alexandria.

His birth, preferments, and character.

He was born of an illuſtrious family in Cilicia, and nearly related to the emperor Julian. He was, tho' a pagan, employed by Conſtantius on account of his integrity, and raiſed by Julian to great employments, and diſtinguiſhed with the title of count. When that prince ſet out on his memorable expedition againſt the Perſians, he inveſted him and count Sebaſtian with the command of a body of thirty thouſand choſen men, who were to remain in Meſopotamia, and cover the empire on that ſide againſt any ſudden irruption of the enemy [z]. Zoſimus writes, that he delivered up to Jovian the purple robe, which Julian was ſaid, as we have related above, to have given him, charging him to aſſume it, if he ſhould happen to die before his return from Perſia [a]. That writer adds, that thereupon Jovian gave him leave to retire with his family to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, and lead there a retired life. Be that as it will, it is certain from Ammianus, that he was ſent by Jovian to attend the corſe of Julian to Tarſus; and afterwards withdrawing, he kept himſelf concealed, till he aſſumed the title of emperor, which occaſioned his ruin. He was, according to Ammianus, a man of few words, cloſe and reſerved; of no mean preſence, tho' he went ſomewhat ſtooping, with his eyes ever fixed on the ground, which proceeded from his gloomy and melancholy temper; temper ; yet he was always averſe to the ſhedding of blood, which, in the opinion of Ammianus, was a thing to be wondered at, conſidering the moroſeneſs of his diſpoſition [b]. Marcellus, governor of Nice, and kinſman to Procopius, hearing of his death, ordered Serenianus, who was kept cloſe priſoner in the place, to be immediately diſpatched, ſaving, by the death of one man, the lives of many, ſays Ammianus ; for as he was noted for his cruelty, and had a great aſcendant over Valens, whoſe countryman he was, it was feared, had he outlived the defeat of Procopius's party, he would have induced the emperor, too much inclined of himſelf, to revenge, and occaſioned the deſtruction of many perſons, innocent as well as guilty [c]. After this bold execution, Marcellus being informed, that a body of Goths was marching to the aſſiſtance of Procopius, and not doubting but he ſhould be able to draw them over to his own party, ſeized on the city of Chalcedon ; and being aſſiſted by ſome, whom poverty and deſpair had driven into rebellion, he aſſumed the purple, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. But Valens, upon the firſt notice of his revolt, diſpatched without delay a party of choſen men againſt him, who, coming upon him unexpectedly, ſeized him, and having loaded him with chains, dragged him to the public priſon ; whence he was taken out the next day, and, together with his accomplices, tortured to death [d]. Themiſtius, in his panegyric upon Valens, written a few months after the death of Procopius, tells us, that he uſed his victory with great moderation, puniſhing only the chief authors of the revolt [e]. But Ammianus [f] and Zoſimus [g] aſſure us, that he proceeded with the utmoſt ſeverity againſt ſuch as were but barely ſuſpected of having favoured the rebels. His ears were open to all complaints and information ; and few who had the misfortune to be accuſed, were ſo happy as to eſcape death, baniſhment, or confiſcation, till the emperor had glutted himſelf with blood, and filled his own coffers, and thoſe of his friends likewiſe. He ordered the city of Chalcedon to be diſmantled, purſuant to an oath he had taken ; but the inhabitants of Nice, Nicomedia, and Conſtantinople, interceding in behalf of a city, of which the walls were its chief beauty and ornament, to comply at the ſame time with their requeſt, and his own oath, he cauſed only part of the walls to be demoliſhed, which he immediately

[u] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 335. & l. xxvi. p. 329. [w] Philoſt. p. 123. [x] Socrat. l. iv. c. 5. p. 214. [y] Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 329. [z] Idem ibid. [a] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 736.

Marcellus revolts ;

But is taken and tortured to death.

[b] Ammian. ibid. [c] Idem. l. xxvi. p. 325. [d] Idem, p. 326, 327. [e] Themiſt. orat. vii. p. 84. [f] Ammian. p. 330. [g] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 720.

ately rebuilt with ſmaller ſtones, ordering the others to be conveyed to Conſtantinople, where they were made uſe of to make a public bath, called the Thermæ, or Hot baths of Conſtantius, if Socrates is not miſtaken [h]; for it is certain, that Valens built at Conſtantinople a public bath, bearing the name of his daughter Caroſa [i], which was ended in 375. This year the empreſs Albia Dominica was on the eighteenth of January, delivered of a ſon, named Valentinian, and ſurnamed Galata, no doubt, becauſe he was born in Galatia, where Valens paſſed the firſt months of this year, as we have obſerved.

Valens reſolves to war upon the Goths.

THE following year 367, Valens hearing that a body of three thouſand Goths, who were come to the aſſiſtance of Procopius, and had marched back upon the news of his death, had not yet paſſed the Danube, ſent a ſtrong detachment againſt them, who cutting off their retreat, obliged them, notwithſtanding the vigorous reſiſtance they made, to lay down their arms, and yield themſelves priſoners [k]. Hereupon Athanaric, at that time king, or rather judge, of the Goths, named Thervingi, (for he ſeems to have declined the royal title) diſpatched embaſſadors to Valens, earneſtly entreating him to ſet the priſoners at liberty, and ſuffer them to return to their own country, ſince they had been ſent by their prince, a friend and ally of the Romans, to the aſſiſtance of a Roman emperor. The embaſſadors, after having delivered this meſſage, produced a letter from Procopius to their maſter, wherein he aſſured him, that the empire belonged to him as the kinſman of Conſtantius, and the heir of the great Conſtantine's family. Valens returned, it ſeems, no anſwer to the embaſſadors; but ſent Victor, then magiſter equitum, or general of the horſe, to complain in his name of Athanaric, for aſſiſting a rebel againſt his lawful ſovereign. The Goths anſwered, that they had looked upon Procopius as the kinſman of Conſtantine and heir of his family, adding, that it was not their buſineſs to examine whether he was, or was not, a lawful prince; and that, if they were therein deceived, the emperor ought to forgive them, ſince their counſels had been influenced by what appeared to them juſt and equitable. They could not, however, obtain the deliverance of their priſoners, Valens, who had no other enemy at that time to divert him, being deſirous to humble that powerful nation nation [l]. Ammianus thinks he had juſtice on his ſide [m]; but Eunapius will not take upon him to decide whether he had or not [n]. This war was like to prove very dangerous, the Goths being then very powerful, and beſides, elated with the great advantages they had gained over they neighbouring nations, if Jornandes is to be credited [o], who ſeems to have been but indifferently acquainted with the hiſtory of his country, ſince he takes no notice of the preſent war. Valens, being bent upon war, and well appriſed of the ſtrength and power of the enemy, made vaſt preparations during the winter, with a deſign to fall upon the enemy early in the ſpring. Before he ſet out on ſo dangerous an expedition, in order to render heaven propitious to his undertaking, he received the ſacrament of baptiſm, but, out of complaiſance to the empreſs, at the hands of Eudoxius, then biſhop of Conſtantinople, a leading man among the Arians, who, in adminiſtering to him that ſacrament, obliged him to ſwear, that, to his death, he would adhere to the doctrine of Arius, and look upon thoſe who oppoſed it as enemies to truth; which oath he but too ſtrictly obſerved, as the reader may find in the eccleſiaſtic writers of thoſe times. He had before ſhewed no ſmall partiality to the Arians; but thenceforth he became their great patron, and a cruel perſecutor of the catholics. But to return to the war: the emperor being informed, that the Goths, appriſed of his deſign, were aſſembling a mighty army, in order to attack him the firſt, took the field before the winter was over; and having ſent ſtrong detachments to guard the banks of the Danube, he encamped with the reſt of his army in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mœſia, where he raiſed Auxonius to the dignity of prefect, in the room of Salluſtius Secundus, no longer able to diſcharge that office, on account of his great age. He was ſtill at Marcianopolis on the thirtieth of May, as appears from the dates of ſome laws [p]; which we will not take upon us to reconcile with what we read in Ammianus [q] and Zoſimus [r], viz. that in the beginning of the ſpring he left the city, and having aſſembled his troops, he paſſed the Danube at a place called Daphne, and ſpent the whole ſummer in ravaging and laying waſte the enemy's country, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, the Goths having fled, upon the approach of the Roman

[h] Socr. l. iv. c. 8. p. 216. [i] Ammian. p. 614. Chron. Alex. p. 704. [k] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 740. Eunap. de legation. p. 18

He is baptized by the Arians.

He paſſes the Danube, and lays waſte the country of the Goths.

[l] Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 340. Eunap. p. 18. Zoſ. p. 748. Jorn. rer Goth. c. 23. p 643. [m] Ammian. p. 338. Eunap. p. 18. [o] Jorn. ibid. c. 3. p. 642, 643. [p] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 79. [q] Ammian. p. 340. [r] Zoſ. p. 741.

Roman army, to the neighbouring mountains, called Serri, inacceſſible to thoſe who were not well acquainted with the country. In the beginning of the autumn he led back his army to the Roman territories, and was on the twenty-fifth of September at Doroſterum in Mœſia, and on the thirty-firſt of January of the enſuing year 368, at Marcianopolis [s], where, without all doubt, he paſſed the winter. This year the Iſaurians, who continued quiet ever ſince the year 359, over-ran the neighbouring countries, plundering not only villages, but towns, and advancing as far as Pamphylia and Cilicia, where they amaſſed an immenſe booty. Muſonius, vicar of Aſia, endeavoured to reſtrain them; but, as he was quite unacquainted with the art of war, he was cut in pieces with all his men. Muſonius had taught rhetoric at Athens, from which employment he was raiſed to the dignity of proconſul of Achaia, and afterwards to that of vicar of Aſia. However, the Iſaurians were in the end ſurrounded by the inhabitants of the countries which they had plundered, and their retreat being cut off, obliged to ſubmit, and quit the booty they had taken. Their lives were ſpared, upon their promiſing to give no moleſtation to their neighbours for the future; and accordingly they kept their word till the year 376, that is, for the ſpace of ten years [t]. Germanicopolis was their chief city, and in the fifth century an epiſcopal ſee; but not at this time, for a biſhop could find no employment among perſons who were robbers by profeſſion. The following year 368, Valens was ſtill at Marcianopolis on the ninth of March [u], and heard there his panegyric pronounced by Themiſtius, upon his entering the fifth year of his reign. The orator mentions in his ſpeech an eaſtern prince, who had quitted the dominions of his father, tho' very conſiderable, to have the honour of ſerving under Valens [w]. Some writers conjecture this prince to have been Para, the ſon of Arſaces king of Armenia, who came to implore the aſſiſtance of Valens againſt the Perſians, and continued ſome time at Neocæſarea in Pontus; but he cannot be ſaid to have ſerved under Valens. One Bacurus, ſtyled king of Iberia, ſerved under Valens at the battle of Adrianople [x], as he did afterwards under Theodoſius [y]; and him perhaps Themiſtius meant. From Marcianopolis the emperor marched early

Great diſorders committed by the Iſaurian robbers.

[s] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 80, 81. [t] Ammian. l. xxxvii. p. 348, 349. Eunap. c. 8. p. 125, 126. [u] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 81. [w] Themiſt. orat. viii. p, 433. [x] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 460. [y] Ruf. l. i. c. x. p. 166.

ly in the ſpring to Carpi, a village, as is ſuppoſed, of Mœſia, with a deſign to ravage, as he had done the year before, the enemy's country: but he was obliged to remain encamped in the ſame place till the beginning of autumn, without ever being able to croſs the Danube, which continued ſwelled beyond meaſure all that ſummer. He therefore returned to Marcianopolis, where he took up his winter-quarters [z]. One of his laws is dated from that place the twelfth of November, and another the thirteenth of December [a]. This year is remarkable for one of the moſt dreadful earthquakes that had ever been felt, by which the city of Nice was utterly ruined, and in that of Germa on the Helleſpont only a few houſes left ſtanding [b]. The following year, 369, the emperor was ſtill at Marcianopolis on the third of May; but at Noviodunum in Leſſer Scythia on the third and fifth of July [c], where he paſſed the Danube on a bridge of boats, and advanced far into the enemy's country, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Zoſimus tells us, that the Goths ſallying frequently out of the woods and marſhes upon the Romans, the emperor diſpatched againſt them the ſervants that attended the army, promiſing them a certain ſum for each head they ſhould bring. Hereupon ſuch numbers of the enemy were killed in the woods and marſhes where they lurked, that the reſt finding no-where a ſafe retreat, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace [d]. Thus Zoſimus. But Ammianus, whoſe authority is of greater weight, informs us, that Valens, having attacked the Greuthungi, a warlike nation at a conſiderable diſtance from the Danube, after ſeveral encounters, gained a great victory over Athanaric, who at the head of a numerous army had ventured to engage him. After this victory, Valens returned to Marcianopolis, with a deſign to winter there, and renew the war early in the ſpring. But, in the mean while, the Goths, weary of ſo deſtructive a war, which had laſted already three years, and reduced them to the utmoſt diſtreſs, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace; which Valens at firſt refuſed to grant them upon any terms, but was in the end, with much ado, prevailed upon by the ſenate of Conſtantinople to hearken to their propoſals. Thus Themiſtius, who was at the head of the Conſtantinopolitan deputies [f]. Valens, having at their requeſt diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with a favourable

He invades anew the country of the Goths.

The Goths defeated, ſue for peace, and obtain it.

[z] Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 460. [a] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 83. [b] Hier. chron. Socr. l. 4. c. 11. p. 219. [c] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 87. [d] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 741. [e] Ammian. p. 341. [f] Themiſt. orat. x. p. 133.

vourable anſwer, approached the Danube, and named Victor and Arintheus to treat with the Goths. After ſome conferences, a peace was concluded upon the following terms, highly honourable for the Romans; viz. 1. That the Goths ſhould not for the future paſs the Danube, nor ſet foot on the Roman territories. 2. That the trade which they had been allowed by former treaties to carry on with what cities of the empire they pleaſed, ſhould be reſtrained to two only, ſituated on the Danube. 3. That they ſhould not for the future claim nor expect the penſions that had been annually paid them by other emperors; but nevertheleſs, that Athanaric's penſion ſhould be continued to him [g]. This was the firſt peace, concludes Themiſtius, which the Romans had in our memory granted to, and not purchaſed of, the Goths. When Valens and Athanaric were to meet, in order to ratify and ſign the treaty, the latter could not be prevailed upon to paſs the Danube, pretending, that his father had obliged him ſolemnly to ſwear never to tread on Roman ground. On the other hand, Valens, thinking it below the majeſty of the empire to go to him, it was agreed, that the two princes ſhould meet in boats in the middle of the river; which they did accordingly, and ratified the peace to their mutual ſatisfaction [h]. Themiſtius, who was preſent at this interview, deſcribes it much at length, but more like an orator than an hiſtorian [i]. He pronounced his ſpeech in all likelihood at Conſtantinople, whither he retired after the concluſion of the treaty; for, according to the code, he was at Marcianopolis on the ſecond of December, and on the thirteenth of the ſame month at Conſtantinople [k]. This year, dreadful diſorders were committed in Syria by the inhabitants of a large village near Apamea, called Maratacupris, who, roving about the country, robbed all they met, and had even the boldneſs to enter ſome cities in the night-time, and plunder the houſes of the moſt wealthy inhabitants. Hereupon Valens ſent a party of ſoldiers againſt them, with orders to ſet fire to their village, and put them all to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age; which was done accordingly with the utmoſt rigor, the ſoldiers being in expreſs terms enjoined not to ſpare even the ſucking children.

Articles of the treaty.

Severity of Valens to ſome robbers.

THE following year 370, Valens, leaving Conſtantinople, ſet out for Antioch; but he had ſcarce reached Nicomedia, when [g] Idem, p. 135. [h] Ammian p. 341, 342. [i] Themiſt. orat. x. p. 132, 133. [k] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 88. [l] Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 367, 368.

when he received news of the death of Eudoxius, the Arian biſhop of Conſtantinople, in whoſe room the Arians, with his approbation, placed one Demophilus. The catholics too choſe their biſhop, and raiſed to that ſee Evagrius; but the emperor ſent a party of ſoldiers from Nicomedia, with orders to drive him out. The Arians, thus countenanced by the emperor, raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the catholics, who thereupon had recourſe to Valens, ſending eighty eccleſiaſtics to lay their grievances before him; but the emperor, inſtead of redreſſing them, ordered Modeſtus, who had been raiſed this year to the dignity of prefect in the room of Auxonius, to put them all to death. Modeſtus, fearing the public executions of ſo many eccleſiaſtics might occaſion great diſturbances, put them all on board a veſſel, pretending the emperor had ordered them to be ſent into baniſhment; but when the veſſel was at ſome diſtance from land, the mariners ſet fire to it, as had been agreed on before-hand, ſaving themſelves in their boat. The ſhip was driven by a ſtrong wind into a harbour called by Socrates, Dacidazus, and there conſumed with all who were in it. This cruelty, ſays that writer, was puniſhed by heaven with a dreadful famine, which obliged moſt of the inhabitants of Phrygia to abandon their country, and fly to other provinces for relief [m]. Some unforeſeen accident muſt have diverted the emperor from his intended journey to Antioch; for he was, as appears from the dates of ſeveral laws, on the tenth of June at Cyzicus; on the twelfth of December of this year, and during the months of January, February, and April of the enſuing year, at Conſtantinople [n]; which he left after the fifth of May [o], and ſet out for Syria, advancing ſlowly, and adminiſtering juſtice in all the cities through which he paſſed; which would have gained him the affection of the inhabitants, had he not at the ſame time made it his chief ſtudy to eſtabliſh everywhere the hereſy of Arius, and betrayed an irreconcileable hatred to the catholics [p]. He paſſed the winter in Cæſarea in Cappadocia, where, to his unſpeakable grief, his only ſon Valentinian Galata died. Gregory Nazianzen writes, that, during his malady the emperor had recourſe to the prayers of St. Baſil, who was then at Cæſarea, and promiſed to reſtore the child to health, provided Valens would ſuffer him to receive the ſacrament of baptiſm at the hands of an orthodox biſhop;

Valens cauſes eighty orthodox eccleſiaſtics to be put to death.

Valentinian, his only ſon, dies.

[m] Socr. l. iv. c. 15. p. 226. [n] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 87—89.
[o] Idem ibid. [p] Zoſ. l. iv. p. 242.

biſhop; which condition he not agreeing to, but, on the contrary, ordering him to be baptized by the Arians, the young prince immediately died [q]. This year the emperor divided Cappadocia into two provinces, appointing Tyana the metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, as Cæſarea was of Cappadocia Prima. At the ſame time he divided Paleſtine into three provinces, Palæſtina Prima, Palæſtina Secunda, and Palæſtina Salutaris, Cæſarea was the metropolis of the firſt, Scythopholis of the ſecond, and Petra of the third. The latter city, with the greateſt part of Palæſtina Salutaris, was diſmembered from Arabia, as were ſeveral cities in the two other provinces from Phœnicia. The governor of Palæſtina Prima was honoured with the title of conſular; but thoſe of the other two were only ſtyled preſidents [r]. At what time Lycania, which had Iconium for its metropolis, was made a ſeparate province, and thoſe of Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia divided into two, and Arabia into three, we will not take upon us to determine. Theſe diviſions of provinces proved very burdenſome to the people, and raiſed quarrels and diſputes among the metropolitan biſhops, as appears from the eccleſiaſtic hiſtorians, and the letters of St. Baſil.

Cappadocia divided into two provinces, and Paleſtine into three.

THE following year 372, Valens left Cæſarea in Cappadocia early in the ſpring; for he was at Seleucia on the fourth of April, and on the thirteenth of the ſame month at Antioch [s]. Soon after his arrival in that city, Libanius pronounced in his preſence part of the ſpeech compoſed in his praiſe, the other part, as it was exceeding long, being put off to another time. The emperor heard him with great pleaſure, if the orator himſelf is to be credited; but the remaining part of the ſpeech was never pronounced [t]. Valens was come to Antioch to watch the motions of the Perſians; for Sapor laying claim to Armenia, which had formerly belonged to the kings of Perſia, but not caring openly to invade it, leſt the Romans ſhould eſpouſe the cauſe of their allies, after having attempted in vain to allure the nobility over to his party, pretending great friendſhip for Arſaces their king, he invited him to a banquet, during which he ordered the unwary prince to be ſeized, and having put out his eyes, ſent him in chains to a caſtle, called Agabana, where he was ſoon after put to death [u]. This in all likelihood likelihood, is what gave occaſion to the long account we read in Procopius of the captivity of Arſaces king of Armenia, taken priſoner by one Pacurus king of Perſia [w]; an account which has all the air of a romance. Sapor, having thus treacherouſly diſpatched Arſaces, gave the government of Armenia to Cylax and Artabanes, both natives of the country, but inviolably attached to his intereſt. Then, driving out Sauromaces, whom the Romans had created king of Iberia, he put one Aſpacuras in his place, couſin-german to Sauromaces, honouring him with a diadem, which the Romans had refuſed to the other [x]. Olympias, the daughter of Ablavius, one of Conſtantine's chief officers, and given by that prince in marriage to Arſaces, was no ſooner informed of the captivity of her huſband, than ſhe took refuge with her ſon Paras in a ſtrong fort called Artogeraſſa, where the king's treaſures were lodged. Cylax and Artabanes were immediately ordered by Sapor to lay ſiege to the place; which they did accordingly: but pitying the forlorn condition of the queen and the young prince, they agreed with the beſieged to abandon the Perſians to their fury; who were accordingly almoſt all to a man cut off in a ſally made by agreement in the night-time, while the guards themſelves in the camp were aſleep, Cylax and Artabanes having given out, that the beſieged had demanded and obtained a truce for two days, in order to conſider on the terms that had been offered them. The queen, thus delivered from the preſent danger, ſent her ſon Paras to implore the aſſiſtance of the emperor, who cauſed him to be entertained for ſome time at Neocæſarea in Pontus, in a manner ſuitable to his rank and condition. However, not daring to aſſiſt him openly, at the requeſt of the nobility of Armenia, he charged Terentius, who commanded on the border of that country, with the title of comes or count, to conduct him into his father's kingdom, which he ſuffered him to govern, but without the title of king, or any of the enſigns of royalty, leſt the Perſians ſhould look upon his appointing him king as a breach of the peace. Sapor was no ſooner informed of what had paſſed in Armenia, than, tranſported with rage, he ſent a ſtrong body of troops into that kingdom, who committing every-where dreadful ravages, obliged Paras, no-ways in a condition to oppoſe them, to take refuge, with Cylax and Artabanes, among the inacceſſible mountains between the Roman territories and Lazica.

Sapor begins new troubles in Armenia and Iberia.

[q] Greg. Naz. orat. xx. p. 351. [r] Hier. quæſt. Hebr. p. 212. Cod. Theod. tit. 4. p. 171. notit. c. 1. p. 3. Noris, epoch. p. 401, 402. [s] Cod. Theod. chron. p. 90, 91. [t] Liban. vit. p. 48. [u] Ammian. l. xxv. p. 300. & l. xxvii. p. 353.

He ſeizes and deſtroys ſeveral ſtrong-holds in Armenia.

[w] Procop. bell. Perſ. l. i. c. 5. p. 15—17. [x] Ammian. p. 353—355.

The Perſians in the mean time, after having taken and burnt ſeveral ſtrong holds, ſat down at length before Artogeraſſa, which, after ſeveral attacks, they took and deſtroyed, carrying away with them the wife and treaſures of Arſaces. Sapor, finding he could not get Paras into his power, had recourſe to his uſual artifices, in which he ſeldom miſcarried; and by private meſſages to the young prince, whoſe cauſe he promiſed to eſpouſe, prevailed upon him to cut off the heads of Cylax and Artabanes, who, he ſaid, were rather his governors than miniſters, and ſent them to him into Perſia [y]. Valens, who had hitherto declined ſending troops into Armenia, leſt he ſhould be charged with a breach of the peace, was no ſooner informed of theſe proceedings, than he ordered Arintheus, one of the beſt commanders of his age, with a powerful army, into that kingdom, which by that means was preſerved, the Perſians not daring to ſend more troops thither, through fear of being overpowered by the Romans. Hereupon Sapor diſpatched embaſſadors to Valens, complaining of his ſending troops to the aſſiſtance of the Armenians, which, he ſaid, was a manifeſt breach of the treaty concluded between him and Jovian. Valens, without regarding the complaints of the Perſian king, ſent a new reinforcement of troops to Arintheus, and at the ſame time diſpatched Terentius, with twelve legions, into Iberia, to reſtore Sauromaces, driven out of his kingdom by the Perſians. Terentius was met as he drew near the river Cyrus, by embaſſadors from Aſpacuras, whom the Perſians had created king of Iberia, deſiring, that he and his kinſman Sauromaces might reign jointly, ſince he could neither reſign, nor take part with the Romans, by reaſon his ſon was detained as an hoſtage in the Perſian court. The emperor, being acquainted with his propoſal, and willing to ſettle the affairs of Iberia without bloodſhed, conſented to a partition of the country, aſſigning to Sauromaces that part which lay ſouth of the river Cyrus, and next to Armenia and Lazica, and the remainder, bordering upon Albania and Perſia, to Aſpacuras [z]. This highly incenſed Sapor, who loudly complained, that the Romans, contrary to the treaty of peace, had ſent troops into Armenia, and, deſpiſing his embaſſy, had, without his knowledge or conſent, divided Iberia. Being now reſolved to make open war upon the Romans, he aſſembled his forces, concluded alliances with the neighbouring princes, and ſpent the Valens ſends troops to the aſſiſtance of the Armenians.

Iberia divided into two kingdoms.

[y] Idem ibid. [z] Idem. p. 355. Themiſt. orat. xi. p. 143—149.

the winter of this year 372, in vaſt preparations. However, he could not, it ſeems, put himſelf in a condition to act this year; for we do not find, that he attempted any thing, or even appeared in the field. As for Valens, he advanced to the banks of the Euphrates and the Tigris; whence he returned in the latter end of autumn, without undertaking any thing which authors have thought worthy of notice. About this time a conſpiracy was, it ſeems, formed againſt Valens, but ſeaſonably diſcovered [a]; and this is all we find in hiſtory concerning it. The following year Sapor ſent a conſiderable army towards the borders of the Roman empire, where they were met by Trajan, an officer of great experience, and Vadomarius, formerly king of the Alemans, at the head of a numerous and choſen body of troops. The Roman generals had orders not to attack the Perſians the firſt, that the emperor might not be charged with a breach of the treaty; but the Perſians falling upon them, they gained a complete victory. However, Valens readily conſented to a truce; which was no ſooner concluded, than he returned to Antioch, and Sapor to Cteſiphon; for both princes had advanced as far as Meſopotamia, to ſupport their reſpective generals [b].

The Perſians defeated.

[a] Themiſt. or. xi p. 148. [b] Ammian. l. xxix. p. 383.

AN INDEX

TO THE FIFTEENTH VOLUME,

The Figures direct to the Page, and Letter n to the Notes.

A

Acius St. the church of, at Conſtantinople, 416.

Aaron martyred in Devonſhire, 311.

Abgarus's ſubmiſſion to Severus, 108.

Ablavivus's treachery to Sopater, 430 n. Murdered by the ſoldiers, 432.

Abydos, the oracle of, in Egypt, 491.

Achaia freed from the Goths, 239. Now ravaged by them, 247.

Achillæus's revolt and defeat, 262.

Achillæus revolts in Egypt, 298. Defeated by Dioclefian, 305.

Acholius's writings and character, 177 n.

Adda, Addis, the bridge of, built by Claudius, 251.

Adiabene, reduced by Severus, 101.

Adventus, an illiterate competitor of Macrinus, 140. Promoted by him, ibid. Made prince of the ſenate, 145.

Adultery, ſome ſevere laws againſt, 144. Revived by Aurelian, 266.

Ægyptians acknowledge Macrianus, 237. Puniſhed by Dioclefian, 305.

Ælianus Papyrius choſen conſul, 58.

——— L. his revolt and defeat, 246.

Ælius Serenian. one of Alexander's counſellors, 157. His writings, &c. 177 n.

Ælius marries Severus's daughter, 97.

Æmilianus proſcribed by the ſenate, 98. Defeated and put to death, ibid.

——— ſucceſs againſt the barbarians, 222. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. His extract, riſe, &c. 223. Where killed, ibid.

——— general of Egypt, proclaimed emperor, 241. With the name of Alexander, ibid. Defeated and ſtrangled, 242.

Æmilius Parthenianus's writings and character, 49 n.

——— Junctus, conſul, baniſhed by Commodus, 58.

Æmona abandoned to Maximin, 196. Where ſituated, ibid.

Æſculapius deaf to the prayers of Caracalla, 133.

Æthiopia ſpreads a dreadful plague over the empire, 222. Embaſſy to Conſtantine, 409.

Afer Septim. Sever. put to death by Caracalla, 129.

Africa revolts againſt Maximin. 186. Under Celſus, 244. Deſtroyed by Maxentius, 363. Relieved by Conſtans, ibid. & ſeq. Submits to Conſtantius, 452. Sadly hampered by the Moors, 580.

African clergy privileged by Conſtantine, 382.

Africanus cruelly used by Constantine, 469.
Agentes at court reduced by Julian, 532.
Agilo succeeds the brave Ursicinus, 495. Sent against the Persians, 508. Promoted by Julian, 530. Forsakes Procopius, 617.
Aginacius unjustly put to death, 604.
Agnes St. the church of, built by Constantine, 378.
Agricola Calpurn. sent against the Britons, 6.
Agrippa, a worthless slave, promoted, 145.
Agrippinus Fabius put to death by Heliogabalus, 152.
Alba, the birth place of Pertinax, 74. Beautified by him, 75.
Albanians, soldiers, whence so called, 147. Revolt to Heliogabalus, 148. Murder the two Maximins, 198.
Albanus Verulam, martyred in Britain, 311
Albia Dominica married to Valens, 614. Delivered of Valentinian II. 620.
Albinus Clodius opposes Cassius, 31. Chosen Consul, 37. Success in the north, 55. Against the Frisians, 61. Made governor of Britain, 65. His extract and character, 84. Hatred against monarchy, 85. Excessive glattony, &c. 86. How characterized by M. Aurelius, ibid. n. Tampered by Severus, 91. Created Cæsar, 96. Declares himself emperor, 104. Defeated, ibid A second time near Trevoux, 105. His death, 106.
Alcimus's writings and character, 512 n.
Aldhemus consulted about Constantine's birth, 336.
Alemani, their first ravages in the empire, 132. Where situated, ibid. & seq. Defeated by Gallienus, 226. By Constantius, 309. Make peace with him, 462.
Alexander Severus proclaimed emperor, 155. His extract and excellent education, 156. Respect for his mother, 157. And for the christians, ibid. Reforms the state, 158. Marries Sulpitia, ibid. Mild usage of Camillus, 159. Expedition into Germany, 160. Friendship to Cassius, 161. Severity to Turinus, 162, 163. Retires into Campania, 163. Marches against Artaxerxes, ibid. & seq. Treatment of his embassadors, ibid. Noble speech to the revolted legion, 164. Admirable discipline, 165. Various accounts of that expedition, 167. Victory over the Persians, ibid. Speech to the senate, ibid. Triumph, 169. Hastens against the Germans, ibid. Murdered there, 171. His character, ibid. Excellent virtues, 172. Public works, 175. Learning, 176. Cotemporary authors, ibid. n.
—— a noted impostor, 42 n. Comically described by Lucian, 44 n.
—— Hermogenes's writings and character, 46 n.
—— revolts against Maxentius, 356. Defeated and killed, 363.
—— a cruel governor of Antioch, 540.
—— bishop of Jerusalem, 217.
—— of Constantinople, his zeal and death, 412.
—— the Great's tomb shut up with all the learned books, &c. 111. Visited by Caracalla, 133.
Alexandria enriched by M. Aurelius, 38. Ruined by Caracalla, 135. In a dreadful condition under Macrianus, 237. Plundered by the Romans, 305. Laid under water. 537.
Alexandrians massacred for lampooning of Caracalla, 135. Submit to Æmilianus, 241.
Alexus born, 146. Adopted by Heliogabalus, 154. Takes the name of Alexander Severus, ibid. &c. Hated and degraded by that tyrant, ibid. Saved by the soldiers, ibid. And proclaimed emperor, 155. The rest see under Alexander Severus, ibid.
Alford, father, confuted, 336.
Allectus's treachery to Carnusius, 301. Defeat and death, 303.
Alypius unjustly banished, 596.
Amandus revolts in Gaul, 294. Defeated at sea, 397.
Ambrose St. his rise and first acquaintance with Probus, 608.
Amelius's writings and character, 372 n.
Amida fortified by Constantius, 435. Besieged by Sapor, 493. Dreadful catastrophe, 494. Restored by the Nisibisians, 569.
Amiens repeopled by the Franks, 305.
Ammianus Marcellinus goes with Ursicinus to Rome, 465. To the east, 493. Joins him at Mitylene, 495. Character of Julian, 551.
Anastasia, daughter to Constantius, 334. Married to Bassianus, 335. Murdered by the soldiers, 431.
Anatolius killed by the Persians, 340.
Androclides's writings and character, 373 n.
Aneptia put to death by Simplicius, 604.
Anicetus, governor of Rome, killed, 444.
Annian family, an account of, 1. & seq.
Annibalinus, the son of Constantius, 334. Made king of Pontus, ibid. & 411. Murdered by the soldiers, 431.

Annonæ præfectus, his office, 595.
Antaradus, whence called Conſtantia, 436.
Anterus, a tool of Commodus, murdered, 57.
Antioch puniſhed for ſiding with Caſſius, 37. Forgiven, ibid. Disfranchiſed and reſtored by Severus, 101. Taken and plundered by Sapor, 228. Retaken by Valerian, ibid. Plundered and razed by Sapor, 233. Relieved by Conſtantine under a famine, 409. Its famed port built, 436. Depopulated by famine, 527.
Antiochus the ſophiſt, his character, &c. 46 n.
Antipater, Severus's ſecretary, ſaved, 121.
—— the ſophiſt's writings and character, 121 n.
Antoninus the ſon of Petronius, put to death, 64.
—— the ſon of Severus. See Caracalla, 90. & ſeq.
—— ſtirs up the Perſians againſt Conſtantius, 492.
Anutius defeated, 99.
—— orders in favour of the chriſtians, 383.
Apamea taken by the Scythians, 228.
Aper murders Numerianus, 289. Diſcovered and taken, ibid. Killed by Dioclesian, 292.
Apodemus an informer burnt alive, 531.
Apollinares, the two, baniſhed and murdered, 464.
Apollonius Dyſcoles's writings and character, 50 n.
Apollo's temple at Rome burnt, 537.
Apoſtles church at Conſtantinople, deſcribed, 415.
Apronianus put to death by Severus, 115.
Apſimas's writings and character, 216 n.
Apuleius the philoſopher's writings and character, 47 n.
Aquicum, a city in New Pannonia, 300.
Aquileia beſieged by Maximin, 197. Taken by Conſtantine, 372. Stout defence againſt Julian, 507.
Aquileian womens ſignal bravery and reward, 197.
Aquilia Severa, a veſtal, forced to marry Heliogabalus, 150.
Aquilius ſent to murder Severus, 91. Sides with him, ibid.
Arabia Felix overrun by Severus, 101. Divided by Valens, 626.
Arabinus ſharply reproved by Alexander, 172.
Arabia Conſtantia, where ſited, 410.
Arator murdered by the Germans, 592.
Arbetio's defeat in Germany, 469. Treachery to Silvanus, 470. Singular arrogance, 530. Plundered by Procopius, 616. Revenge on him, 617.
Arbora, a cruel eunuch of Conſtantine, 467.
—— the bridge of, broken by Julian, 544.
Arcagautes in Sarmatia, who, 410.
Argos burnt by the Heruli, 247.
Arians flattery to Jovian, 572. Repulſed, ibid.
Arintheus defeats the Perſians, 469. Promotes Valentinian's election, 575. Bravery againſt Hipporechius, 616. Sent againſt Sapor, 628.
Ariſtenetus's writings and character, 70 n. Deſtroyed by an earthquake, 489.
Ariſtides the ſophiſt's interview with M. Aurelius, 38. His writings, &c. 46 n.
Ariſtocles's writings and character, 46 n.
Ariſtophanes cruelly uſed by Catena, 458. By Modeſtus, 492.
Arius Antoninus, his unjuſt death, 63.
—— the heretic, baniſhed, 401. Received by the council of Jeruſalem, 411. His death, 412.
Arles, the council of. Vide ſub Council, 388.
Armenia, war with the Parthians, 7. Reduced by the Romans, 9. Reſtored by Macrinus, 143. Subdued by the Perſians, 306.
—— Major's wars againſt Maximin in defence of chriſtianity, 381. Revolts, 433.
Arrian, his writings and character, 209 n.
Arſaces ſummoned by Julian, 540. Receives an impious meſſage from him, 543. Abandoned by the Romans, 566. Treacherouſly murdered by Sapor, 626.
Artabanes narrowly eſcapes Caracalla's cruelty, 136. Declares war againſt Macrinus, 142.
—— made governor of Armenia, 627. Betrays the Perſians, ibid.
Artaxata taken by Priſcus, 9.
Artaxerxes reſtores the Perſian empire, 158. Invades the Roman territories, 163. Contempt of Alexander's meſſage, ibid. Proud embaſſy to him, ibid. Prodigious army, 166. Total defeat, 167.
Artemidorus's writings and character, 50 n.
Aruſpices forbid by Conſtantine, 392.
Arzacene yielded to the Romans, 308.
Aſclepas baniſhed by Conſtantine, 411.
Aſclepiodotus lands in Britain, and burns his ſhips, 303. Defeats the rebels there, ibid.
Aſia ravaged by the Scythians, 229.

Submits to Macrinus, 237. Ravaged by the Scythians, 239.

Asinius Quadratus's writings and character, 216 n.

Aspacuras made king of Iberia, 627. Forced to divide it with Sauromates, 628.

Aspasius's writings and character, 178 n.

Asprianus Fulvius's writings and character, 290 n

Asturians waste Tripolis, 580.

Atec submits to Maximian, 295.

Athanaric's apology for aiding Procopius, 620. Defeated by Valens, 623. Ratifies the peace with him, ibid. & seq.

Athanasius unjustly banished, 411. Falsely accused, 412. Recalled, 414. Honoured by young Constantia, 434. At the council of Sardica, 436. Returns into Egypt, 438. Deposed by Constantius, 477. Persecuted by him, ibid. Recalled by Jovian, 571. His creed sent to him, ibid. His reception at court, ibid.

Athenæus's writings and character, 71 n.

Athenians oppressed by Herodes, 20.

Athens, her walls rebuilt, 239. Burnt by the Heruli, 247. Resumes its old idolatry under Julian, 529.

Atra holds out against Severus, 110. Against Artaxerxes, 158.

Attalus Claudius put to death by Heliogabalus, 152.

Atthuarii, who, 503. Subdued by Julian, ibid.

Attilius Severus banished by Commodus, 58.

Attius Patera's writings and character, 426 n.

Ausidius sent against the Catti, 6.

Augustal, a street in Daphne, why so called, 405.

Augustodunum rebuilt by Constantius, 302.

Avitus consecrated at Edessa, 146.

Aulus Gell. his writings and character, 51 n.

——— Pomponius raises a revolt in Gaul, 294.

Aurelian proclaimed emperor, 254. His rise and character, ibid. How distinguished from his namesake, ibid. Success against the Goths, 255. Against the Germans, ibid. Vandals, 256. Acts of severity, ibid. Inlarges the Roman walls, 257. Marches against Zenobia, ibid. Success against her, 259. Takes her prisoner, 261. Receives embassies from all the eastern princes, 262. Success in Egypt, ibid. In Gaul, ibid. His triumph at Rome described, 263. Kindness to Zenobia, 264. To Tetricus, 265. Reforms the state, ibid. His bread-crowns for the people, 266. Success in Gaul, 267 In Illyricum, ibid. & seq Assassinated, 269. Funeral honours, character, &c. ibid. & seq.

——— the historian, his writings, 274 n.

——— priests by whom created, 5.

Aurelius Marcus, his extract and character, 1, & seq Various names, 2. Education and learning, ibid. Consulship, 3. Makes L. Verus his collegue, 5. Takes the surname of Antoninus, ibid. Generosity to the distressed Romans, 6. Mild government, 9. Triumphs with Verus over the Parthians, 11. Takes the title of pater patriæ, ibid. Wise regulations during the plague, famine, &c. 12. Marches against the Germans, ibid. Success against them, 13. Funeral honours to Verus. ibid. Suspected of having hastened his death, 15. Sells all his riches to carry on the war, 16. Success against the barbarians, 18. Meek behaviour to Herodes, 20. New victories, 21. Miraculous deliverance by the christians prayers, 22. Friendship to them, 24. Continues in Germany, 25. Totally quells it, 26. His two letters concerning Cassius, 28 n, 29 Speech to his army against him, 32. Concern for his death. 33. Letter to the senate, ibid. Kindness to his children, 34. Letter to Faustina about them, ibid. & seq. Goes into the East, 36. Shameful mourning for Faustina, ibid. Goes to Athens. 38. Returns to Rome, ibid. Great skill in philosophy, 39. March against the Marcomani, ibid. Defeats the Germans, ibid. Sudden death, 40. Character and obsequies, ibid. His meditations, 41.

——— Nemesianus, } conspire against Ca-——— Apollinaris, } racalla, 137.

——— Philippus's writings and character, 177 n.

Aureolus forced into the imperial dignity, 238. His rise and character, ibid. Defeats and kills Macrianus, 240. Marches into Italy, 248. Defeated, ibid. Defeated and killed, 251.

——— the bridge of, built to his memory, 251.

Austin St. his censure of Porphyry, 334 n.

Autun relieved by Constantine, 363. By Julian, 475.

Auxonius made prefect of Mœsia, 621. Puts the orthodox to death, 625.

Azetus, not an usurper of the empire, 412.

B

Babylas forces the emperor to do penance, 21. Martyred under Decius, 214.

Babylon taken by Cassius, 10. By Severus, 108.

Bacurus ſerves under Valens, 622.
Bæbius Marcel. put to death by Severus, 115.
Bagundæ defeated by Maximin, 294.
Balbinus Dec. made Caracalla's collegue, 131. Choſen emperor by the ſenate, 193. His extract and character, 194. Wounded in a tumult, 196. Great joy at Maximin's death, 199. Grows jealous of Maximus, 200. Killed by the prætorian guards, 201.
Balchobaudes's cowardice and arrogance, 584.
Baliſta's ſucceſs againſt the Perſians, 233. Goes over to Macrianus, 236. Takes the imperial title, 240. Murdered, 243.
Barbatio, a bitter enemy to Gallus, 467. Treachery and death, 481—490.
Barbers ſuppreſſed by Julian, 532.
Baſil St. firſt acquaintance with Julian at Athens, 524. Refuſes his invitation to court, ibid. Studies under Proereſes, 557. n. Strives in vain to convert Valens, 625.
Baſilianus holds out for Macrinus, 149. Put to death, ibid.
Baſilina, mother of Julian, her deſcent, 519.
Baſſeus promoted for his valour, 20, 21.
Baſſianus. Vide Caracalla, 90.
—— Vide Heliogabalus, 146.
Baſſus Pomponius put to death by Heliogabalus, 153.
Baſtarnæ ſettled in Thrace, 282. Tranſplanted, 309
Batavia cleared of all the Franks, 305.
Batavians defeated by the Germans, 583.
Beauvois peopled by the Franks, 305.
Beda's account of the Roman wall in Britain, 117.
Berean chriſtians juſt reproof to Julian, 541.
Berſabora taken and burnt by Julian, 545.
Berytus ruined by an earthquake, 438.
Bineſes ſent to take poſſeſſion of Niſibis, 569.
Birtha repulſes the Perſians, 496.
Biſhops, their immunities under Conſtantius, 436. — orthodox reſtored, 437. How to be tried, 468. Why recalled by Julian, 532.
Bithynia declares for Caſſius, 31. Ravaged by the Scythians, 238. Submits to Licinius, 386.
Blemmyes. where ſited, 281. Defeated by Probus, ibid. Pliny's fabulous account of them, ibid. Wars with the Moors, 297. Inroads into Egypt, 306. Embaſſy to Conſtantine, 409.
Bononia in Illyricum, where ſited, 394.
Bonoſus's riſe and revolt, 283. Death, 284.
Borani revolt in Gaul, 222. Succeſs againſt the Romans, 228.
Bribery puniſhed by Valentinian, 592.
Britain reduced by Conſtantine, 304. How divided by him, 421. Invaded by the Picts, 558.
Britons war with the Romans, 6, 7. Haraſs them, 109 Revolt, 116—284.
Bruchium, the ſiege of, 242. Deſtroyed by Zenobia, 253.
Bructerians defeated in Germany, 560. Where ſeated, ibid. Defeated by Conſtantine, 349—360.
Buchanan's account of the Roman wall in Britain. 118.
Bucherius's writings and character, 517. n. & ſeq.
Bulgaria, a part of Thrace, 390.
Burgundi revolt in Gaul, 222. Tranſplanted into Cambridgeſhire, 281. Defeated by Maximian, 295. Exaſperate Valentinian, 594. Their true origin, &c. ibid.
Burrhus Antiſtius betrayed to death by Cleander, 69.
Buſan ſurrendered to Sapor, 493.
Buſiris deſtroyed by Dioclefian, 305.
Byzantium holds out againſt Severus, 91. Gariſoned by Niger, 98. Beſieged by Severus, ibid. Surrendered and burnt, 103. Slaughtered by Gallienus, 241. Taken by Maximin, 384. Beautified by Conſtantine, 406. The reſt ſee under Conſtantinople, ibid. & ſeq.

C

CAtti invade the empire, 132.
Cæcilius, biſhop of Carthage, highly honoured by Conſtantine, 383, 384.
Cæſarea the terrible fate of, under Sapor, 233. Taken by Firmus, 600.
Caledonians defeated by the Romans, 56. Make peace with Severus, 117.
Callicrates's writings and character, 273. n.
Calliſtrates's writings and character, 178. n.
Calocerus proclaimed emperor in Cyprus, 411, 412
Calpurnius's account of Carus's death, 288.
—— Flavius ſides with Caſſius, 31. Baniſhed 34.
Campona, where ſituate, 394.
Candidianus recommended to Maximin, 361. Put to death by him, 362.
Capelianus defeats the Gordians, 190.
—— Ignatius put to death by Commodus, 58.
Capitolinus Jul. writings and character, 320 n.

Cappa-

Cappadocia ravaged by the Persians, 163, 233. How divided by Valens, 626.

Caracalla born to Severus, 90. Created Cæsar, 104. And partner of the empire, 109. Takes the manly robe, 110. Triumphs over the Jews, 112. Attempts his father's life, 118. And his crown, 119. Succeeds him, 122. Attempts Geta's life, 125. Cruel reign, ibid. & seq. Murders his brother, 126. Stratagems to gain the soldiers, 127. Speech to the senate, ibid. Deifies Geta, ibid. Massacres all his friends, 128. Horrid cruelties and butcheries, 129. & seq. Avarice and extortions, 130. Coins false money, ibid. Governed by his slaves, ibid. Infranchises all his subjects, 131. Cruelties in Gaul, ibid. Whence named Caracalla, 132. Ill success in Germany, ibid. At Pergamos, 133. Changes his habit and style in every place, ibid. Apes Alexander the Great, ibid. Goes to Antioch, 134. Treachery to the Armenians, ibid. Massacre at Alexandria, 135. Treacherous cruelty to the Parthians, ibid. Takes the title of Parthicus, 136. Conspired against, 137. Stabbed to death, ibid. Funeral obsequies by his murderers, 141. Deified, 142.

Carausius success and revolt in Britain, 295. Takes it, and reigns in it, ibid. Murdered, 301.

Carinus created Cæsar, 287. His character, ibid. Marches against Diocletian, 292. Killed, 293.

Caruutum, where situate, 607.

Carosæ, Thermæ, at Constantinople, 620.

Carpi ravage Mœsia, 200 Defeated, 212. By Decius, 219. Transplanted into Pannonia, 322.

Carrhæ retaken by the Persians, 204.

Carthage burnt by Maxentius, 363.

Carus proclaimed emperor, 286. His rise and character, ibid. Success against the Sarmatians, 287. Against the Persians, 288. His death and obsequies, ibid.

Cassius Dion's success against the Parthians. 8, 10. Barbarity to Seleucia, 10. Ill state of his army, ibid. & seq Success in Egypt, 19. Revolt and character, 26. Inhuman severity, 27. Sent into Syria, 28. Reforms the army there, ibid & n. Hatred to monarchy, 29. His character drawn by Verus ibid. Proclaims himself emperor, 31. Proscribed by the senate, 32. His death, ibid & seq.

Castor put to death by Caracalla, 125.

Caunabaud killed by Aurelian, 258.

Cecrops, bishop, killed by an earthquake, 489.

Celer Verian's bloody orders against the Moesians, 230.

Celsus, his writings and character, 42 n.

——— Cornel. declared emperor, 244. His death, ibid. & seq.

Censor, the office of, restored by Decius, 219. its nature, &c. ibid.

Censorinus's writings and character, 208. n.

Centum columnæ, a Roman building, burnt, 213.

Cethegus, a senator, put to death, 596.

Chalcedon taken by the Scythians, 228. Destroyed by them, 240. Taken by Marcellus, 619. Dismantled by Valens, ibid.

——— the court of justice of, founded, 530.

Chamavians defeared, 360. By Julian, 488.

Charieto, whether killed by the Germans, 583.

Chauci defeated by the Romans, 6.

Cheruſci defeated by Constantine, 360.

Children, poor, how provided for by Constantine, 390.

Chilo L. Fab. a friend of Caracalla, doomed to death by him, 14, 15. Rescued by the people, and spared, 15.

——— accused of witchcraft, 595.

Chnodomarius heads the barbarians against Julian, 482. Defeated and taken, 483.

Christianity flourishes under Philip, 210, 215.

Christians, their prayers obtain a miraculous victory, 22, 23. Favoured by M. Aurelius, 24. Why favoured by Alexander, 157. Grievously butchered by Decius, 217. By Gallus, 222. By Valerian, 226. By Diocletian, 236. By Maximin, 380. Constantine's edicts in their favour, 377, 383. Forid ro turn Jews, 485. Great joy at Julian's death, 554. Encouraged by Jovian, 571.

Chrysanthus refuses Julian's invitation, 533. Made pontiff of Lydia, ibid. His writings and character, 562 n.

Chrysargyrum, what, 418. Falsly attributed to Constantine, ibid.

Chymical books in Egypt, burnt by Diocletian, 305.

Cilicia abandoned to Severus, 99. Ravaged by Sapor, 233.

Civic crowns, on whom bestowed, 227.

Cizycum taken by Procopius, 616.

Claudius Pompeianus marries L. Verus's widow, 17. His character, ibid. Chosen consul, 35, 37. Plots against Commodus, 56. Refuses the empire from Pertinax, 72. From Julianus, 92.

——— the emperor's cautios letter to Regillianus, 231. Funeral obsequies of Gallienus, 249, 250. Proclaimed emperor, 250.

His extract, riſe, &c. 251. Defeats Aureolus, ibid. Funeral honours to him, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Germans, 252. Againſt the Goths, ibid. His two letters on his ſignal victory, ibid. &c. Death and character, 253. Funeral honours, 254.

Cleander ſucceeds Perennis as prime miniſter, 59. His wicked adminiſtration, 60. Univerſally hated, 62. Put to death with his family, 63.

Clematius put to death for his chaſtity, 460.

Clemen's letter to Valentinian, 600.

Clergy, their immunities under Conſtantine, 382, 383. Under Conſtantius, 435, 439. Renewed by Jovian, 570. Curtailed by Valentinian, 597.

Coche taken by Carus, 288. Deſcribed, ibid.

Cœlus, the ſuppoſed father of Helena, 341.

Cœnopharium, Aurelian's ſtately tomb at, 268.

Coiners of falſe money ſeverely puniſhed, 267.

Cologn taken by the Franks, 473. Reſtored by Julian, 475.

Comes domeſticorum at Rome, what, 224.

Comites, their office, 423. By whom founded, ibid.

Commodiana colonia, Rome whence ſo named, 66.

Commodianus's writings and character, 430 n.

Commodus L. Verus, the emperor, born, 4. Created Cæſar, 11. Takes the manly robe, 72. Raiſed to the tribuneſhip, 35. Accompanies his father, 36. His legitimacy much queſtioned, ibid. & 52. Choſen conſul, 38. Enters Rome with his father, ibid. Styled pater patriæ, ibid. Marries Criſpina, 39. Marches againſt the Marcomans, ibid. His character and bloody reign, 52. Herculean exploits, 53. Avarice and rapine, 54. Stay in Pannonia, ibid. Makes peace with the Marcomans, &c. 55 & 56. Triumph at Rome, ibid. Takes the name of Pius and Brittanicus, ibid. Eſcapes being murdered, 57. Bloody proſecutions, 58. Retires to Laurentum, 61. Aſſaulted in the Quintilian palace, 63. New butcheries, 64. Ridiculous extravagancies, 65. Changes the names of the months, 66. Conſpired againſt, 67. Strangled, 68. His burial, &c ibid. Good deeds recorded of him, 69. His riches and catamites ſold by Pertinax, 76. Letter to Albinus in Britain, 85 n. Deified by Severus, 108.

Cniva invades the Roman territories, 218. Succeſs againſt them, ibid.

Concubines forbid by Conſtantine, 393.

Conſtantia, the daughter of Conſtantius, 334. Married to Licinius, 335, 382.

—— the daughter of Conſtantine, born, 351. When converted, 370 —— daughter of Conſtantius, born, 507. Narrow eſcape, 605.

Conſtantianus's riſe and death, 587.

Conſtantina, the widow of Annibalianus, 445. Married to Gallus, 447. Her pride and cruelty animates him, 460, 464. Dies in her way to Italy, 465.

—— the city of, converted, 410.

Conſtantine, the family of, 251, 334.

—— the emperor, born, 334. Speech on Diocleſian's reſignation, 314. Intercedes for the chriſtians, 316. Cenſure of Porphyry, 329 n. When and where born, 335. His excellent character, 341. Why depoſed by Galerius, 343. In great danger of him, 344. His extraordinary valour, ibid. Over-reaches him, 345. Joins his father in Gaul, ibid. Proclaimed emperor, 346. Severity againſt the Franks, 348. Bridge over the Rhine, 349. Allies with Maximian, 350. His progeny by Fauſta, 351. Acknowledged by Galerius, 355. Betrayed by Maximian, 356. Clemency to him, ibid. Puts him to death, 358. Stratagem againſt the Alemani, 360. Surnamed Maximus for it, ibid. Marches againſt Maxentius, 366. His miraculous converſion, 367. Cyphers and croſs, 368. Inſtructed in the chriſtian religion, 369. His coin, how impreſſed, 370. Croſſes the Alps againſt Maxentius, ibid. Succeſs againſt him, 372. Marches to Rome, ibid. His ſingular dream, 373. Signal victory, ibid. Reception at Rome, 374. Mild eſs to the Maxentians ibid. Edict againſt informers, 375. In favour of the ſenate, ibid. His arch and other triumphal honours, 376. Chriſtian piety, ibid. Stops the perſecution, ibid. Donative to the church, 377. Cycle called indiction, 378. Succeſs againſt the Franks, 382. Takes the title of Francicus, ibid. Reſcript in favour of the clergy, 383. Againſt ſchiſmatics, 384. Falls out with Licinius, 388. Defeats him, 389. Makes peace with him, ibid. His laws in Greece, 390, 392. Defeats the Sarmatians, 394. Signal victory over Licinius, 396. Purſues him into Aſia, ibid. Grants him a new peace, 397. Defeats and puts him to death, 398. Edict in favour of the chriſtians, 399. Againſt idolatry, 400. Shuts up the heathen temples, ibid. Baniſhes ſome ſome hereſies, 401. Edicts at Nicomedia, ibid. & ſeq. Inſulted at Rome, 402. Severity to Criſpus, ibid. And others, 403. Fatal to his whole family, 404. Bridge over the Danube, 405. Succeſs againſt the Goths, ibid. Favours the Arians, ibid. Largeſſes to Conſtantinople, ibid. & ſeq. Defeats the Goths, 408 And Sarmatians, ibid. Generoſity to Antioch and other cities, 409. Embaſſies from all the eaſt, ibid. & ſeq. Tranſlation of the holy ſcriptures, 410. Partiality to the Arians, 411. Diviſion of the empire, ibid. Wars againſt the Perſians, 413. Laſt ſickneſs, ibid. By whom baptized, ibid. Death, 414. Laſt will put into bad hands, ibid. Funeral pomp, 415. Stately mauſoleum, 416. And high encomiums, 417. Character vindicated, ibid. & ſeq. Wholſome regulations, 420. Writings, 425 n. Final end of his family, 432 & ſeq.

Conſtantine II. his ſon, born, 351. Created Cæſar, 391. His ſhare of the empire, 411. Proclaimed emperor, 431. Takes the title of Auguſtus, ibid. Invades Conſtans, 433. Defeated and killed, 434. His character, ibid.

Conſtantinople, when begun, 405. Dedicated, ibid. Why built by Conſtantine, ibid. & ſeq. How adorned, 406. Conſecrated, 407. Governed, ibid. & 491. Beautified by Conſtantius, 510. By Julian, 535.

Conſtans, the ſon of Conſtantine, born, 331. Created Cæſar, 399, 408. His ſhare of the empire, 411. Proclaimed. 431. Takes the title of Auguſtus, ibid. Defeats and kills his brother Conſtantine, 433, 434. Marches againſt the Franks, ibid. And Scots, 435. Zeal for the orthodox, 437. Murdered, 441. His character, 442. Vindicated, ibid.

Conſtantius Chlorus choſen Cæſar by Maximian, 293. Adopted by him, ibid. His ſhare of the empire, ibid. Succeſs in Gaul, 301. Buildings and works there, 302. Sails into Britain, 303. Up the Thames, 304. Succeſs againſt the Alemani, 309. Declared emperor, 315. His extract, 330. Wife and character, 331, 332. Generous way of raiſing money, ibid. Protects the chriſtians, 333. Turns away the apoſtates, 334. His ſhare of the empire, 343. Succeſs againſt the Britons, 345. His death and obſequies, 346. Was the firſt conſtant wearer of the diadem, 417.

—— the ſon of Conſtantine, 351, 392. His ſhare of the empire, 411. Married to his uncle's daughter, 412. Made executor to his father, 414. Performs his obſequies, 416. Proclaimed emperor, 431. And Auguſtus, ibid. Whether the murderer of his relations, ibid. Wars with the Armenians, 433. Yields Conſtantine's ſhare to Conſtans, 434. Triumphs over the Perſians, 435. Marches againſt Maxentius, 445. Artful ſpeech to his army, 446. Succeſs againſt him, 449. Pity and clemency to the enemy, 451. Enters Italy, ibid. Affection for Euſebia, 453. Succeſs againſt Magnentius, 455. Clemency to the revolted, 457. Contradicted by other authors, ibid. Hates the orthodox, 459. Marches againſt the Alemans, 461. Makes peace with them, and enters Italy, 462. His deſign againſt Gallus fruſtrated, 463. Invites him into Italy, 465. Puts him to death, 467. His abominable pride, 468. Succeſs againſt the Germans, 469. Directions to Julian when made Cæſar, 474. Succeſs in Rhœtia, 475. Grand entry and honours at Rome, 478. Marches into the north, 479. Takes the honour of Julian's victories, 483. Anſwer to Sapor's haughty letter, 485. Regard for Conſtantinople, ibid. Succeſs and cruelties againſt the Sarmatians, 486. Marches againſt Sapor, 496. Policy againſt Julian, 497. Threatening meſſage to him, 503. Stirs up the Germans againſt him, 505. Marries Fauſtina, 507. His death, 508. Baptiſm, 509. Character, ibid. & ſeq. Library at Conſtantinople, 510.

Conſtantius Julius, the ſon of Chlorus, his death, 334.

—— the brother of Conſtantine, 412. Created a patrician, 423. Murdered by the ſoldiers, 437.

Conſulars among the Romans, their office, 421.

Cocks regulated by Julian, 532.

Coptos deſtroyed, 305.

Cordus Æl. Jun. character and writings, 209 n.

Corinth burnt by the Heruli, 247.

Corneiia Jul. Paula, married to Heliogabalus, 150. Her excellent character, ibid.

Correctors among the Romans, their office, 421.

Council of Arles, 388. Of Nice, 401. Of Tyre, 411. Of Jeruſalem, ibid. Of Sardica, 436. Second of Arles, 459. Of Milan, 469.

Count, whence derived, 224.

Craſſus baniſhed and put to death, 64.

Creſcentius, a lewd Cynic philoſopher, 424 n.

Crete damaged by an earthquake, 614.

Criminals condemned to the mines, 402.

Criſpina married to Commodus, 39. Baniſhed and murdered, 57.

Criſpinus Tullius made prætor of the guards, 82. Sent to aſſaſſinate Severus, 92. Cut in pieces, ibid.

——— noble defence of Aquileia, 197.

Criſpus, the father of Claudia, 251.

——— the ſon of Conſtantine, born, 342. Created Cæſar, 391. His character, ibid. Defeats the Franks, 393. And Licinius at ſea, 397. Falſly accuſed by Fauſta, 402. Put to death, ibid.

Crocus defeated by Conſtantius, 346.

Crones's writings and character, 46 n.

Croſs ſeen by Conſtantine, 367. Becomes the Roman ſtandard, 368. Stamped on the ſhields and helmets, 373. Set up in the Seſſorian church, 378.

Crucifixion forbid by Conſtantine, 390.

Cteſiphon taken by Caſſius, 10. By Severus, 108. Its dreadful fate, ibid. Cloſely beſieged by Odenatus, 235. By Carus, 288.

Culcianus put to death, 387.

Curioſi at court, who, 532. Reduced, ibid.

Cybele, the ſtatue of, carried to the temple of Eleagabalus, 153.

——— the temple of, inriched by Julian, 535.

Cylax made governor of Armenia, 627. Betrays the Perſians, ibid.

Cynic philoſopher's ſpeech to Commodus, 58. Burnt alive for it, 59.

Cyriades's character, 227. Aſſumes the purple in the eaſt, 228.

Cyrillus Statius, his writings and character, 323.

Cyzicus plundered by the Heruli, 247. Taken by Procopius, 616.

D

DAcia ſeized by the Goths, 244. Rejoined to the empire, 293.

——— New, by whom founded, 268.

Dacians defeated by Aurelius, 13. By Decius, 218. Ravaged by the Quadi, 219.

Dadaſtana, where ſituate, 573.

Dagalaiphus promotes Valentinian's election, 575. Noble anſwer to him, 579. Succeſs againſt the Germans, 582. Choſen conſul, 583. Treachery in Germany, ibid. & 584.

Daja. Vide Maximin, 314.

Dalmatius, the ſon of Conſtantius, 334. His death, ibid.

——— his ſon born, 334. Created Cæſar, 411. Murdered by the ſoldiers, 431.

Damophilus's writings and character, 48 n.

Daphne's temple at Rome burnt, 537.

———, a ſuburb of Antioch, infamous to a proverb, 14.

Datianus, a promoter of Valentinian, 575.

Decentius created Cæſar, 443. His birth and character, ibid. Defeated by the Franks, 448. Choſen conſul, 451. Repulſed before Treves, 452. Hangs himſelf, 456.

Decentius ſent to bring part of Julian's forces, 487. His fatal imprudence, 498.

Decimus ſucceeds Vulpianus, 159.

Decius Tre. ſucceeds the brave Caſtinus, 145. Put to death by Heliogabalus, 152.

——— the emperor, ſent governor of Mœſia, 214. Forced to accept the empire, ibid. Kills Philip, ibid. Proclaimed and acknowledged, 216. Grievous perſecution of the chriſtians, ibid. Succeſs againſt the Goths, 218, 219. Betrayed by Gallus, 220. His death and character, ibid.

——— his ſon defeats the Goths, 218. Cut off by them, ibid. When called Auguſtus, ibid. His bravery and death, 220.

Delphidius's writings and character, 512 n.

Demetrius Cythras tortured for idolatry, 492.

Demonax a Cynic philoſopher's excellent character, 43. Noble anſwer to the Athenians, 44. And to M. Aurelius, ibid.

Demophilus choſen biſhop of Conſtantinople, 621.

Demoſthenes defeated by Sapor, 233.

Deſiderius created Cæſar by his brother, 443. Murdered by him, 456. Said to have ſubmitted to Conſtantius, 457.

Deuſona, the treacherous fight of, 594.

Dexippus's victory over the Heruli, 247.

——— writings and character, 274 n.

Diadem firſt worn by Aurelian, 270.

Diadumenus, the ſon of Macrinus, 137, 141. Created Cæſar ibid Surnamed Antoninus, 142. Mild character, 144. Suppoſed letter to his father, ibid. & 145 & n. Made partner of the empire, 147. His flight and death, 148.

Diana's temple at Epheſus plundered by the Scythians, 240.

Diocæſarea burnt by Gallus, 453.

Dioclea, the mother of Diocleſian, 290.

Diocles put to death by Valentinian, 589.

Diocleſan æra, what, 292.

Diocleſian proclaimed, 289. His riſe and character, 290. Runs Aper through, 292. Succeſs againſt Carinus, 293. In Gaul, &c. ibid. Againſt the Perſians, 294. In Germany, 296. Againſt the Sarmatians, ibid. Interview with Maximian, ibid. Fatal diviſion of the empire, 298. Goes into Thrace, Thrace, 302. Cruel ſucceſs in Egypt, 305. Alliance with the Nubians, 306. Contempt of Galerius, 307. Caſtles on the Perſian frontiers, 309. Brings a famine by his avarice, 310. & ſeq. Perſecutes the chriſtians, 311. Lives in terrors from that time, ibid. Cruelty to Antioch, Seleucia, &c. 312. Triumphs with his three colleagues, 313. His tedious illneſs, ibid. Reſigns to Galerins, ibid. Speech to the people upon it, 315. Retired life, ibid. Palace at Spalato, ibid. Death and character, 316, 381. Baths and other public buildings, ibid. Cruelty and vanity, 318. His hiſtory, whence imperfect, 319. The firſt wearer of pearls, 417.

Diodorus biſhop of Tarſus, his confutation of Porphyry, 328.

——— put to death by Valentinian, 589.

Diogenes Laertius's writings and character, 122 n.

Dion Caſſius made governor of Smyrna, 144. Conſulſhip and honours under Alex. Severus, 160. Retirement, 161. Account of the Roman legions at that time, ibid. His other writings, 179 n.

——— Chryſoſtom's writings and character, 179 n.

Dionyſius Papyrius brings on a famine in Rome, 62. Put to death, 63.

——— the firſt, created count, 423.

Dioſpolis burnt by Gallus, 453.

Domitian, prefect of the eaſt, ſucceeds Thalaſſus, 463. His ill conduct towards Gallus, ibid. Miſerable end, 464.

Donatiſts ſuppreſſed by Conſtantine, 384. By the council of Arles, 388. In Africa, 437. Court the revolted Firmus, 600.

Donatus's writings and character, 513 n.

Drepanum, whence called Helenopolis, 404.

Druid woman's threatening ſpeech to Alexander, 169.

——— promiſes the empire to Diocles, 291. Fulfilled, ibid.

Duces, their office, 422.

Duras overturned by an earthquake, 436.

Dynamenes's treachery to Sylvanus, 470. To Malaricus, 471.

Dyſcoles. Vide Apollonius, 50 n.

E

EArthquake at Antioch, a dire one deſcribed under Gallienus, 239. A dreadful one under Conſtans, 434. Another in Pontus and Campania, 436. Deſtroys 150 cities, 489. Diſmal one under Julian, 587. Under Valens, 614. Under the ſame, 623.

Eccleſiaſtics, their immunities. See Clergy, 377, & ſeq.

Eclectus high chamberlain to Commodus, 57. Doomed to death by him, 67. Conſpires againſt him, ibid. Dies in defence of Pertinax, 78.

Edeſſa taken and burnt by Caſſius, 10. Made a Roman colony, 134. Sells dear her paſſage to Sapor, 235. Forgiven by Conſtantius, 511.

Eggius Merulus's conſulſhip, 58.

Eleagabalus. Vide Heliogabalus, 146.

——— the temple of, 53.

Eleaſina, the pontiff of, his magic practices with Julian, 527.

Emeſſa, the cathedral of, built by Conſtantius, 511.

Emeſſans kill young Quietus, 240. Put to the ſword, ibid. Surrender to Aurelian, 259.

Epagathus, a ſlave, his great ſway with Caracalla, 130.

Ephorus's writings and character, 250 n.

Equitius, why ſet aſide from the empire, 574. Extortions in Illyricum, 583. Moderation to the Quadi, 604. Purſued by them, 605.

Eruçius C. Ju. acknowledges Pertinax emperor, 72.

Etruſcilla Herenn. the wife of Decius, 216.

——— daughter, married to Gallus, 221.

Etruſcus the ſon of Decius, 217. His death, 221.

Evagrius's vain apology for Conſtantine, 403. Choſen biſhop of Conſtantinople, 625.

Evaſius burnt alive, 603.

Eucolpius's writings and character, 177 n.

Eudoxius, biſhop, ſwears Valens to Arianiſm, 621. His death, 625.

Eugenius, proclaimed emperor, 312. Killed at Antioch, ibid.

——— an eunuch, ſides with Procopius, 614.

Eumenius's flattery to Conſtantius, 304. Panegyric on Conſtantine, 357. Writings and character, 424 n.

Eunapius's writings and character, 424 n. 557 n.

Eunomia, a great oratreſs, 424 n.

Eunuchs, the number of, regulated by Aurelian, 266. Privileges granted to by Conſtantius, 451.

Evodius put to death by Caracalla, 125.

Euſebia married to Conſtantius, 453. Her character, ibid. Friendſhip to Julian and the Arians, 454, 473. Unnatural jealouſy againſt Helena, 454, 455. Barrenneſs and death, ibid. Journey to Rome, 477.

Euſebius of Nicomedia baniſhed, 401. Recalled, 405. Impoſes on Conſtantine, 411. His hypocriſy, 414. Educates young Julian, 521.

——— biſhop of Cæſarea, his account of the thundering legion, 23. Of Conſtantine's converſion, vindicated, 369. Speech on the holy ſepulchre, 410. Book on Eaſter, ibid. Character of Conſtantine, 419. Character and writings, 423 n.

——— Conſtantius's high chamberlain, quells a ſedition in Gaul 461. Works Gallus's fall, 467. The cruel judge of all his friends, ibid. & ſeq. Treachery to Urſicinus, 492, 494, 495, & ſeq. Deputation to Julian, 529. Put to death, 531.

——— profeſſor of eloquence, ſucceeds Proereſes, 550 n

Euſtatius baniſhed by Conſtantine, 411.

Eutherus ſent to clear Julian, 478.

Eutropia, the wife of Maximian, 293.

——— daughter of Conſtantius, 334. Whether a chriſtian, 370.

——— the ſiſter of Conſtantine the Great, 444. Murdered, ibid.

Eutropius's character of Conſtantius, 332.

Eutychianus, a buffoon, made conſul, 153.

Euzoius, an Arian biſhop, baptizes Conſtantius, 509.

F

FAbia betrothed to M. Aurelius, 4. Suppoſed to have poiſoned L. Verus, 15.

——— Oreſtilla married to Gordianus, 192.

Fabian martyred at Rome, 217.

Fabilius's writings and character, 210 n.

Fadila, Aur. Antoninus, betrothed to Maximinus Cæſar, 183, 184.

——— L. Junia, married to Fabilius, 210 n.

Falco Q. Cos acknowledges Pertinax emperor, 72. Brave ſpeech to him, 73. Propoſed to the empire, 77. Forgiven, and retires, ibid.

Fauſta, the wife of Conſtantine, born, 293. Married to him, 351. Iſſue by him, ibid. Fidelity to him, 358. Delivered of a ſon, 391. Treachery to Criſpus, 402, 403. Death, ibid.

Fauſtina, daughter of Antoninus, whether acceſſory to Caſſius's treaſon, 30, 31. Her two letters to the emperor about him, 31 n. Death and undeſerved honours, 36.

——— Annia put to death by Commodus, 64.

——— Annia married to Heliogabalus, 150. Murdered by him, ibid.

Fauſtina, widow of Conſtantius, comes to join Procopius, 617.

Fauſtinian ſociety of women founded by M. Aurelius, 37.

Fauſtinopolis, why ſo called, 37.

Fauſtinus executed for a jeſt, 610.

Feliciſſimus's revolt and death, 267.

Felix, a faithleſs miniſter of young Gordian, 203 n.

Feſtus Pomp. his writings and character, 514 n.

Filii Auguſtorum among the Romans, what, 355.

Firmicus Julius's writings and character, 517 n.

Firmilianus put to death, 387.

Firmius revolts in Egypt, 262. Taken, and executed, 263.

Firmus ſtirs up a revolt in Morea, 599. Sham ſubmiſſion, 601. Pardoned by Theodoſius, ibid. Revolts afreſh, 602. Sudden flight, 603. Betrayed by Igmazen, ibid. Strangles himſelf, ibid.

Flavia Titiana's character, 72. Diſliked by Pertinax, ibid.

Florentius, a ſworn enemy to Julian, 498, 528. Runs away from him, 501. Conſulſhip and flight, 506. Narrow eſcape from death, 331.

——— another put to death by Julian, 332.

——— betrays Procopius to Valens, 617. Put to death for it, ibid.

Florianus, the brother of Tacitus, 277. Rejected from the conſulſhip, ibid. Aſſumes the purple, ibid. Murdered, 278.

Florus, the ſon of Evaſius, burnt alive, 603.

Follis, the tax of, falſly imputed to Conſtantine, 418.

Fortunatianus Curt. his writings and character, 209 n.

Francici, the feſtival of, whence, 349.

Franks, who, 226. Defeated by Aurelian, ibid. Ravage Italy, 229. Invade Spain, 244. Go into Afric, 245. Tranſplanted by Conſtantine, 301, 305. Defeated by him, 348. Over-reached and cut to pieces by him, 382. By Criſpus, 393. Submit to Conſtans, 435. Defeated by Julian 438. By Theodoſius, 589.

Fraomarius made king of the Bucinobantes, 597.

Friday ordered to be kept, 394.

Fronto Saturn's bravery in Syria, 8.

Frumentarii, their office, 317. Suppreſſed, ibid.

Fullofaudes killed in Britain, 538.

Furius Celſus's ſucceſs in Mauritania, 160.

G

GAbinius treacherously murdered, 605.
Gaiabomarus murdered by Caracalla, 133.
Gainatis taken by Theodosius, 602.
Gaiso, the murderer of Constans, 441.
Galen, physician to M. Aurel. 17. A further account of him, 122 n.
——— his son's writings and character, 122 n.
Galeria, the daughter of Diocletian, a christian, 291. Banished, 316.
——— Valeria married to Galerius, 298.
Galerius Maxim. created Cæsar by Diocletian, 298. Adopted by him, ibid. His share of the empire, ibid. Mean extract, 299. Works in Pannonia, 300. Defeated by Narses, 306. Retrieves his honour, 307. Behaviour to the Persians, 308. Suspected by Diocletian, 309. Exasperates him against the christians, 311. Forces him and Maximian to resign, 314. Declared emperor, 315. Tyrannizes over Diocletian, 342. Shares the empire with Constantius 343. Hatred to Constantine, 344. Treachery to him, 345. Repulsed from Rome, 352. Dreadful sickness, 359. Edict in favour of the christians, 360. Death, 361.
Galla married to Jul. Constant. 412.
Gallicanus's rashness, and the fatal consequences of it, 195.
Gallienus created Cæsar, 224. His father's collegue, 225. Success in Germany, 226. Against the Alemani, &c. ibid. Treachery to his father, 229. Success against Ingenuus, 230. Cruelty to the Mœsians, ibid. Commits the eastern forces to Odenatus, 235. Compounds with Aureolus, 238. Marches against Posthumius, 241. Cruelty to the Byzantines, ibid. Mock triumph at Rome, 242. Gratitude to Odenatus, 243. Marches into Gaul, ibid. Defeats the Heruli, 248. Marches against Aureolus, ibid. His death, ibid. His relations put to death, 249. His abhorred character ibid. Deified, ibid.
Gallus, the son of young Constantius, born, 412. How saved from the massacre, 432. Created Cæsar, 447. Success against the Persians, ibid. Consulship at Constantinople, 451. Success against the revolted Jews, 453. Defeats the Isaurians, 459. His suspicious and cruel temper, 460. Raises a revolt at Antioch, 462. Cruelty to Montius and others, 464. Slily invited by Constantius, 465. Arrested in his way to him, 466. Put to death, 467. Zeal for christianity, 503.
Gallus, the Roman general, his success against the Goths, 218. Treachery to Decius, 220. Proclaimed emperor, 221. His extract and rise, ibid. Shameful peace with the Goths, ibid. Persecutes the christians, 222. Revels in Rome, ibid. Killed by his men, ibid.
——— Cæsar, the son of Jul. Constantius, 334.
Gannius, a favourite of Heliogabalus, plundered by him, 152.
Garba, island, where sited, 221.
Gargilius Martialis's writings and character. 177 n.
Gaudentius condemned to death by Julian, 526.
Gaudianus, a vile minister of Gordian, discarded, 204 n.
Gaul declares for Severus, 93. Reduced by Aurelian, 263, 267. The district of, with its provinces, 421. Ruined by the Franks, 447. Harassed by the Germans, 582.
Gaulish legions mutiny against Alexander, 170.
Geberic's success against the Sarmatians, 409.
Gellius's treason pardoned, 144.
Geminius, the twin of Commodus, born, 4.
Genialis Flav. made prætor of the guards, 82. Shuts himself up with Julianus, 93.
Gennadius's writings and character, 512 n.
Genobaud submits to Maximian, 295.
Georgius, the Arian, succeeds Athanasius, 477.
Gepidæ revolt against Probus, 282.
Germa destroyed by an earthquake, 623.
Germans war against M. Aurel. 12. Renewed with fresh vigour, 13. Against Alexander, 169. Against Valerian, 225. Against Aurelian, 255. Against Probus, 279. Against Constantius, 469. Julian, 482. Valentinian, 582.
——— women, their bravery, 132.
Germanicopolis, the capital of Isauria, 622. When made an episcopal see, ibid.
Germany ravaged by Maximin, 185.
Gerontius cruelly used by Constantius, 457.
Gestoriacum taken by Constantius, 301.
Geta Severus, the father of Alexand. Sever, 90.
——— the son of Severus by Julia, 90. Declared Cæsar, 109. Chosen tribune, 116. Takes the name of Britannicus, 117. Succeeds with his brother to the empire, 122. His sweet character, 124. Hated by Caracalla 125. Murdered by him, 126. Declared a traitor, 127. Deified, &c. ibid.

Geta Severus, brother of Severus, discovers Plautianus's ill conduct, 113.
Glabrio refuses the empire, 73.
Gladiators restrained by M. Aurel. 39. Forbid by Constantine, 402.
Gondomarus makes peace with Constantius, 476.
Gordianus, Alexander's counsellor, 157. Proclaimed emperor in Afric, 186. Enters Carthage, 187. Letter to the senate, ibid. To the consuls, ibid. Acknowledged by them, ibid, & 188 n. Defeated by Capelianus, 190. Kills himself, ibid. His extraction and character, 191. Poems and success in Afric, 192.
——— his son made collegue, 187. Defeated and killed, 190.
Gordianus's grandson chosen Cæsar by the populace, 194. Appeases a dangerous tumult in Rome, 196. Chosen sole emperor, 201. His character, ibid. Abused by his ministers, 202. Magnificent games, ibid, Marriage with F. Sabina, ibid. Dutiful answer to his father, 203 n. Success against Sapor, 205. In Syria, ibid. Letter to the senate, ibid. Pursues the Persian war, 206. Deposed by Philip, 207. And murdered, ibid. His stately tomb and epitaph, ibid.
——— consul's speech to the senate, 275.
Gorgenius bribes himself off, 468.
Goths invade the Roman territories 200. Repulsed by Gurdian, 205. New inroads, 218. Defeated by Decius, ibid. Victory over him, 220. Sad defeat by Aurelian, 227. Driven out of Asia, 245. Ravage it afresh, 247. 300,000 of them killed and taken, 253. Make peace with Aurelian, 255. With Probus, 281. Defeat the Burgundi, 297. Defeated by Constantine, 394, 405. 100,000 destroyed by him, 408. Embrace christianity, ibid. Assist Procopius, 619. Defeated by Valens, 620. Their apology to him disallowed, ibid. Defeated, 623. Obtain a peace, ibid. The articles of it, 624.
Grata, the daughter of Valentinian, 587.
Gratian, the father of Valentinian, his rise and merit, 575. Retirement, ibid
——— the son born, 575. Chosen consul, 583. Emperor, 586. Accompanies Valentinian into Germany, 590. His famous bridge, 593. Left to overawe the Germans, 607.
Greece over-run by the Castobochi, 18. By a grievous pestilence, 239. Ravaged by the Goths, ibid. Damaged by an earthquake, 537.
Greeks vast encomiums on Constantine, 417.
Gregory's writings and character, 428 n.
Greuthongi defeated by Valens, 623.
Grumbates serves under Sapor, 493.

H

HÆmus, mount, where situate, 218.
Hariobandus submits to Julian, 490.
Harpocration's writings and character, 50 n.
Hebdomon, the christian emperors crowned at, 578.
Helena, the mother of Constantine, divorced, 334. Her birth and extract, 336. Really married to Constantius, 339. Whether a native of Britain, 341. Converted by her son, 370. Finds the cross of Christ, 404. Her death and character, ibid.
——— the wife of Julian, rendered abortive by Eusebia, 455. Her death, 504.
——— the daughter of Constantine, 351.
Helenopolis, whence so called, 404.
Heliogabalus's extract, 146. Declared emperor, 147. Bravery and success, 148. Acknowledged by the senate, 149. His vile character, 150. Horrid murders, 152. Journey into Bithynia, ibid. Appoints the worship of Eleagabalus, 153. Whence surnamed Comazon, ibid. Adopts young Alexus, 154. Plots his death, ibid. Murdered by the soldiers, 155.
Helvius, the father of Pertinax, 74.
Hephestion's writings and character, 50 n.
Heraclea taken by Maximin, 384.
Heraeleus sent to recover Bithynia, 97.
Hercules, when that title ceased to be assumed, 318.
Herenianus, the son of Odenatus, 246. His reign, 257. Death, 261.
——— Modestinus's writings and character, 178 n.
Hermocrates's character and writings, 123 n.
Hermogenes the sophist, his excellent character, &c. 46 n. 178 n.
——— the Roman general, killed by Germanus, 592.
Hermogenianus's writings and character, 428 n.
Herodes Atticus's ill language to M. Aurelius, 20.
——— the son of Odenatus, 245. Killed with his father, ibid.
Herodian's writings and character, 208 n.
Heruli, their vast depredations in Asia, 247.
Hierocles, Heliogabalus's beastly husband, 151. Killed by the soldiers, 155.
Hilarius, bishop, banished, 477.
Himerus's character and writings, 560 n.

Holſtein's account of Porphyry, 324 n.
Honoratus defeats Gallus's cruelty, 460. Made firſt prefect of Conſtantinople, 490.
Hormiſdas's ſumptuous preſents to Aurelian, 263. Revolts againſt Varranes, 297.
——— Sapor's brother, made general of Julian's horſe, 539. Narrow eſcape, 545. Made governor of Holleſpont, 616.
Hortarius ſues Julian for peace, 488.
Hoſtilia Severa, the ſuppoſed wife of Gallus, 221.
Hoſtilianus, the ſon of Decius, 217. Declared Cæſar by Gallus, 221. His death, 222.
Hunda married to Bonoſus, 284. Favoured by Probus, ibid.
Hymetius tried for treaſon, 597, 598. Baniſhed, ibid.
Hyperechius cowardly delivered up by his troops, 616.

I

IAmblichus refuſes Julian's invitation, 534.
——— an account of him and his writings, 49 n. Three of that name, 427 n. Their writings, &c. ibid.
James, biſhop, ſaves Niſibis by his prayers, 439.
Januarius, why not choſen emperor, 574.
January, whence called Amazonius, 66.
Janus's temple opened by Gordian, 204.
Jaziges join in the German war, 12. Twice defeated, 18. Join againſt the Romans, 25. Defeated, 26.
Icoſium delivered up to Theodoſius, 601.
Idolatry forbid, 434, 477.
Jeruſalem, the great church of, built by Conſtantine, 404.
Jews join with Caſſius, 31. Subdued by Caracalla, 112. Forbid to moleſt chriſtian converts, 390. New revolt and puniſhment, 453.
Igillus taken priſoner by Probus, 281.
Ignomen betrays Firmus to the Romans, 603.
Ilium deſtroyed by the Scythians, 240.
Illyricum, the diſtrict of, with its provinces, 420. Sadly ravaged by the Quadi, 604.
Inceſtuous marriages, a law againſt, 468.
Indiction at Rome, what, 378. When and by whom begun, 379.
Informers proſecuted by Macrinus, 142, 144. Whence called quadruplatores, ibid. Encouraged by Maximin, 185. Diſcouraged by Dioclefian, 306. By Conſtantine, 375. Revived by Conſtantius, 457.
Ingenuus proclaimed emperor in Pannonia, 230. Defeated by Gallienus, ibid.
Intelene, the province of, yielded to the Romans, 308. Where ſituate, ibid.
Jolopianus's revolt and death, 213.
Joviani, who, 576.
Jovianus ſent into Pannonia, 506. Declared emperor, 563. His excellent character, ibid. Zeal for chriſtianity, 564. Diſadvantageous peace with Perſia vindicated. 565. Faithfulneſs vindicated, 567. Repaſſes the Tigris, 568. Edicts in favour of chriſtianity, 569. Of orthodoxy, 570. Death, 573. Whether natural or violent, ibid.
Jovinus ſent into Pannonia, 506. Into Gaul, 572. Succeſs and bravery there, 584. Piety, 585. Different from the conſul of that name, ibid. Sent into Britain, 588. Againſt the Alemans, 590. Vide & 581.
Iphicles, the philoſopher, informs againſt Probus, 608.
Iſaflenſes protect Firmus, 603.
Iſaurians revolt, 244. And bravery, ibid. &c. Reduced by Probus, 281. By Gallus, 459. Stripped of their plunder, and ſubmit, 622.
Iſidorus raiſes a revolt in Egypt, 19.
——— the ſuppoſed forger of Conſtantine's grant, 377.
Iſſus, the battle of, won by Severus, 99.
Italy invaded by the Marcomani, 16. Ruined by Dioclefian, 299.
Italy, the diſtrict of, its provinces, 421.
Judges, Conſtantine's laws about them, 393.
Julia, Sept. Severus's wife, her lewd character, 90. Studies philoſophy, ibid. & ſeq. Prevents her ſon's reconciliation, 125. Wounded at Geta's murder, 126. In favour with Caracalla, 127. Starves herſelf to death, 141.
——— Mamea, the mother of Alexander, 154, 156. Suppoſed to have been a chriſtian, ibid. Excellent education of her ſon, ibid. High ſway and titles, 157. Murdered in Germany, 172. Deified by the ſenate, ibid.
Julian the apoſtate's judgment of M. Aurelius, 36, 41. Of Porphyry, 329 n. His birth, 334. Partial cenſures on Conſtantine refuted, 412, 417. Saved by Euſebia, 468. Declared Cæſar, 473. Sent into Gaul, 474. His ſucceſs there, 475. Noble defence at Sens, 477. Succeſs againſt the barbarians, 480, 483. Againſt the Franks, 484. Alemans, 490. Stripped of his beſt forces, 497. Proclaimed emperor by them, 499. Accepts the empire, after having uſed ſome witcheries, 500. Generoſity to Conſtantius's friends, ibid.

ibid. How raiſed to the empire, 501. Submiſſive deputation to Conſtantius, 502, 503. Succeſs in Germany, 503. Impoſes on the chriſtians, 504. Succeſs againſt the Alemans, 505. Swears his army to him, ibid. Letters to Athens, 506. Marches againſt Conſtantius, ibid. Seizes Illyricum, 507. Funeral obſequies to Conſtantius, 508. Extract, education, and character, 519. Abode in Ionia, 521. Singular hypocriſy, 522. Studies magic, 523. Abode at Athens, 524. Cæſarſhip and behaviour in Gaul, 526. Writings, ibid. & ſeq. Frugality, 527. Reduction of taxes, 528. Turns apoſtate, 529. Public entry at Conſtantinople, 530. Severe proſecutions, 531. Reforms the court, 532. Which is compoſed of philoſophers, magicians, &c. 533. And women, 534. Meanneſs to the ſenate, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Journey to Antioch, 535. Partial juſtice there, 536. Horrid cruelties and witcheries, 537. Purſued by a famine, ibid. His idolatry, &c. lampooned by the Antiochians, 538. Writes his Miſopogon againſt them, ibid. Renews the Perſian war, 539. Deluded by the oracles, 540. Sharply reproved for his apoſtacy at Beroea, 541. His helliſh ſuperſtition at Carrhæ, 542. Ill treatment of Arſaces, 543. Enters Perſia, 544. Succeſs there, ibid. Paſſes the Tigris, 546. Betrayed by the Perſian guides, ibid. Burns his fleet and retreats, ibid. In great diſtreſs, 548. Surpriſed by the Perſian army, ibid. Wounded, 549. Laſt ſpeech, 550. Death, ibid. Buried at Tarſus, ibid. Removed to Conſtantinople, 551. His motley character, ibid. & ſeq. Hatred to the chriſtians, 554. Vain attempt to rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem, 555. Writings, ibid. n. Laws againſt the chriſtians repealed, 569.

——— a friend of Conſtantius, unjuſtly condemned, 536.

Julianus Salvius his grandſon, put to death by Commodus, 57.

——— made captain of his guard, 63. Put to death, ibid.

Julianus Didius Severus, a wealthy Roman, buys the empire of the ſoldiers, 80. His riſe and pedigree, ibid. Character, names, &c. 81, 82. Acknowledged emperor by the ſenate, 82. Curſed and pelted by the populace, 83. Oppoſed by two powerful rivals, 91. Cruelty and deſpair, 92. Forſaken and proſcribed, 93. His death and burial ibid.

——— M. Aurel. proclaims himſelf emperor, 298. Stabs himſelf, 301.

——— Ruſticus, a caſt-off candidate for the empire, 586.

Julius Didius, made proconſul of Afric, 65.

——— Solinus Polyhiſtor, his writings and character, 123, n.

——— Titianus's writings, 123, n.

——— Martialis conſpires againſt Caracalla, 137. Stabs him, and killed, ibid. & 138.

——— governor of Aſia, deſtroys the Goths there, 30.

Junius Palmatus's ſucceſs in Armenia, 160.

Jupiter, when that title ceaſed, 318.

Juſta, the daughter of Valentinian, 587.

Juſtina, the wife of Valentinian, 575. Her iſſue, 587. Goes with him into Illyricum, 607.

Juthungi revolt, 282. Invade Rhætia, 486.

Juvenalis made captain of the guards, 94.

Juvencus's writings and character, 430, n.

L.

LAbarum, or Conſtantine's ſtandard, how carried, 368.

Lactantius made tutor to young Criſpus, 392.

Lætus conſpires againſt Commodus, 67. Raiſes Pertinax to the throne, 70, 71. Excuſed by him, 71. Raiſes a revolt againſt him, 77. Put to death by Julianus, 92.

——— general to Severus, reduces Meſopotamia, 103. Treachery to that monarch, 106. Death, ibid. Vide & 109.

——— the wretch who adviſed the murder of Geta, 129. Put to death, ibid.

Lampridius's writings and character, 320, n.

——— an enemy to Sylvanus, 470. Puniſhed, 471.

Langres new colonied by the Franks, 305.

Laodicea declares for Niger, 99. Plundered, &c. ibid.

Laſcivius Tr. propoſed to the empire, 77. Flees to Pertinax, ibid.

Lateran palace, when given to the pope, 377.

Lawyers ſuppreſſed by Valentinian, 590.

Legions, Roman, the ſtate of, according to Dion Caſſ. 161. To Lampridius, ibid.

Lemnos plundered by the Heruli, 247.

Leo, a cruel collegue of Maximin, 595. His death, 598.

Leonas ſent by Conſtantine to Julian, 503.

Leontius, biſhop, his indiſcreet zeal againſt Euſebia, 484.

Leptis beſieged by the Eſturians, 581.

Treachery to the Tripolitans, ibid. Punished 582.

Leti attempt the city of Lyons, 480. Cut off by Julian, 481.

Libanius's character of the turbulent Franks, 434. Of Julian in Germany, 476. Elegy on Nicomedia, 489. Silenced by Constantius, 523. Speech in favour of Antioch, 540. Character of Julian, 552. Speech to Valens, 626.

Liberius, pope, his reproof to Eusebia, 454. Banished by Constantius, 469.

Libo's death in Syria, 11. His widow married to Severus's freed-man, ibid.

Library, the capitol's, destroyed by lightning, 62.

Libya destroyed by an earthquake, 537.

Licinianus Perpenna's revolt quelled, 322.

——— the son of Licinius, created Cæsar, 391.

Licinius marries Constantine's sister, 316, 381. Chosen emperor, 353. His extract and character, ibid. & seq. Sent against Maxentius, 354. Chosen consul, 357. Present at Galerius's death, 361. Marches against Maximin, ibid. Joins Constantine at Milan, 381. Marches against Maximin, 385. His vision and prayer, ibid. Complete victory, ibid. Reception in Bithynia, 386. Edict in favour of the christians, ibid. Severity to Galerius's family, 387. Quarrel and war with Constantine, 388. Defeat, 389. Peace with him, ibid. Second war, 395. Totally defeated, 396. Superstitious speech to the army, ibid. Defeated at sea, 397. Makes a new peace, and breaks it, ibid. & seq. Defeated and put to death, 398.

——— Constantine's nephew, put to death, 403.

Limigantes cut off, and driven out of Sarmatia, 486. Treachery to Constantius, 490. Cut in pieces, 491.

Logi defeated by Probus, 280.

Lollianus unjustly put to death, 596.

Lollius Gentianus, the patron of Pertinax, 74.

——— Spurius proclaimed emperor in Gaul, 246. His rise, death, and character, ibid.

London delivered by Constantius, 304.

Longinus the philosopher, his writings and character, 270, n. Put to death by Aurelian, 271, n. His character of the Mosaic writings, 272, n.

Lucas banished by Constantine, 411.

Lucian's shameful exaggeration of a Roman victory, 8. His character and writings, 43, n. Over-reached by Alexander, 44, n.

Lucianus's noble defence of Nisibis, 439.

Lucilla married to L. Verus, 4, 10. Suspected of poisoning him, 15. Marries Claud. Pompeianus, 17.

——— sister of Commodus, ravished and murdered by him, 53.

——— plots against Commodus, 56. Banished and put to death, 57.

Lucillianus sent embassador to Sapor, 486. Taken prisoner by Julian, 506. Commands his fleet, 543. Made general of Illyricum, 568. Murdered in Gaul, 572.

Lupercus's writings and character, 250, n.

Lupicinus sent against the Scots, 497. Arrested, and well used by Julian, 502. Sent against Procopius, 616.

Lupus forced to buy a peace from the Caledonians, 109. Terribly harassed by the North Britons, 116.

Luscus burnt alive, 468.

Lycaonia freed from the Persians, 233. How divided by Valens, 626.

Lyons taken and destroyed by Severus, 106.

M.

MAcrianus, a magician, instigates Valerian against the christians, 227. Treachery to him, 228. His rise and character, 236. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. Success against the Goths, 239. Defeated and killed, 240.

——— king of Germany, submits to Julian, 490. Escapes Valentinian's forces, 597. Interview and peace with him, 606.

Macrinus induced by a soothsayer to aim at the empire, 137. Discovered by Maternianus, ibid. Murders Caracalla, ibid. Chosen emperor, 139. His extract, rise, &c. 140. Letter to the senate, 141. Acknowledged by them, 142. Marches against the Parthians, 143. Forced to buy a peace, ibid. Wholsome and severe laws, ibid. & seq Clemency to some conspirators, 144. Why called Marcellinus, ibid. Conspired against by the soldiers, 146, & seq. Shameful cowardice, 147. Flight, 148. Death, 149.

——— Var, his success against the Germans, 160.

Mæatæ in Britain, where situate, 116. Revolt, 119. Put to the sword by Caracalla, ibid. Make an advantageous peace with him, 135.

Mæsia conspires against Macrinus, 146. Her character, offspring, &c. ibid. Bravery and cunning, ibid. Made a senatress, 152. Great care for young Alexius, 154, 157.

——— put to fire and sword, 230. How divided, 389, 390.

Magicians condemned by Conſtantius, 478, 489. Careſſed by Julian, 533.

Magnentius conſpires againſt Conſtans, 441. Murders his friends, 443. Cruelties at Rome, 444. Sends deputies to Conſtantius, ibid. Succeſs againſt him, 447. Inſulting meſſage to him, 448. Takes Sciſcia, ibid. Bloody witcheries, 449. Defeated at Murſa, 450. Retires to Italy, 451. Beat out of it, 452. Treachery againſt Gallus diſcovered, ibid. Forſaken by his troops, 455. Deſpair and death, 456.

Magnus conſpires againſt Maximin, 184. Put to death, ibid.

Majoza Malcha taken by Julian, 546.

Malaricus excuſes Sylvanus, 470. Betrayed by Dynames, 471.

Mamai, St. the church of, why but half finiſhed, 552.

Mamea. See Julia Mamea, 157. The children of, who, 169.

Mamertinus, one of the judges of the Chalcedonian court, 530. Conſulſhip and reception from Julian, 534.

Maratæ-Cupris, the robbers of, put all to the ſword, 624.

Marcellianus made a duke, 604. Treachery to Gabinus, ibid.

Marcellinus ſent againſt Nepotianus, 444. Defeats him, ibid. Loſt at the Battle of Murſa, 450. Sent with Julian into Gaul, 474. Leaves him in the lurch, 477. Accuſed and ſtripped, ibid. & ſeq.

Marcellus puts Serenianus to death, 619. Takes the imperial dignity, ibid. Tortured to death for it, ibid.

Marcia, a favourite of Commodus, 57. Befriends the chriſtians, ibid. Doomed to death, 67. Poiſons Commodus, 68. Put to death by Julianus, 92.

Marcianopolis, where ſituated, 622.

Marcianus's ſucceſs againſt the Heruli, 248. The ſuppoſed murderer of Gallienus, ibid.

Marcomani war with M. Aurelius, 16. Enter Italy, 16. Miraculouſly defeated, 22. Their treachery puniſhed, 26. Peace with Commodus, 55.

Marga, where ſituate, 394.

Marinus's revolt and defeat, 213, 214.

——— kills himſelf, 469.

——— a pleader, put to death, 596.

Marius Maximus, his writings and character, 177. n.

——— Aurelius proclaimed emperor in Gaul, 246. Murdered, 247.

Marriage of nieces, &c. made capital, 433.

Marſeilles beſieged by Conſtantine, 356. Maximian's tomb there, 359.

Martinianus created Cæſar, 397. Sent againſt Conſtantine, ibid. Put to death, 399.

Martinus nobly withſtands the brave Catena, 458. Kills himſelf, ibid.

Martyrs, the æra of, when, 292.

Maſcezel defeated by Theodoſius, 601.

Maternus's revolt and death, 61.

Mauricus, a general, forces Gordian to accept the empire, 186.

Maurus, a wicked tool of Gordian, 202. Baniſhed, ibid.

——— biſhop, crowns Julian emperor, 500.

Mauſonianus propoſes a peace to the Perſians, 480.

Maxentius's extract, 293. Rejected from being Cæſar, 314, 342. Proclaims himſelf emperor, 347. His character, &c. ibid. Depoſed by Maximian, 352. Protected by the ſoldiers, ibid. Succeſs in Afric, 363. Cruelties there, ibid. At Rome, &c. ibid. & ſeq. Witchcraft and butcheries, 364. Breaks off with Conſtantine, 365. Defeated by him, 372. Stratagem againſt him, ibid. Falls upon himſelf, 373. His defeat and death, ibid. Carried to Rome, 374. The firſt raiſer of the follis tax, 418.

Maxima, the wife of Chilo, accuſed of magic, 595.

Maximian choſen partner with Dioclefian, 293. His riſe and character, ibid. Succeſs in Gaul, 294. In Germany, 295. Defeated in Britain, 296. Succeſs in Afric, 300. Againſt the Moors, 306. Reſigns the empire, 314. Reſumes it to ſuccour Maxentius, 348. Defeats Severus, 350. Maxentius, ibid. And Conſtantine, 356. Taken priſoner by him, ibid. Ingratitude and death, 358.

Maximin choſen Cæſar, 314. Preferred to Maxentius, 342. His extract and character, ibid. Share of the government, 343. Conſulſhip, 349. Created filius Auguſtorum, 355. Agrees with Licinius, 361. Cruelty to Valeria, 362. To Dioclefian, 363. Privately joins with Maxentius, 366. Enmity to the chriſtians, 376, 380. Brings dreadful calamities on the empire, ibid. Marches againſt Licinius, 384. Defeat and flight, 385. Poiſons himſelf, 386. Dreadful diſeaſe and death, ibid. & 387. Followed by that of his relations and tools, ibid. & ſeq.

——— brother in law to Valentine, his riſe and cruelties at Rome, 595. Promotion, 596, 598. Bloody prefectſhip, ibid. Inſtigates Valentinian againſt the Quadi, 604.

Maximinus condemned to death, 58.
——— a Gothiſh general, his revolt in Gaul, 170. Murders Alexander, 171. Declared emperor, 181. His extract, ſtrength, and gigantic ſtature, 182. Devouring ſtomach, 183. Riſe under Alexander, ibid. Horrid cruelties, 184. Waſtes all Germany, 185. Narrow eſcape, ibid. Victories, ibid. Goes into the North, ibid. New cruelties, ibid. Proſcribed by the ſenate, 187. His friends maſſacred, 188. Mad behaviour, 189. Marches into Italy, 190. Aſſaſſinated before Aquileia, 198. His head brought to Rome, 199.
——— his ſon, declared Cæſar, 181. His character, 183. Made partner of the empire, ibid. Proſcribed with his father, 187. And aſſaſſinated with him, 198.
Maximus Pupien. Vide Pupienus, 193.
——— teaches Julian magic, 523. Careſſed at court, 533. His character and arrogance, ibid. And writings, 560, n. Impriſoned and put to death for his witcheries, 579.
Mazaca taken priſoner, 603. His death, ibid.
Mazices, who, 601. Submit to Theodoſius, ibid. Defeated by him, 602.
Media ſubdued by Caſſius, 10.
Melchiades, biſhop of Rome, highly eſteemed by Conſtantine, 376.
Melitene, the legion of, why called Thundering, 23.
Memmia married to Alexander, 158.
Menelaus, a famed archer, killed by Romulus, 450.
Monophilus defends Aquileia, 197.
Merobaudes kills Macrinus, 606.
Meſopotamia reduced by Lætus, &c. 103. Revolts, 159. Ravaged by the Perſians, 163. Recovered by Gordian, 204. Invaded by the Perſians, 433, 473.
Meſſala proſcribes Julianus, 93.
——— Silius put to death by Heliogabalus, 153.
Meſſengers of good news, their extortions reſtrained, 613.
Meſſian family, an account of, 217.
Methodius's learned confutation of Porphyry, 329, n.
Metius, Caſſius's ſon, put to death, 333.
——— F. Nicomach. ſpeech to Tacitus, on his being choſen emperor, 276.
Mezentius's dreadful puniſhment, 144.
Milan ſeized by Aureolus, 238. Taken by Conſtantine, 371. Why the metropolis of Italy, 422.
Militiæ magiſtri, their office and number, 422.
Minervina married to Conſtantine, 342.
Minervius's writings and character, 512, n.
Minutianus's writings and character, 215, n.
Miſitheus chief miniſter to young Gordian, 202. Letter againſt his wicked miniſtry, 203. Signal merit 204. Honoured by the ſenate, 205. Death, ibid.
Mneſtheus's conſpiracy againſt Aurelian, 268. Cruel death, 269.
Moderatus, one of Fauſtina's gallants, promoted, 36.
Modeſtus's cruelties in Paleſtine, 491. To the orthodox, 625.
Months, the names of, how changed by Commodus, 66.
Montius's noble ſpeech to Gallus, 463. Miſerable death. 464.
Moors driven out of Spain, 19. Defeated and tranſplanted, 306.
Mopſucrene, where ſited, 508. The place where Conſtantine died, ibid.
Murſa, a city in New Pannonia, 300. Where ſituate, 449. The battle of, ibid. Fatal to the empire, 450.
Muſcovites have ſainted Conſtantine the Great, 416.
Mutina taken by Conſtantine, 272.

N.

NAar-malcha, cleared by Severus, 108.
Nanninus's defeat and flight, 593.
Narciſſus, a wreſtler, in favour with Commodus, 56. Strangles him, 68. Condemned to the wild beaſts, 108.
Nariſci revolt from the Romans, 12. Make peace with them, ibid.
Narſes defeats the Romans, 306. Defeated by them, 307. Sues for peace, 308. Obtains it, ibid.
——— ſent with a proud meſſage to Conſtantius, 485.
Naulobat heads the Heruli, 248. Surrenders to Gallienus, ibid.
Nazarius's writings and character, 424, n. Character of Julian, 501.
Nazianzen's character of Julian, 501. Juſt ſuſpicion of his hypocriſy, 525. Studies under Proereſes, 557, n.
Nebridius refuſes to ſwear to Julian, 505.
Nectaridus killed in Britain, 588.
Neocæſarea ruined by an earthquake, 436.
Neotherius ſent into Afric, 582.
Nepotianus's revolt, 444. Betrayed and killed, ibid.
Neſtor's writings and character, 123, n.
— Julianus put to death by Heliogabalus, 152.

Nevita ſent into Pannonia, 507. Left to guard Sucidava, ibid. Made one of the judges of the Chalcedonian court, 530. His conſulſhip and reception from Julian, 534.

Nicagoras's writings and character, 215, n.

Nice utterly deſtroyed by an earthquake, 537. Taken by Procopius, 615. Overturned by earthquake, 623.

Nicea fined for abuſing Hipparchus, 9. The battle of, 98.

Nicephorus's account of Helena confuted, 338.

Nicomachus's arithmetic, 427, n. Writings and character, 274, n.

Nicomedia plundered by the Scythians, 239. Beautified by Dioclesian, 317, 318. Deſtroyed by an earthquake, 489. Rebuilt by Julian, 535.

——— the palace of, burnt, 311.

Niger's ſucceſs in Dacia, 55.

——— Peſcennius made governor of Syria, 56. Succeſs aginſt the rebel Maternus, 61. Excellent character, 86. Riſe and ſtrict diſcipline, ibid. & ſeq. Revolts in Syria, 91. Prepares againſt Severus, 97. Proſcribed by the ſenate, 98. Defeated, 99. Retires to Antioch, 100. Defeated and put to death, ibid. His black ſtatue deſcribed, 101 n.

Nigrinus Domit. brave defence at Aquileia, 507.

——— executed for a jeſt, 610.

Niſibis taken by Severus, 108. The dreadful battle of, 143. Beſieged by Artaxerxes, 163. Taken by Sapor, 204. Retaken by Gordian, 205. By the Perſians, 227. By Odenatus, 235. Three times beſieged by the Perſians, 436, 439. A freſh ſiege, 441. Yielded to the Perſians by Jovian, 567. The melancholy ſurrender of it, 569.

Niſſa, the place of Conſtantine's birth, 335.

Nobiliſſimus, when firſt given, 423.

Nobility, their arrogance ſuppreſſed by Conſtantine, 391.

Nohadurus's attempt on Batne, 459.

Nonia Celſa, Macrinus's wife, 140. Intitled Auguſta, 142.

Nonnius Marcellinus's writings and character, 514 n.

Nubians ally with the Romans, 306.

Numenes's writings and character, 45 n.

Numerianus's ſtratagem in favour of Severus, 104.

——— the ſon of Carus, created Cæſar, 287. Proclaimed emperor 289. Killed by Aper, ibid. His character and funeral obſequies, ibid.

Nuns well treated by Sapor, 494.

O

OBeliſk brought from Egypt to Rome, 479.

Odenatus Palmyrenſis's embaſſy to the Perſians, 234. His extract and character, ibid. Brave reſentment againſt them, ibid. Takes the royal title, 235. Promoted by Gallienus, ibid. Penetrates into Perſia, ibid. Succeſs there, 236. Beſieges Emeſſa, 240. Created partner of the empire, 243. Succeſs againſt the Perſians, 245. Drives the Goths out of Aſia, ibid. His death, ibid.

Olympia beſieged by the Perſians, 627. Suffered to eſcape, ibid.

Olympius, Nemeſianus's writings and character, 290 n.

Onaſimus's writings and character, 216 n. 286 n.

Oppian's admired poem and character, 138 n. Statue, epitaph, &c. 139 n.

Optatianus's writings, character, baniſhment, &c. 428 n.

Optatus made a patrician, 423. Murdered by the ſoldiers, 431.

Orfitus one of Fauſtina's gallants, promoted, 36.

Oribaſus's writings and character, 558 n.

Orient, the diſtrict of, its ſeveral provinces, &c. 420

Origen's writings againſt Celſus, 42 n. Great credit with the emperor's mother, 156. Letters to Philip and Severa, 212.

Orleans, by whom built, 267.

Orthodox favoured by Conſtantine, 376, 382. Reſtored by Jovian, 571. Perſecuted by Valens, 621.

Oſias, biſhop, made Conſtantine's almoner, 369. His letter to him, 384.

Oſrhoene reduced by Severus, 101. Seized by Caracalla, 134.

Oſrhoenians revolt againſt Maximin, 184.

Oſrhoes's total defeat of the Romans, 7. Defeat and narrow eſcape, 8.

Ovinius Camillus's attempt on the empire, 159. How uſed by the emperor, 160. His death, ibid.

P

PAleſtine newly divided, 626.

Palfurnius taken and put to death, 281.

Palladius's writings and character, 426 n.

——— treachery to Valentinian, 581. Hangs himſelf, 599.

Pallas, the palace of, burnt, 65.

Palmyra beſieged by Aurelian, 260. Surrendered, 261. Revolts, and is put to the ſword, 262.

Pannonia Secunda, why ſo called, 300. Invaded by the Sarmatians, 479.

Papian law repealed, 393.

Papinian, a prime miniſter, his character, 114. Diſcharged by Caracalla, 125. Noble anſwer to him, 128. Put to death for it, ibid.

——— choſen emperor in Pannonia, 213. His death, ibid.

Paris ſues for Valens's protection, 622, 627.

——— the city of, where firſt ſituate, 484.

Parnaſſus baniſhed, 491.

Parricide, the law againſt, revived by Conſtantine, 392.

Parthians war againſt the Romans, 7. Defeated, 8. 10. Invade Meſopotamia, 108. War againſt Macrinus, 142. Subdued by the Perſians, 159.

Paternus defeats the Germans, 39.

———Tarruncius put to death by Commodus, 57.

Patricians, their dignity, 423.

Paulinus, biſhop, baniſhed by Conſtantius, 459

Paulus of Tyre made councellor to Papianus, 114. To Alexander, 157.

——— Jul. recalled and promoted, 159.

——— the founder of the Eremetic life, 217, 218.

——— biſhop of Conſtantinople, baniſhed, 412.

——— atena, a cruel informer, 457, 458. Cruelties in Paleſtine, 491. Burnt alive, 531.

Pauſanias's hiſtory criticiſed, 48 n.

——— the ſophiſt, an account of, 48 n.

Peace, the famed temple of, at Rome, burnt, 64.

Peloponneſus, the iſthmus of, ſhut up, 239.

Pemenes put to death, 472.

Perennis, Commodus's chief favourite, put to death, 58. His character and crime, 59.

Pergamus disfranchiſed by Macrinus, 144.

Perinthus, the battle of, gained by Niger, 98.

Periſcus, a famous engineer at Byzantium, 102. Saved from the common ſlaughter, 103.

Perſians threaten the Roman territories, 200. Defeated by Baliſta, 233. Invade them afreſh, 432. Abandon them, ibid. Defeated by them, 438. Before Niſibis, 440.

Pertinax's ſucceſs in Pannonia, 18. Promoted by M. Aurelius, ibid. Succeſs in Illyricum, 36. In Britain, 60. Narrow eſcape, 61. Succeeds Dionyſius at Rome, 63. Made proconſul of Afric, 64. And governor of Rome, 65. Obſequies of Commodus, 68. Proclaimed emperor, 72. Speech to the ſenate, 73. Riſe and extract, 74. Character and excellent adminiſtration, 76. Diſobliges Lætus and the army, 77. His intrepidity, 78. Death, ibid. Funeral honours, &c. 79. Pompous apotheoſis by Severus, 97.

Pertinax Hecotus the ſon, his biting ſarcaſm againſt Caracalla, 129. Put to death for it, ibid.

Petra, metropolis of Paleſtina Tertia, 626.

Petronius Mamercus put to death by Commodus, 64.

——— extortions at Conſtantinople, 614.

Phalangius, a bloody governor of Bœtica, 596.

Phalanx revived by Alex. Severus, 164. The bravery and reward of ſix of them, ibid.

Philas, the caſtle of, why and by whom built, 306.

Philip Julius's treachery to Miſitheus, 206. Succeeds him as captain of the guards, ibid. Treachery to Gordian, 207. His extract, 209. Whether the firſt chriſtian emperor, 210. Acknowledged by the ſenate, 211. Makes peace with Sapor, ibid. Submiſſion to the biſhop of Antioch, 212. Succeſs againſt the Carpi, ibid. Edict againſt catamites, 213. Marches againſt Decius, 214. Defeated and killed, ibid. His zeal for chriſtianity, 215.

——— his ſon, choſen collegue, 211. Conſul, 213. Killed by the prætorian guards, 214. His ſingular gravity, 215. Chriſtianity, ibid.

——— Flavius, an Arian, conſul, 437.

Philippopolis taken by the Goths, 218. 100,000 Romans put to the ſword in it, ibid.

Philoſophers careſſed by Julian, 533.

Philoſtratus's writings and character, 123 n.

Phoſphorius killed by the Perſians, 549.

Photinus's revenge on Phocas, 334.

Photius's treachery and depoſition, 403.

Phrygia deſtroyed by famine, 625.

Phrynicus's writings, &c. 46 n. 70 n.

Phyſicians fees from the poor regulated, 590.

Picts, who, and where ſited, 345. Defeated by Conſtantius, ibid. Join with the Scots, 497.

Pietas Euſebia, the dioceſe of, by whom founded, 453.

Piri, the fortifications of, demoliſhed, 592.
Piſcennian family perſecuted by Severus, 100.
Piſo ſent againſt Valens, 237. Takes the imperial title, 238. Murdered, ibid. His extract, divine honours, &c. ibid. & ſeq.
Pitholaus left in care of young Commodus, 17.
Plague, a grievous one, brought into Italy, 11.
Plautianus ſeizes Peſcennius's children, 94. Brings them to him, 97. His character, wealth, and ſway, 111. Conſulſhip, ibid. Immenſe dowry to his daughter, 112. Becomes obnoxious to the emperor, 113. Accuſed of treaſon, ibid. Put to death, 114.
Plautilla the daughter of Plautianus, married to Caracalla, 112. Becomes hateful to him, 113. Baniſhed into Liparis, 114. Put to death by her huſband, 125.
Plautius put to death by Caracalla, 125.
Players regulated by Valentinian's law, 596.
Plotinus goes voluntier to the Perſian war, 206. His writings and character, 271 n.
Pollenius put to death for ſubornation, 116.
Pollio Trebel. his hiſtory ſadly curtailed, 236. & ſeq. Writings and character, 321 n.
Pollux Jul. his writings, &c: 69 n.
Polyænus's writings, &c. 48 n.
Pompeianus Claud. Vide Claudius, 17.
——— Ruricius defeated at Verona, 371.
Pompeiopolis relieved by Baliſta, 233.
Pompey's theatre burnt, 213.
Pontus ravaged by the Scythians, 229.
Porphyry's writing and character, 271 n. Extract, travels, &c. 323 n. Death and works, 326 n. Why an enemy to the chriſtians, 328 n. Wild notion about Daniel's prophecies, 329 n.
Poſthumius's ſucceſs againſt the Gauls, 226. Proclaimed emperor there, 231, 232. Succeſs againſt the Germans, 232. Excellent character and government, ibid. Beloved by the Gauls, 241. Repulſes Gallienus, ibid. & 243. Killed by his ſoldiers, 246.
Præfecti prætorio, their office, 420. Province, ibid. & ſeq. By whom founded, 422.
Prætexatus made prefect of Achaia, 535.
Prætorian guards diſcarded by Severus, 94. A new ſet choſen, 96. Their tyranny, 373. Diſbandment by Conſtantine, 374.
Praxagoras's writings and character, 424 n.
Priſca, the wife of Dioclefian, a chriſtian, 291.
Priſcus Statius's ſucceſs in Syria, 9.
——— Philip's brother, made governor of Syria, 212. His extortion cauſe a revolt, 213. Proclaims himſelf emperor, ibid. Proſcribed, ibid.
——— a philoſopher, in favour of Julian, 533. His writings and character, 562 n. Killed by the Goths, ibid.
Proba, the wife of Probus, her excellent character, 609.
Probus marries Severus's daughter, 97.
——— ſucceſs againſt the Sarmatians, &c. 227. Defeated in Egypt, 253. Proclaimed emperor, 279. His extract, character, &c. ibid. Succeſs againſt the Gauls, ibid. & 280. The Germans, ibid. In Thrace, 281. Egypt, ibid. Triumph at Rome, 282. Succeſs againſt the revolters, 283. Works, 284. Murdered by the ſoldiers, 285. Epitaph and character, ibid.
Probus, governor of Illyricum, a rank coward, 604. Extortions diſcovered to the emperor, 608. His character and deſcent, ibid. Death, 609.
Procopius preſented with the purple by Julian, 542. Brings a ſupply of proviſions to Jovian, 568. Sent with Julian's corpſe to Tarſus, ibid. Diſappears, ibid. Revolts, 582. Concealed by Strategius, 614. Declared emperor at Conſtantinople, ibid. His ſucceſs, 615. Tyranny, 616. Forſaken by his troops, 617. Beheaded, ibid. His riſe and character, 618.
Proconſuls, their number and office, 421.
Proculus, his writings and character, 49 n.
——— riſe and revolt in Gaul, 283. Defeat and death, 284.
Proereſes, a chriſtian ſophiſt, his writings and character, 557 n.
Proſper, an extortionate ſucceſſor of Urſinicus, 465, 473.
Prudentius's character of Maxentius, 365.
Pruſa taken by the Scythians, 228.
Puſeus ſurrenders Annathua, 545.
Putienus choſen emperor, by the ſenate, 193. His mean extract and riſe, ibid. & ſeq. Excellent character, ibid. Marches againſt the Maximins, 195. Quickly returns to Rome, 198. Fills it with utmoſt joy, 199. Inſulted by the prætorian guards, 200. Killed by them, 201.
Pytus taken by the Borani, 28.

Q.

QUadi revolt againſt M. Aurel. 12. Defeated, 13. Driven out of Pannonia, 18. Over-reach the Romans, 21. Deſtroyed by a miraculous fire, 22. Sue for peace, 25. Break it, ibid. Defeated and puniſhed, 26. Defeated by Probus, 227. By Regillianus, 230. Invade Pannonia, 473, 486. And Illyricum, 604. Defeat the Romans, 605.

Quadruplatores, informers, why ſo called, 144.

Quartinus choſen emperor, 184. Betrayed and murdered, ibid.

Quietus, the ſon of Macrianus, choſen tribune, 236. Left in Syria, 240. Killed by the Emeſſans, ibid.

Quinctilian wounds Commodus, 57.

Quinquegentiani, whence ſo called, 297. Over-run Afric, 298. Defeated by Maximian, 300.

Quintili, put to death by Commodus, 58.

Quintilius Plautianus put to death by Severus, 115.

——— Marcellus, one of Alexander's counſellors, 157.

Quintillus, the brother of Claudius, proclaimed emperor, 254. His death, ibid.

R

RAcius Conſtans condemned for affronting Plautianus, 113.

Rauracum, where ſited, 461. The battle of, ibid.

Rauſimedes defeated and killed, 394.

Reanus put to death by Heliogabalus, 152.

Rectors among the Romans, their office, 422.

Regillianus's ſucceſs againſt the Sarmatians, 230. Proclaimed emperor, ibid. His extract and riſe, ibid. Murdered, 231.

Regillus put to death by Commodus, 63.

Religious war, the firſt waged by the chriſtians, 381.

Reman ſurrendered to Sapor, 493.

Remigius's extortions under Valentinian, 580. Strangles himſelf, 598.

Reverendus, a vile miniſter of Gordian, diſcarded, 203 n.

Rhetia ravaged by the Franks, 229. Makes peace with Conſtantius, 476. Invaded by the Suevians, 479.

Rhando takes the city of Mentz, 588.

Rhetianus conſpires againſt Caracalla, 137.

Rhine fortified by Valentinian, 585, 591.

Rhodanes, biſhop, baniſhed, 477.

Rhodanus burnt alive for extortion, 592.

Robur, the fortreſs of, built, 604.

Roman empire under great calamities, 239. Divided into four dominions, 298, Under ſix emperors, 354. Into four diſtricts, 420. How parted by the three ſons of Conſtantine, 432. United again under Conſtantius. 468. Under ſad calamities in Julian's reign, 537.

Romanus's extortions in Afric, 580. Gains over Palladius, 581. Arreſted by Theodoſius, 599, 600.

Rome governed by two emperors, 5. Laid under water, 6. Under great calamities, 12. Eſpecially a three years peſtilence, 61. Fire and famine, 62. Celebrates her millennium, 213. The walls of, repaired by Decius, 218. Suffers under a new peſtilence. 239 Under Maxentius's tyranny, 363. Why diſliked by Conſtantine, 406. In deep mourning for his death, 416.

Romula, the mother of Galerius, 299. Perſuades him to perſecute the chriſtians, ibid.

Romulianum, by whom ſo called, 299.

Romulus, the ſon of Maxentius, choſen conſul, 354.

Rucata betrayed by the Donatiſts, 600.

Rufinus eſcapes Conſtantius's ſnare, 461.

Rufus Vetius put to death by Commodus, 58.

——— Voluſius ſent into Afric, 363.

Rumitalces's bravery at Nice, 615.

Ruritius ſent into Afric, 580. Put to death, 582.

Ruſticus Julius in great eſteem with M. Aurelius, 3.

S

SAbaiarus, Valens, why ſo nicknamed, 615.

Sabinianus's revolt in Afric, 202. Defeated, ibid.

——— ſucceeds Urſinicus in the eaſt, 492. Treachery to him, 495.

Sabinus Fab. recalled from his government, 145. Choſen one of Alexander's counſellors, 157. Killed by the mob, 188.

Salia Flavius, an orthodox conſul, 437.

Salii, who, and where ſited, 487. Subdued by Julian, 488.

Salonicus put to death by Poſthumius, 232.

Salvidienus's writings and character, 286 n.

Saluſt, a great favourite of Julian, 528. Made prefect of Gaul, ibid. Narrow eſcape, 549.

Saluſt Secundus, different from the former, 530. Made prefect of the eaſt, ibid. Saves Maximus the philoſopher from being mobbed, 561 n. Refuſes the empire, 574. Promotes Valentinian's election, 575. Reſigns through old age, 621.

Samachus, Conſtantine the Great's fool, 418.

Sammonicus's writings, noble library, and death, 138 n.

Sandarion left governor of Palmyra, 261. Murdered, 262.

Sapor ſhamefully repulſed by Gordian, 205. Defeated, 206. Ravages the Roman empire, 228. Ill treatment of Valerian, ibid. New conqueſts, 233. Haughty meſſage to Odenatus, 234. Repulſed and defeated by him, 235. Embaſſy to Conſtantine, 409. Repulſed before Niſibis, 436. Defeated by Conſtantius, 438. Before Niſibis, 440. Proud demands on Conſtantius, 485. Renews the war againſt him, 492. Cruelty to the Amidans, 494. Takes ſeveral cities, 496. Frighted back by ill omens, 508. Firſt offers of peace rejected, 540. His ſecond, 547. Falls ſuddenly on Julian's army, 548. Makes peace with Jovian, 565. Treachery to Arſaces, 626. Invades Armenia, 627. Defeated by Valens, 629.

Saracens, invade Meſopotamia, 459. Go over to the Perſians, 540.

Sarmatians war againſt M. Aurel. 12. Defeated, 13. By Gordian, 204. By Conſtantine, 394. Ingratitude to him, 408. Severely puniſhed, ibid. Driven out by their own ſlaves, 409, 410. Settled by Conſtantine, 410. Reſtored and infranchiſed by Conſtantius, 487. Defeated in Mœſia, 606. Sue for peace, 607.

——— games whence, 394.

Saverne where ſited, 481. Rebuilt by Julian, ibid.

Sauromates driven from Iberia, 627. Reſtored to one half of it, 628.

Saxons repulſed by Theodoſius, 389. By Severus, 593.

Scarlet a fine dye among the Perſians, 262.

Schiſmatics ſuppreſſed by Conſtantine, 384.

Scots irruption on the Romans, 497.

Scudilia ſent to fetch Gallus into Italy, 466. Works his fall, 467.

Scutari among the Romans, what, 577.

Scythians invade the Romans, 102. Driven back by ſtorms, ibid. Invade Aſia, 222.

Scythopolis made the metropolis of Paleſtina Secunda, 626.

Sea overflows in Gallienus's reign, 239.

Sebaſtian, general of Julian, perſecutes the chriſtians, 543. The orthodox, 590. Supplies Jovian with proviſions, 568.

Seius Carus put to death by Heliogabalus, 153.

Seleucia demoliſhed by Caſſius, 10. By Severus, 108. By Carus, 288. The famous port of, built, 436.

Semnon taken priſoner by Probus, 280. Releaſed by him, ibid. & ſeq.

Sempronius, a vile eunuch, made governor of Rome, 130. Revolt and death, 242.

——— Sextus Jul. revolts, 282. Defeated and put to death, 283.

Senate's flattery to M. Aurelius, 37. Fury againſt him after his death, 68. Acknowledge Pertinax, 73. And Julianus, 82. Proſcribe him, 92. Submiſſion to Severus, 95. Hatred againſt Caracalla, 141. Acknowledge Macrinus, 142. Reſentment againſt Maximin, 188 & n. Applied to for a new emperor, 275. Chuſe Tacitus, 276. Reſtored by Conſtantine, 375.

——— of women, inſtituted by Heliogabalus, 152.

Senators, forty put to death by Severus, 107. Forbid to live far from Rome, 485.

Senecio's treachery to Conſtantine, 388.

Seniauchus murdered in Gaul, 572.

Sens, the ſiege of, raiſed, 477.

Septimius's writings and character, 176 n.

Serenianus delivers up Cyzicus, 616. Put to death, ibid. His reaſon for ſurrendering the place, 619.

Seſſorian church built by Conſtantine, 378.

Severa, the wife of the emperor Philip, 210. A good chriſtian, 215.

——— mother of Gratian, divorced, 587.

Severianus made governor of Macedon, 212. Recalled, 214.

——— the ſon of Severus, put to death, 387.

——— defeated and killed by the Germans, 583.

Severinus totally defeated by the Parthians, 7.

——— grandſon of M. Aurelius, born, 4. Commendation of Peſc. Niger, 61. Accuſed and acquitted, 62. Sent into Illyricum, 64. Funeral honours to Commodus, 68. To Pertinax, 79. Becomes ſuſpected, 83. His character, extract, and riſe, 88. Proclaimed emperor by his troops, 91. Proſcribed by the ſenate, ibid. Refuſes the copartnerſhip with Julianus, 92. Acknowledged by all, 93. Reception of of the hundred ſenators, 94. Diſbands the prætorian guards, ibid. & ſeq. Entry into Rome, 95. Speech to the ſenate, ibid. Chuſes a new prætorian guard, 96. Marches againſt Peſc. Niger, 97. Defeats and kills him, 99. Cruelty to all his friends, 100. Treachery to Albinus, 103. Damned piece of witchcraft, 104. Marches againſt him, ibid. Cruelty to him and his relations, 106. Threatening letter to the ſenate, 107. Cruelty to them and others, ibid. Marches againſt the Parthians, 108. & ſeq. Succeſs againſt them, ibid. Baffled before Atra, 110. Expedition into Syria, Egypt, &c. ibid. Edict againſt the chriſtians and Jews, ibid. Partiality to Plautianus, 112. Reforms ſundry abuſes, 114. Severity, cruelty and parſimony, 115. Expedition againſt the Britains, 116. Famous wall there deſcribed, 117. Taken ill at York, 118. Behaviour to the parricide Caracalla, 119. Severity to his accomplices, 120. Laſt legacy and works, ibid. Death and funeral honours, ibid. & ſeq.

Severus, one of Alexander's counſellors, 157.

——— choſen Cæſar, 314. Why preferred to Conſtantius, 342. His extract and character, ibid. Share of the government, 343. Extortions in Italy, ibid. 347. Sent againſt Maxentius, 348. Choſen conſul, 349. Deſerted by his troops, 350. Impriſonment and death, ibid. & ſeq.

——— ſucceeds Marcellus in Gaul, 478.

——— ſtands candidate for the empire, 586. Goes into Germany, 590. Succeſs there, 593.

Sextus, the ſtoic, an account of, 45 n.

——— the Pyrrhonian, ibid.

——— Condianus put to death by Commodus, 58.

Sibyl books opened, 239. Anſwer to Maxentius, 373.

Sicilia in Germany, where, 170.

Sicily infeſted with banditti, 239. Submits to Conſtantius, 452.

Simplicius baniſhed, 492.

——— vicar of Rome, his cruelties there, 604.

Singara taken by Sapor, 496. Demoliſhed, ibid. Yielded to the Perſians, 566.

——— the famous battle of, 437.

Sintula carries off part of Julian's forces, 497. Brings them back to him, 500.

Sirmium burnt with lightning, 611.

Slaves their manumiſſion facilitated by Conſtantine, 391.

Smoke, the ſelling of, at Rome, what, 162. Its puniſhment, 163.

Smyrna repaired by M. Aurelius, 38.

Soemis, the mother of Heliogabalus, 146. Her bravery, 148. Vile character, 150. Made preſident of a petticoat ſenate, 152. Murdered, 155.

Sohemus driven from his throne, 7. Reſtored by M. Verus, 9.

Solicinium, where ſituate, 591.

——— the battle of, ibid.

Sopater's writings and character, 429 n. Put to death, 430.

Sopheme yielded to the Romans, 308. Where ſited, ibid.

Sophia, St. the church of, built by Conſtantine, 511.

Sophronia yielded to Maxentius, 364. Kills herſelf, ibid.

Soſia, the metropolis of New Dacia, 268.

Spain invaded by the Franks, 244. Submits to Conſtantius, 452.

Spalatro, the palace of, deſcribed, 315.

Sparta burnt by the Heruli, 247.

Spartianus's writings and character, 319 n.

Stabuli præfectus, his office, 578.

Star, blazing, appears before Valentinian's death, 611.

Statius. See Priſcus, 8.

Straſburgh, the battle of, 483.

Suburbanicæ provinciæ, what, 422.

Sucidava, the paſs of, taken by Julian, 507.

Suevians invade Rhætia, 479.

Sulpitianus Flav. brings up Pertinax's ſon, 74. Sent to quell the prætorian troops, 78. His baſeneſs to them, 79.

Sun ſtrangely darkned in Gallienus's time, 239.

——— the famous temple of, conſecrated, 266.

Sunday, work forbid on, 394.

Suomarius ſues for peace to Julian, 488.

Suſa taken by Conſtantine, 370, 371.

Syagrus's eſcape and diſgrace, 592.

Syllanus joins with Gordian, 187.

Sylvanus occaſions a revolt in Gaul, 232. Put to death, ibid.

Sylvanus goes over to Conſtantius, 448. Betrayed by Arbetio, 469, 470. Takes the purple upon him, 471. Acquitted, ibid. Murdered, 472. His character, ibid.

Symmachus intercedes for the Cæſareans, 600. Anſwer to Theodoſius, 604.

Syria, invaded by Vologeſes, 7. Sides with Caſſius, 37. Forgiven by M. Aurelius, ibid. Threatened by the Perſians, 158, 163. Ravaged by Sapor, 233. By famine and peſtilence, 409.

T.

TAcitus choſen emperor by the ſenate, 275, 276. His reſpect to the hiſtorian, 276. His character, laws, &c. 277. Marches againſt the barbarians, 278. His death, ibid.

Taifales ravage Sarmatia, 487.

Tamſapor treats for peace with the Romans, 480, 485.

Tarragona taken and deſtroyed by the Franks, 245.

Tarſus taken and plundered by Sapor, 233. Deſigned for Julian's abode, 539. But is the place of his burial, 351, 568.

Tatian's character of the heathen philoſophers, 41, 42, & n

Tatianus's bravery in Syria, 8.

Taurinus choſen emperor, 159. Flees and drowns himſelf, 159.

Taurus baniſhed by Julian, 531, 532.

Tauſias ſhoots Pertinax, 78.

Taxes, Conſtantine's, regulations concerning, 393.

Terentius ſent into Iberia, 628.

Tertullus, one of Fauſtina's gallants, promoted, 36. Expoſed by a mimic on the ſtage, ibid.

Tervingæ war againſt the Vandals, 297.

Tetricus declared emperor in Gaul, 247. Sacrifices his army to M. Aurelius, 263. Led in triumph by him, ibid. Promoted, 265.

——— his ſon promoted by Aurelian, 265. His houſe deſcribed, ibid.

Thalaſſus's pride aggravates Gallus, 460, 461.

Thebais deſtroyed by Dioclefian, 305.

Themiſtius the philoſopher raiſed by Conſtantius, 469. His flattery to him, ibid. Sent with a golden crown to him, 479. His reward and gratitude, ibid.

Theocritus a worthleſs ſlave, made captain of Caracalla's guards, 130. Defeated in Armenia, 134.

Theodora married to Conſtantius, 298, 334.

Theodoret's cenſure on Porphyry, 329, n. Character of Julian, 551.

Theodoſius ſent into Britain, 583. Succeſs there, 589. In Mauritannia, 600. Outwitted by Firmus, 601. Succeſs againſt him, 602. Triumphs over him, 603.

——— his ſon's bravery againſt the Sarmatians, 600.

Theodotus defeats Æmilianus, 242. Why not promoted, ibid.

——— forgiven and careſſed by Julian, 536.

Theognes the Arian baniſhed, 401. Recalled, 405,

Theophylus's writings and character, 49, n.

——— governor of Syria murdered by Gallus's treachery, 462.

Theotechne, a magician put to death, 387.

Thermopylæ, the ſtreights of, guarded againſt the Goths, 239.

Theſſalonica beſieged by the Goths, 239.

Thrace ravaged by the Goths, 218, 239.

Thraſybulus foretels Alexander what death he ſhould die, 170.

Thundering legion, an account of, 23, 24.

Thuſcus Arbian. his treaſon forgiven, 144.

Thyſdras, where ſituate, 186. Gordianus proclaimed at, ibid.

Tiber dreadfully overflowed, 6. Lays Rome under water, 611. Reckoned ominous, ibid.

Tiberius burnt by Gallus, 453.

Tiberius, an obſcure uſurper of the empire, 412.

Timolaus the ſon of Odenatus, 246. Reigns jointly with him, ibid. & 257. His death, 261.

Tingitanum taken by Theodoſius, 602.

Tiridates kills the king of Armenia, 7. Taken priſoner, ibid.

——— reſtored to the Armenian crown, 143.

Titianus's inſulting meſſage to Conſtantius, 448. His heart breaks with that prince's kindneſs, 457.

Toxandria, where ſited, 487, 488.

Trajan the ſon of Decius, 217. His death, 221.

—— general of Valens, defeats the Perſians, 629.

——— the caſtle of, repaired by Julian, 484.

——— the canal of, cleanſed by Julian, 546.

Trapeſus taken by the Scythians, 228.

Treacle made by Demetrius for M. Aurelius, 3.

Tribelius Ann. his revolt and death, 244.

Treves rebuilt by Conſtantine, 357. Stands up for Conſtantius, 452.

Tripolis, whence ſo called, 580.

Tripolitana Libya haraſſed by the Aſturians, 580.

Tubuſuplius, the battle of, 601.

Turdulus Gallus's writings and character, 286 n.

Turin opens her gates to Conſtantine, 371.

Turinus Vetr. put to a new kind of death for extortion, 162, 163.

Tyana betrayed by Heraclamon, 258.

Why

Why ſpared by Aurelian, 259. Made the metropolis of Cappadocia Secunda, 626.

Tyndenſes defeated by Theodoſius, 601.

Tyre declares for Niger, 99. Taken and put to the ſword, ibid.

V.

VAdomarius's treachery to Julian puniſhed, 505. Sent againſt Procopius, 615.

Valens Pinar. choſen commander of the guards, 194, 195.

——— ſent againſt Macrianus, 237. Takes the purple upon him, ibid. Murdered, 238.

——— created Cæſar, 389. Depoſed, ibid.

——— brother of Valentinian, where born, 575. Promoted by him, 578. Choſen his collegue, ibid. His ſhare of the empire, 579. Goes into Syria, 613. Sends forces to oppoſe Procopius, 615. Baffled before Chalcedon, ibid. Succeſs againſt Procopius, 617. Againſt Marcellus, 619. Severity to the revolters, ibid. Baptized into Arianiſm, 621. Succeſs againſt the Goths, ibid. Peace with them, 623. Cruelty to the orthodox, 625. Sends forces againſt Sapor, 628.

Valentia, a new province in Britain, 589.

Valentine's revolt ſuppreſſed, 589.

Valentinian caſhiered by Barbetio, 481. Narrow eſcape, 572. Choſen emperor, 574. His extract, riſe, &c. 575. Zeal for chriſtianity, 576. Ill uſed on that account, ibid. Proclaimed, 577. Intrepid ſpeech to the ſoldiers, 578. Divides the empire with Valens, 579. Succeſs againſt the Germans, 585. Creates his ſon emperor, 586. Whether guilty of bigamy, 587. Betrays his cruel temper, 589. Enacts ſome excellent laws, 590. Succeſs againſt the Alemans, 591. Countenances Maximin's cruelties, 595. Favours the pagans, 597. Vain attempt againſt the Alemans, ibid. Severity to Hymecius, &c. 598. Marches againſt the Germans, 604. Peace with Macrianus, 606. Marches into Illyricum, 607. Ravages the Quadi, 610. Harſhneſs to their embaſſadors, ibid. Sudden death, ibid. Omens forerunning it, 611. Buried by Theodoſius, ibid. His character, ibid. & ſeq.

——— tribune racked by Conſtantius, 490.

——— Galata born, 620. His death, 625.

Valeria, the wife of Galerius, ill treated by Maximin, 361, 362. Her wandering flight and death, 387, 388.

Valeria Severa, the wife of Valentinian, 575. Her offſpring by him, ibid.

——— New Pannonia, whence ſo called, 300.

Valerianus, one of Niger's generals, defeated, 99.

——— Petus put to death by Heliogabalus, 153.

——— choſen cenſor, 219. Sent againſt Æmilianus, 222. Proclaimed emperor, 223. His character, riſe, &c. 224. Raiſes the eighth perſecution, 226. Marches againſt the Perſians, 227. Taken priſoner by Sapor, ibid. Cruel treatment and death, ibid.

Valerius Catul. ſent againſt Severus, 91. Sides with him, ibid.

——— Flaccus reſcued by Probus, 227.

Vandals over-run Pannonia, 17. Repulſed by Aurelian, 256.

Varranes ſues to Probus for peace, 282. Succeſs againſt the Segetani, 287. Defeated by Carus, ibid. Reſtores his conqueſts to Diocleſian, 294.

Vatican church built by Conſtantine, 377.

Ventitianus ſucceeds Libo in Syria, 11.

Venus Calva, her temple at Aquileia, 197.

Verianus killed by the Heruli, 247.

Verona taken by Conſtantine, 372.

Verronianus's extract and character, 563. Made his ſon's collegue, ibid. His death, ibid.

——— the ſon of Jovian, made Cæſar, ibid. & ſeq.

Verus L. his ſavage diſpoſition, 5. Created Cæſar, and collegue with M. Aurel. ibid. Sent againſt Parthicus, 6. Againſt the Parthians, 6, 7. Horrid debaucheries and negligence, 7. Succeſs 8. Triumphs over the Parthians, 11. Spreads the plague wherever he comes, ibid. & ſeq. Goes with Aurel. into Germany, 12. His death, 13. Obſequies and character, 13, 14. Extravagance and other vices. 14. Suppoſed to have been poiſoned, 15. Letter concerning Caſſius, 29.

Verus Martius's bravery in Syria, 8. Informs M. Aurelius of Caſſius's conſpiracy, 31. Suppoſed to have been defeated by him, 32. His generoſity, &c. 33.

——— L. Ann. the ſon of Aurelius, dies in Paleſtine, 17.

Veſpronius Candid. ſent againſt Severus, 91. Confirms him in the empire, ibid. Defeats Niger, 98.

Veſta, the temple of, burnt, 65.

——— the fire of, carried to the temple of Heagabalus, 153.

Veſtale

Veſtals ſeveral executed by Caracalla, 129, 130.

Veteraneo's revolt in Pannonia, 443. Deputation to Conſtantius, 445. Outwitted by him, 446. His pious end, ibid. & ſeq.

Vhabalat, the ſon of Odenatus, 246. His joint reign, ibid. & 257. Spared by Aurelian, 264. Made king of Armenia, ibid.

Vicars among the Romans, their office, 422.

Victims, human, practiſed by Severus, 104. By Heliogabalus, 153.

Victor Aurel. made governor of Pannonia Secunda, 507. His writings and character, 515 n.

——— made general of Julian's foot, 539.

Victoriana's great ſway in Gaul, 247.

Victorianus declared partner by Poſthumius, 243. His motley character, ibid. Murdered by his men, 246.

Victory, the temple of, demoliſhed, 435.

Vindelicii quelled by Aurelian, 267.

Vindemius's writings and character, 514 n.

Vindex defeated at Aquileia, 16.

Virgins protected by Jovian, 571.

Viſimar killed by the Goths, 409.

Vitalianus put to death by Gordianus, 187.

Vithicabius aſſaſſinated, 588.

Ulpianus Dom. made counſellor to Papianus, 114. To Alexander, 157. Murdered by the prætorian guards, 159.

Ulpius Marcellus's ſucceſs in North Britain, 56. Ill requited by Commodus, ibid.

——— Julianus's timely advice to Macrinus, 137. Sent againſt Heliogabalus, 147. His head ſent to Macrinus, ibid.

Vologeſes revolts againſt the Romans, 7. Signal victory over them, ibid. Wars againſt Severus, 108. Peace with him, 109.

Voluſianus declared Cæſar, 221. His various names, ibid. Death, 222.

Vopiſcus's writings and character, 319 n.

Ur, where ſituate, 568.

Uranus's revolt and defeat, 159.

Urſacius diſobliges the Germans into a revolt, 582.

Urſicinus oppoſes Gallus's miſconduct, 454. Goes to Rome, 465. Narrowly eſcapes death, 468. Sent againſt Sylvanus, 471. Treacherouſly murders him, 472. Stripped of his power, 474. Reſtored, and ſent into the eaſt, 480. Betrayed by Euſebius, 492. Gallant behaviour there, 493. Tried and diſgraced, 495.

Urſula ungratefully put to death by Julian, 531.

Urſus ordered to aſſiſt the African clergy, 384.

Utilis, one of Fauſtina's gallants, promoted, 36.

Vulcatius Terentius's writings and character, 209 n. 319 n.

W.

WOol rains down in Artois, 590.

X.

XIphilin's abridgment of Dio Caſſius imperfect, 180 n. His account of the thundering legion, 24. His character, 180 n.

Z.

ZAbas defeated by the Romans, 259.

Zaitha, Zantha, Gordian buried at, 207. His tomb, at, 544.

Zamma murdered by his brother, 599.

Zantiches, king of the Jaziges, his ſubmiſſion to M. Aurelius, 26.

Zenobia, the wife of Odenatus, 234. Made queen, 235. With the title of Auguſta, 243. Whether acceſſary to her huſband's death, 245. Her reign, 246. Conquers Egypt, 253. Her pedigree, learning and bravery, 257. Noble exploits, 258. Defeated by Aurelian, 259. Brave defence of Palmyra, 260. Letter to Aurelian, ibid. Purſued and taken in her flight, 261. Led in triumph under a huge weight of jewels, 263. Her retirement and death, 264.

Zenobius, biſhop, whether deſcended from queen Zenobia, 264.

Zenus's ſucceſs againſt Alexander, 363.

Zizais made king of Sarmatia, 487.

Zolicus, Heliogabalus's beaſtly huſband, 151.

Zonaras's abridgment of Dio Caſſius, 180 n. Account of Macrianus's uſurpation, 238.

Zoſimus, an enemy to the chriſtians, 212. His hiſtory truncated, 319. Partiality againſt Conſtantine the Great, 418. Cenſured and confuted, 419.

The End of the Fifteenth Volume.